Chronicle

The War.—By Monday,, April 1, the "Battle of Picardy" was raging on a line drawn almost north and south from Feuchy four miles east of Arras, through Serre, seven miles north of Albert, Le Hamel, a little east of Corbie not far from the junction of the Somme and the Ancre, Demuin, Moreuil, Grievesnes and Cantigny. Here the line turned east by Montchel, Ayencourt, south of Montdidier, Lassigny and Plemont, then ran south of Noyon and thence north of Coucy to Anizy. Although the German offensive lost something of its driving power at this stage of the contest, it still continued to exert its pressure on the Franco-British lines and, though at the heaviest cost, slowly pushed back the Allied forces. On April 2 the front from Albert south to Montdidier was the center of the struggle, the heaviest fighting taking place in the Somme-Avre district, the points of strategic value like Hangard, Demuin and Moreuil being fiercely contested. Across the Avre there was a stubborn fight for Grievesnes, the point nearest the Paris-Amiens railway. The French still claimed it on April 2. The dispatches of the following day stated that the localities of the greatest activities were just north of Serre, in the neighborhood of Hebuterne, where Field Marshal Haig reported local successes and Berlin the breakdown of British attacks; between the Luce and the Avre Rivers, and on the left bank of the Oise, southwest of Servaise, where the French repulsed strong enemy attacks. On that date also the Montdidier-Lassigny sector was the scene of a spirited artillery engagement. During the following twenty-four hours comparative quiet reigned along the battle-front, except south of Arras, where the British retook Ayette, and on the southern line immediately east of Lassigny, where the French extended their positions. Official dispatches also reported that the French had taken over another short section of the line, thus extending their holdings to Thennes on the Luce.

Bulletin, Apr. 1, p.m.-Apr. 8, a.m.

On April 5 news came that on the previous day a German offensive in the crucial area between the Somme and the Avre, and southwest of Grivesnes had netted them substantial gains. On the right the British held fast, but on the left their lines were forced back in the neighborhood of Hamel, one mile south of the Somme and twelve miles east of Amiens. The French troops also lost some ground between the Luce and the Avre, with the villages of Morisel and Mailly-Raineval. Giving up for a time their assaults on the British front south of the Somme the German forces then delivered heavy attacks on Haig's lines from the Somme northward to Moyenneville about Buckoy. South of the Somme massed attacks against the British line compelled it to fall back to new positions east of Villers-Bretonneaux, about three miles southwest of Hamel and nine miles east of Amiens. South of the Luce the French had to give up Castel. South of the Avre Petain's troops were still holding Cantigny. According to the dispatches of April 7 the enemy on April 6 shifted their attacks to points along the French front from the region of Montdidier eastward to the east and south of Chauny, southwest of La Fère. The London War Office states that the attacks were beaten off, except on the left bank of the Oise in the Chauny sector. Two other attempts were made by the enemy on the southern side of the Somme "elbow," one between Mesnil St. Georges and Montchel, both southwest of Montdidier, the other north of Mont Renaud, southwest of Noyon. In both cases the French held their ground. But shortly after on the south bank of the Oise they had to give up Pierremande and Folenbray, southwest of La Fère, while the British were retaking Aveury, north of Albert. The German offensive has lost its initial momentum, but is still making gains in territory, though with great loss of life. The expected Allied counter-offensive has not yet begun. General Foch and Premier Clemenceau have expressed themselves as confident of ultimate success.

British and Japanese troops are reported to be in Vladivostok.

On April 4 Congress completed and President Wilson signed the bill authorizing the issuance of the Third Liberty Loan Bonds at 4¼ per cent. The bonds will mature in ten years. The Loan campaign opened on Saturday, April 6, and is to continue four weeks until May 4. After the initial payment of 5 per cent on subscription, instalments of 20, 35, and 40 per cent will be due respectively on May 28, July 18, and August 15. The amount is $3,000,000,000 and over-subscriptions. The bill signed by the President authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue $4,500,000,000 bonds, in addition to the $3,666,000,000 authorized under former legislation, raises the interest rate from 4 to 4¼ per cent, authorizes issuance of as much as $8,000,000,000 certificates at one time and extends to the Treasury the power to loan $1,500,000,000 more to the Allies from time to time. In the second loan 2 per cent cash payment was required with the subscription, in the present 5 per cent. No payment is stated for June, when the drain on the country's financial resources will be heavy on account of the income and excess profits due June 15. The new bonds will mature on September 15, 1928, and will bear interest from May 9 next payable semi-annually September 15 and March 15. The first coupon will be for 129 days' interest.

According to a Treasury announcement, payment in full may be made with the application on or before May 4, but bonds will not be delivered before May 9 on any subscription for an amount exceeding $10,000. Full payment may be completed upon subscription for any amount on May 9 or any subsequent instalment date. The bonds are not convertible and are not subject to call for redemption before maturity. They enjoy the same exemptions from taxation as those of the Second Liberty Loan. They are thus exempt from all State, municipal and local taxation and all Federal taxes except super-income taxes, excess-profit taxes and inheritance taxes.

Addressing the Vienna Municipal Council on April 3, Count Czernin, the Austro-Hungarian Foreign Minister, declared that Austria-Hungary was recently on the point of beginning peace negotiations with the Entente. But the "wind suddenly veered," he added, the Entente deciding to await developments in Austria-Hungary which led it to hope that the Austro-Hungarian monarchy would soon be helpless. He added that he did not intend to go begging for peace or to obtain it by entreaties and lamentations, but to enforce it by moral right and physical strength. Any other tactics, he thought, only tended to prolong the war. In the course of the speech the Count made the following declarations:

The Czernin Speech

> Since I came into office I have striven only after one aim, namely to secure an honorable peace to the monarchy, and to create a situation which will secure to Austria-Hungary her future free development and, moreover to do everything possible that this terrible war will be the last one for time out of mind. I have never spoken differently.

The most startling statement in the speech of the Minister came in the form of a declaration in which he said that at one time Premier Clemenceau of France had approached Austria-Hungary and had asked her on what terms she was willing to make peace. Austria had replied that the only obstacle to peace with France was Alsace-Lorraine, and Premier Clemenceau in turn had stated that it was impossible to negotiate on that basis. "Come what may," Count Czernin added, "we shall not sacrifice Germany's interests any more than she will leave us in the lurch. We are not fighting for imperialistic or annexationist aims for ourselves or Germany." He declared that he did not believe that President Wilson in his recent address really desired to cause a separation between Vienna and Berlin, because the President knew that such a thing was impossible. He added that President Wilson probably saw that Austria-Hungary was more inclined to peace than Germany. Premier Clemenceau flatly denied that France had ever approached Austria-Hungary in anything like a peace parley.

In his speech at Baltimore on inaugurating the Liberty Bond Campaign President Wilson again clearly defined the purposes and the ideals of the United States in the present war. The keynote of his speech is given in the following passage:

> Germany has once more said that force and force alone, shall decide whether justice and peace shall reign in the affairs of men, whether right as America conceives it or dominion as she conceives it shall determine the destinies of mankind. There is, therefore, but one response possible from us: Force, force to the utmost, force without stint or limit, the righteous and triumphant force which shall make right the law of the world and cast every selfish dominion down in the dust.

The country at large enthusiastically indorses President Wilson's words.

Canada.—During the week difficulties in Canada reached a climax in the anti-conscription riots in Quebec, in which four persons were killed and many injured.

Quebec Riots

The incidents leading up to the outbreak began in the election campaign, which consisted principally in the disfranchisement of very many voters opposed to the policy of the Unionists and in the brutal slander of the Church. In an excellent speech delivered in the Canadian House of Commons, the Hon. Charles Murphy, Secretary of State in the Laurier Cabinet, sums up the Unionist pre-election issues as follows:

> Briefly they were that the Union Government would isolate Quebec and prevent the French and the Catholics from ruling Ontario and the rest of Canada; that the Pope and the Catholics generally were not in favor of the Allies in the present war; and finally, that the issue was one between Protestantism and Catholicism, and that all who did not support the Government, as representing Protestantism, were slackers, traitors, and pro-Germans.

The politicians were ably abetted by the ministers, who turned their pulpits into "political cockpits"; by the Orange papers and by the Christian Science Monitor of Boston. By order of the Prime Minister the latter paper was placed on the subscription list of the several Departments of Government and paid for out of public funds. The papers were especially outrageous in their calumnies, as may be judged from these abstracts from Mr. Murphy's speech:

> After moralizing on the tragic importance of the issue to be decided on December 17 [the Canadian Home Journal] proceeded thus:

"Germany's reptile diplomacy uses many agencies in many lands, and the most important agency that it is today using on Canadian soil is the Roman Catholic Church."

No proof of this outrageous statement is offered, or attempted to be offered, but it is followed by these equally brilliant gems:

"Lamentable as the fact is it is nevertheless a fact to be faced. As a consequence we find Roman Catholic churches in Canada head centers of activity to place in power those whose policies aim at the withdrawal of Canada from the war, the desertion of our soldiers at the front and the betrayal of Great Britain."

And listen to this, Mr. Speaker:

"By what promises and devices the Kaiser's Government has secured the support of the Roman Catholic Church is not wholly clear."

Not then and not now.

"He has promised to restore the temporal home of the Pope in Europe and if victorious to extend his influence to South America.

"It is altogether probable that he has promised his aid in extending the powers the Church now enjoys in the province of Quebec to all Canada.

"The women of Canada are religious by nature. They are the backbone of our Churches. Let them remember what is at stake.

"Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his candidates exalt the traitor and condemn the soldier. It is for the womenfolk of the soldier to give them their answer at the polls.

"Canada is menaced by open foes in Europe and insidious foes at home. To vote for Union Government is the woman's paramount duty,—the duty of the hour."

Mr. Speaker, could anything be more dastardly or criminal than the article from which I have just quoted? . . .

Let me quote from a full front-page article which appeared in the Orange Sentinel, for December 20, 1917:

"A crushing defeat for the Roman Catholic Hierarchy of Quebec and their allies in the other provinces is the result of the polling on Monday.

"The whole election campaign was fought upon the lines of the program of the Orange Association. For the first time in the life of the Dominion a United Protestantism followed the lead of the Orangemen of Canada to a magnificent victory over reactionary forces whose triumph would have disgraced the country. The great Order which the Sentinel represents has reason for gratification in having at last won that recognition from the Loyalists of the country which it has long deserved."

There you have a declaration after the event written by a gentleman who was endorsed by the Prime Minister as his candidate in West Toronto, and who now represents that constituency in this House.

As a sample of other calumnies and their refutation, the following may be cited: It was alleged that antagonism to the war was "encouraged and abetted by the members of the Religious Orders from France, who found asylum in Canada and used that asylum to undermine Canada's strength in the struggle." . . . "It is unfortunate that they did not follow the example of the priests of the Catholic Church in France, who threw themselves into the struggle of their people to preserve their national existence." Mr. Murphy answered:

It is to be kept in mind that the figures which I am about to submit relate only to French subjects who were members of Religious Orders in Canada. I will begin with the Franciscans. At the outbreak of war, practically the entire body of French Franciscans left Canada and returned to France to do their duty. In the whole Dominion of Canada, I am informed, there now remain but six French Franciscan priests, and these six are exempt from military service on the ground of age or physical unfitness. Those who returned to France were assigned to various war duties, and thirty-two of them went into the trenches. Of these, three have been mentioned in the orders of the day, two have been decorated with the military medal, one has received the cross of the legion of honor, one has been wounded and discharged, and one was killed on the field of battle, after he had been twice mentioned in the orders of the day and had received the military medal. From L'Institut des Freres de l'Instruction Chrétienne twenty-five members returned to France and entered the French army. Of these, four have been decorated and mentioned in the orders of the day, four have been wounded, one was taken prisoner, one who has been twice wounded has been missing for three years and is assumed to have died of his wounds; and two were killed on the field of battle. In addition to the Canadian members of the Jesuit Order who are chaplains in France, five French Jesuits went back from Canada to join the French army. Of these two were killed in action. All the members of the Congregation of the Holy Cross who were French subjects answered the call to the colors. One was wounded twice, and returned again to the front. One has been reported "missing" for over a year, and is assumed to be dead or a prisoner, and three others are still fighting in the trenches. The Fathers of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost sent three of their members to the French army, and a fourth is on his way to France. One of those who returned to France was killed at the front, and another who is now seriously wounded has been decorated with the military cross and was twice mentioned in the orders of the day. The Trappists had only two French members of military age and both returned to France in 1914. One of them, Father Thomas, received two decorations, the military cross and the military medal, was twice mentioned in the orders of the day, and later, in rescuing a companion, suffered the loss of both eyes. Today he is a teacher of the blind in France. The other Trappist, who returned to his native country, was Father Hypolithe, who is now fighting along with seven of his brothers in the French army.

Of the 900 members of the Marist Order who have fought in the trenches, fourteen French subjects went from Canada to France; two of those were killed on the battlefield, six were wounded, one received the military medal, and all were mentioned in the orders of the day. Les Pères de Montfort sent fifteen of their French members back to France. Three of these brave men were stationed in the county I have the honor to represent in Parliament. Of the fifteen who returned to France, five won the military cross, five were mentioned in the orders of the day, one of them on three consecutive occasions; and one was killed on the field of battle. From the Eudist Congregation, seventeen of its members went back from Canada to France. Of these, three were wounded, two were mentioned in the orders of the day, two were decorated with the military cross, and four were honorably discharged from service. The Brothers of St. Gabriel sent eight of their French members who were of military age to serve in the French ranks. Four of them were wounded, four were decorated with the military medal, four mentioned in the orders of the day, and one of them, Brother Garrigues-Antonin, is the inventor of a wonderful field-gun which has done great execution against the enemy. The twelve French subjects who were members of the Sulpician Community went to France when war broke out, and immediately reported for duty. Seven went to France and later on served in the Lorraine, Verdun, Champagne, and Salonika campaigns. One was decorated with the military cross at Verdun. With the Dominicans at Ste. Hyacinthe, there were only two French members of military age when war was declared. These two went to France. The Congregation of the Blessed Sacrament sent to France the only one of its members who was not exempt on account of age or ill-health, and he is still serving as a chaplain at the front. Four members of the Congregation of the Holy Cross in Canada reported for duty at the beginning of the war, and one was wounded while fighting in the French army. The Brothers of St. Vincent de Paul had only one French member eligible for military service. He joined the French army in 1914, and has been twice mentioned for bravery in the orders of the day. The Missionaries of the Sacred Heart have been represented at the front by four French subjects who returned from Canada to serve in the trenches. One of them, Father Cadoux, was mentioned in the orders of the day for special bravery in rescuing the wounded under fire. From the Capuchin Order, ten French subjects went back to France and joined the colors. Three of these men were killed on the battlefield, Father Albert, Father Edward and Father Justinian, all of whom at one time were stationed in Ottawa, and with two of whom I was well acquainted. The Christian Brothers, at Montreal, are represented at the front by two of their French members; one of them has been severely wounded. From the Oblate Congregation in Canada, twenty-four French members returned to France and they have served in the ranks with great distinction. One was killed on the battlefield, two died of wounds, four were decorated with the military cross and several of the others were mentioned for bravery in the orders of the day.

These and other untruths of Unionist politicians ruffled the spirits of the French, and when rough treatment was added to insult, some rebelled and were promptly shot. As usual, the prelates and priests of Quebec lent their powerful aid to the support of law and order. Cardinal Bégin caused this letter to be read in all churches of the diocese:

M. le Curé: Our city has been during Holy Week the theater of many deplorable scenes of disorder and violence against persons and property. From the simple point of view of reason, and whatever may be the grievances suffered, it is certain that such tactics are particularly harmful to those who employ them. But Christian conscience reproves them, and the Catholic Church forbids them. And that should have sufficed to prevent the manifestations which so many citizens regret with us. The memories of the Passion of Our Saviour and the sacred liturgy evoked in such a striking manner these past few days give the Faithful other examples to follow, and other teachings to practise. If we want Jesus Christ to pardon and bless us, we must know how to make our conduct conform with the grave lessons which He preached to us from His Cross.

Would you be good enough, M. le Curé, upon reading this notice tomorrow in your pulpit, to recommend calmness and moderation to your parishioners, and supplicate them to guard against ill-considered actions which are sterile of all good, which give to our city of Quebec a name that it does not deserve, and may increase the evil, otherwise heavy enough, from which we already suffer.

At last reports the tumult had subsided, and order was restored in the streets of Quebec.

Ireland.—The condition of Ireland still continues to attract the attention of the world, especially of the United States. On March 16 the Texas Senate passed the following resolution by unanimous consent:

Freedom and Martial Law

Whereas, To-morrow, March 17, is St. Patrick's Day, a day dear to the heart of all true Irishmen; therefore, be it Resolved, That when the Senate adjourns today it do so in honor of this historic anniversary, and with the hope that the arrival of the next St. Patrick's Day, Ireland may be free.

Later Mr. Gallinger, Republican leader in the United States Senate, proposed this resolution in Congress:

That the petition in the case of the Irish people for the great principle of self-determination as interpreted by the President of the United States in his discussion of his fundamental and indispensable condition of a lasting peace will constitute a source of genuine gratification to the people and government of the United States, sincerely solicitous as they are for the harmony and prosperity of the two great peoples.

That the two houses of Congress concur in the belief that the effect of willingness on the part of the people and Government of Great Britain to permit the ascertainment of the will of the Irish people by means of a plebiscite of the adult population (men and women) will be viewed as a precedent of the most profound importance by all peoples of distinct national character seeking to acquire in an orderly legal manner final vindication and sanction of their titles to sovereignty.

Just about the time these resolutions were being presented, Mrs. Sheehy-Skeffington issued a statement about the release of Bowen Colthurst, who murdered her husband in Dublin a year since. The document states that the Government, by releasing this man, as "cured," virtually admits the contention of the Manchester Guardian, the Nation, the New Witness, the New Statesman, the Labor Leader, and the London Herald that the plea of insanity set up by Colthurst's counsel was a sham. Ireland itself is still under martial law, Clare in particular, where the regulations are stringent and most arbitrary. Bishop Fogarty thus speaks his mind to a reporter of the Cork Examiner:

My opinion of the martial law here and military display, and of the grievous inconvenience it is causing to the community is that it is an effort by politicians to swamp the Sinn Fein movement under an organized campaign of calumny and terror. That effort will fail, for the Sinn Fein movement is nothing more than the national spirit of Ireland purified from English dross. That spirit is immortal, and nothing can kill it. Clare's great crime in the eyes of the Government is, I fancy, that it is a Sinn Fein county. Restrictions imposed on the people's life by this martial-law system of passports and censorship are, in my opinion, not justified.

The Manchester Guardian has returned to the subject of conscription in Ireland, stating:

There is only one way to get a greater military effort from Ireland, and that is through the unconditional establishment of a native government, national in powers and scope. If such a government is established, conscription will be unnecessary to gather an effective surplus of manhood from Ireland.

Two years ago, official figures showed that 160,000 men were available for military service. Since then 40,000 have enlisted. A million and a half additional acres of land have been devoted to food production, thus employing the labor of thousands more. Other thousands are working in the shipyards and munition factories of Great Britain.

Both the Nationalists and the Sinn Feiners have retorted that they will never consent to conscription. The Irish Convention ended on April 5 after adopting the draft report of the deliberations of the Grand Committee. But what that document contains has not yet been made public.

Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass

MICHAEL KENNY, S. J.

"I SEE the Constitution has broken out again in AMERICA," wrote S. L. B. of Kentucky, surprised that his State-right, strict constructionist recrudescences of the ante-secession period had not proved a silencer. Well, it must continue to break out until the full freedom of Catholic worship is finally and rightly adjudicated, despite Mr. Elder's conclusive demonstration of the power and duty of the United States Supreme Court so to adjudicate in the case of Oklahoma. There "perfect toleration of religious sentiment . . . and worship" was required by Congress, and accepted by Oklahoma, as an essential condition for admission to Statehood. But what comfort is this to Catholics in States from which no such specific condition was demanded, e. g., Georgia and the Carolinas of the original States, and not a few of the later accessions? None at all, according to Mr. Elder: "The religious liberty guarantee of the Federal Constitution was not imposed on the States; it binds Congress only." Other writers in AMERICA discussing prohibition's restrictions on the Mass have emphasized this view, reiterating with much rhetorical variety the fantastic doctrine that "The States are free to establish any religion or prohibit the exercise of any religion," and a fortiori to hamper it; and that neither the First, nor the Fourteenth Amendment, nor both together, nor any other constitutional power enables the Supreme Court to restrain them. Then, should any State prohibit the wine necessary for the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice, the central and essential act of our religious worship, what resource is left to us, free and sovereign but non-Oklahomian Catholic Americans, except open defiance of the law, which is felony, or abject submission to it, which is apostasy?

One only, we are told, and this is a preventive, not a remedy: "Safety can be guaranteed only by inserting in the State prohibition laws a clause specifically authorizing the use of wine for sacramental purposes." That is, lock your stable before the steed is stolen. But if you cannot procure a lock; if the State Solons refuse to accept the sacramental clause, as happened in Oklahoma and may happen in most southern and some northern States, what then are Catholics in such States to do? Nothing but incur felony and helotry, take to the woods or jails, or dig catacombs; or else, become Baptists, Methodists, or other pure species of prohibitionist. This, surely, would be an inglorious predicament for the members of a religious body whose members form one-fifth of the citizens of this republic and perhaps forty per cent of its soldiers and sailors—now running into the millions.

Fortunately, there is another and safe alternative, and the expositors of constitutional impotence are in error. Oklahoma had been bound by the religious-liberty condition long before Congress formally reiterated it. The claims of some of the original States to western territory proving an obstacle to an agreed Federal Constitution, in order to induce them to cede their claims to the nation, Jefferson drew up in 1784 an ordinance for the government of all the western Territories and of States to be formed therefrom, including therein the guarantee of full religious freedom which Virginia, at his instance, had already incorporated in its Constitution. This ordinance was adopted by the Congress of 1784, and in a modified form was enacted in 1787 by the Congress which in the same year drafted and signed the United States Constitution. It was re-enacted by the First Constitutional Congress, August 7, 1789. The ordinance opens with the phrase, "Be it ordained by the United States in Congress assembled," and having provided for the formation of Territories and States, reads thus:

> Section XIII. And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty, which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions, are erected; to fix and establish those principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions, and governments, which forever after shall be formed in the said territory; to provide also for the establishments of States, and permanent government therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal Councils on an equal footing with the original States, at as early periods as may be consistent with the general interest:
> Section XIV. It is hereby ordained and declared that the following articles shall be considered articles of compact, between the original States and the people and States in the said territory, and forever remain unalterable, unless by common consent, to wit:
> Article 1. No person demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship, or religious sentiments, in the said territories.

Jefferson's draft of 1784, which excluded slavery, applied to all western territory, but the ordinance of 1787 was reserved to "the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio," North Carolina not having yet ceded its claims to the national Government. When that cession was made the First Constitutional Congress, which had ratified this ordinance in 1789, extended it, in 1790, to all south-western territory, with the single exception of the anti-slavery article. But the sections ordaining that religious liberty is a basic principle of our Government and that "no person shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments," were specifically included as essential to "the establishment of States therein . . . and for their admission to a share in the Federal Council on an equal footing with the original States." And to this day it has never been revoked. Whence two conclusions necessarily follow: (1) Since Congress makes the establishment of religious liberty, in opinion and worship, essential to the admission of new States "on an equal footing with the original States," this act of the national Government applies equally to the original States, and therefore to all the territory comprised in the United States in 1790.

(2) If the religious liberty condition exacted of Oklahoma empowers the United States Supreme Court to nullify that State's prohibition of sacramental wine, then the same condition, imposed in like terms, by the same congressional authority on all States that should be formed from the United States territory of 1790, equally empowers the same Court to nullify such prohibition by any State formed out of said territory.

The ordinances of 1787 and of 1790 apply strictly only to territory then possessed or validly claimed by the United States, though the acceptance in practice of the religious liberty provision by all States formed from territory subsequently acquired, and the specific requirement by Congress of its formal acceptance by the last State admitted, constitute good legal presumption that freedom of worship is fundamental and essential in every constitution established under United States authority. But for this conclusion we have grounds far transcending presumption. We have treaties, duly ratified by Congress and signed by the supreme constitutional authorities, defining the governing principles of all our subsequent acquisitions; and in each and all the religious liberty provision is specifically included. The first is the "Treaty with France for the Cession of Louisiana," ratified and proclaimed October 21, 1803, which doubled our then possessions. Article III reads:

> The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution, to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages and immunities of citizens of the United States; and in the meantime they shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they profess.

It should be here noted that the phrase, "in the meantime," assumes that "the free enjoyment of liberty, property and religion," guaranteed to the inhabitants in the interval before admission to the Union, shall, upon admission, be constitutionally theirs. The same assumption is observable in our treaty with Spain, proclaimed February 22, 1821, which brought us east and west Florida and rounded out our southern territory from the Atlantic to the Sabine River. Article V provides that "The inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion, without any restriction"; and Article VI, extending the same guarantee for future development as in case of Louisiana, further provides that when incorporated in the Union, "The inhabitants of the territories which his Catholic Majesty cedes to the United States . . . shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the privileges, rights, and immunities of citizens of the United States."

The whole territory included in the present States of the Union was completed by the treaties with Mexico, 1848 and 1853. The treaty of July 4, 1848, commences "In the Name of Almighty God" and this provides in Article VI:

> The Mexicans who in the territory aforesaid, shall not preserve the character of citizens of the Mexican Republic . . . shall be incorporated in the union of the United States and be admitted . . . to the enjoyment of all the rights of citizens of the United States according to the principles of the Constitution; and in the meantime shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction.

The Treaty of 1853 which further extended American possessions retains this Ninth Article intact. Again it is well to notice the assumption underlying the connecting phrase "in the meantime" that "all the rights of citizens of the United States" include "the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

Hence we find that unrestricted religious freedom has been repeatedly and consistently imposed by the United States Government, as an organic article and essential condition to admission, on all the States, generally and severally, formed since 1790 from American territory; that is, on thirty-five of our forty-eight States. Who will contend that the Congress of Thirteen States or the subsequent Congresses including them, exempted themselves from the law which they enforced on other "equal States" to whom they covenanted "an equal footing" with themselves?

Thus, on the one hand, we have the States guaranteeing freedom of conscience and of worship to all within their jurisdiction, and on the other, we have Congress decreeing that it shall itself make no law prohibitive thereof. That is, religious liberty is secured, positively and negatively, in the State and national constitutions, and it is difficult to see what further security they can afford. The statement that the First Amendment was intended as a prohibition on Congress is unfounded. Ten States, led by Virginia and the enlightened persuasions of Jefferson and Madison, had already enacted religious freedom, and the insertion of the Article was construed as a rebuke to the three States which still retained religious restrictions; a rebuke which soon produced the desired effect, making freedom of worship universal. In fact all the numerous amendments proposed by the ratifying States were submitted as commendatory, not conditional. Of these Congress selected twelve for reference back to the States, which rejected two, thus adding to the Constitution the ten original amendments.

Congress has further stressed "the free exercise of religion" as an essential of our Constitution and Government. In other territorial acquisition it has everywhere followed the flag. The treaty with Russia for the cession of Alaska, ratified and proclaimed June 20, 1867, provides in Article III that:

> The [civilized] inhabitants of the ceded territory shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property and religion.

The treaty with Spain for the cession of Porto Rico, the Spanish West Indies and the Philippine Islands, ratified and proclaimed April 11, 1899, having guaranteed "the rights of ecclesiastical or civic bodies," provides in Article X: "The inhabitants of the territories over which Spain cedes her sovereignty shall be secured in the free exercise of their religion."

Thus it is clear that "the free exercise of religion," or equivalent phrase, is a formula which the United States has consistently imposed by ordinance, treaty, or compact, on all the inhabitants and governments of all the territories it possessed in the year of its Constitution's establishment, and of all it has since acquired. To contend that the uniform imposition of full religious liberty, as mandatory and essential, in every ratified treaty or compact, from the fundamental territorial ordinance of 1787 to the admission of the last Territory to Statehood in 1907, is not binding on the national Government and on every State, is to insist that the treaties, compacts and guarantees ratified by our supreme national authority, are merely scraps of paper. It is, ultimately and logically, to reduce all civic authority to nullity. The uniformity and the universality of the constitutional and treaty provisions of this land and Government, realized in the unbroken custom of the full period of our national life, preclude any law which restricts or prohibits "the free exercise of religion" (interpreting the words in a fair and rational sense), from ever becoming validly "the law of the land," and empower the proper judicial authority to pronounce such law invalid. And as this complete uniformity of national provision for full religious freedom constitutes our "privileges, rights and immunities as proved," it also supplies a clear affirmative answer to the question: Can and will the United States Supreme Court nullify a law which makes the celebration of the Mass a felony; that is, which prohibits the exercise of an essential and central act of Catholic worship? But since elaborate arguments have been published in the negative, we shall discess this question more fully in another article.

The Source of Catholic Loyalty

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

WHY are Catholics good patriots? What is the source of their patriotism? Why, to confine ourselves to our American history, has it happened that in every crisis of our national life, in spite of the calumnies of our enemies who have tried to paint us as disloyal to American ideals, have our Catholic brethren never failed to face the trials and the sacrifices which fidelity to the highest standards of patriotic duty imposed upon them?

The source and at the same time the explanation of Catholic patriotism are to be found in the fundamental principles of the Catholic Faith. Our religion is the key to these splendid manifestations.

Primarily the patriotism of the Catholic has its root in a virtue closely connected with that of religion. It springs from the virtue of piety. For, according to St. Thomas, man's indebtedness to others is to be gaged by their respective merits and by the excellence of the gifts which he received from them. It is evident that from both points of view God's claims are paramount and predominant. For in Himself and in His nature God is infinitely perfect. Moreover, He is for man the first principle of being, that is, man is indebted to Him for the great gift of existence. The Creator exercises over man absolute right of government and control. On the other hand and from a secondary, subordinate and partial point of view, our parents are the source of our existence and our country cooperates with them in preserving that existence and in enabling us to fulfil our destiny. They have a subordinate and God-delegated right to exercise their authority over us. For it is from our parents that we receive life. It is on the soil of some particular country chosen by God to be our earthly home we grow to manhood and strength. So then, after God, says the great Doctor, it is to their parents and to their country that men owe the most. As it belongs to the virtue of religion to render to God that homage and worship which is His due, so in a secondary sense and degree, it belongs to the virtue of piety to honor the authors of our existence, and our country.

Thus explained, patriotism is eminently rational and noble. The virtue goes down to the very roots of our nature. In obeying its impulses we obey God Himself. For the love we show our country is but the extension of the love which we owe to God. God is the supreme Master of our lives; it is through Him that we move and breathe and are. But He has willed that others should participate in some sense in His prerogatives and His powers. Our parents are to care for our physical life, for our development as members of the family, for our intellectual and moral growth. To the country in which He has wished that we should see the light of day, God has given those powers needed for the development of our social and civil life. And just as He demands that we love Him above all things as the Master of life and death, the Creator who rules our destinies, so has

He ordered that we love the country of our birth, the source of so many material and social blessings. That is a solemn duty which no man can shirk. We might almost call it one of strict justice. Practically, to some extent, its demands upon us are the demands of justice, for we have to compensate our native land for the benefits conferred upon us. But it is rather called the virtue of piety, for by its concept there is implied something of the conduct of the child to the mother and father who are the authors of its being.

With the Catholic patriotism is not a mere emotion, it is something nobler and higher. No doubt emotion plays a part in the great passion. And the emotion varies with the nature of the country we call our own, the character of its people, its traditions, history. For those countries which have felt the weight of sorrow and persecution, whose records are marked by years of tragic suffering and wo, their children feel the tenderest and most devoted love, something akin to the love of the strong man for the mother or the bride whose lives have been filled with unmerited agonies and sorrows. The sons of Ireland feel such a love for Erin. For others, the emotion is one of pride. The Greeks felt such a pride in Hellas, because it had fought for liberty, because it was the home of arts and eloquence, of poetry and song. That emotion the American can partially at least share today, for America stands forth as the bulwark of liberty and the champion of freedom for the oppressed and the suffering of the world. The names and the deeds of Washington and Lincoln can never fail to stir the pulse of every true-born American.

We can love the land of our birth for its beauties, its mountains and rivers, its untold wealth, its lakes and its streams. We can love it for its people, the generosity of its sons, the virtues of its pure and gracious womanhood. All these are legitimate and noble passions. When regulated by reason and faith such feelings and emotions intensify and vitalize our patriotism.

But our patriotism is founded on something more substantial and lasting than mere emotion. It is founded on the fact that as the country is the source of so many blessings to the individual, blessings which permeate his whole life and are inseparable from it, he is bound by that virtue of piety of which we spoke to give something in return. He must obey her laws, observe her Constitution, love her ideals, sacrifice his wealth, even his life for her welfare.

From the soil of the motherland the individual draws sustenance and food. Her wheat fields feed him. From her he receives the raiment that clothes him and his children. Her timber and her quarries build his home. In her schools and churches his mind and heart are trained. Her constitution protects his person and guarantees him inalienable rights in the pursuit of liberty and happiness. In the hour of danger she protects him from injustice, from danger. In all things the country is to him a second mother. In the same spirit of piety with which he honors the mother from whom he drew his physical being, he owes to the country a service of devotion.

As God delegates to the parents something of His authority over their offsprings, so he delegates to the country, in the person of its rulers, be they presidents or kings, something of His authority over the citizen. "Honor thy father and thy mother," is the great command in virtue of which God wishes us to show our respect and our love to the authors of our days. It is true in the Decalogue there is no command that directly orders us to practise the virtue of patriotism. But the obligation is involved in the Fourth Commandment.

And in the Scriptures, patriotism, both as an emotion and as a duty, is taught us by God. The chosen people were intensely patriotic. They loved the walls of Sion. Towards the Temple, which was the very center of their national life, they ever lifted their eyes. There was a deep passion, an intensity of devotion in the expression of their loyalty which to modern ears may seem strange. They boasted that no God was so near to his worshipers as their God was to them. They prayed that if ever they should forget Jerusalem their right hand should lose its cunning and their tongue cleave to the roof of their mouth. The thoughts of Jonas even when the surges of the sea lifted up their voices over his head turned to the holy Temple. The Machabees stand out for all time as the embodiment of patriotism. Our Lord Himself remembered that He was a son of Israel and as He thought of the doom soon to overwhelm the Holy City which He so tenderly loved He wept over the sorrows of His people. In a single sentence He summed up His whole teaching with regards to the duties of the Christian and the citizen. "Render to Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and to God the things that are God's." In all things He obeyed His country's laws. After Him His Apostles, though preaching doctrines so opposed to the ideals of the pagan society in which they lived, never for a moment led men to believe that they were to be emancipated from those duties that bound them to the commonwealth. With masterful eloquence St. Paul tells the first Christians that they must obey their lawful superiors: "Let every soul be subject to higher powers; but there is no power but from God; and those that are ordained of God. Therefore, he that resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist purchase to themselves damnation" (Rom. xiii: 1-2). St. Peter is equally explicit and writes, "Fear God, honor the king." And the Apostles are so insistent upon this great commandment because, as Leo XIII says, to the mind of the Christian, the very idea of public authority is something sacred and hallowed. For in it he recognizes some likeness and symbol, some faint reflection of the Divine Majesty, even when the authority is exercised by one who is unworthy.

Patriotism and duty are two words that naturally fall together. For if, as we said, patriotism usually implies emotion, the thrill of admiration for the native land, its history, its people, even for the beauties of its lakes and valleys or the majesty of its plains, it means something more substantial than this. It means respect for its laws, obedience to its constitution, the generous effort earnestly made by all its citizens for the social, moral, intellectual and material betterment of its citizens. It means a whole-hearted approval of the country's just ideals and unswerving devotion to her cause, a loyalty to her justly constituted authorities, beyond suspicion or reproach.

The source and the motive of the patriotism of the millions of Catholics throughout the country who have so magnificently responded to the call of war are to be found in their right conception of the functions of the State and Fatherland to whom in a certain sphere God has delegated something of His own power in the realization of the duties which they owe to God Himself. In respecting the State, Catholics respect God. For if the State has any power it is from God that it ultimately comes. Religion practised in the highest form, in the worship of the Creator, piety manifested towards the country where the Master of life wished that our lot should be cast and our life spent, on these our patriotism rests as on a solid basis. It is impossible that the Catholic who really deserves the name should not love his native land, should not be a patriotic American. Patriotism is but one of the manifestations of the duties which his faith imposes upon him. As it is built upon such solid foundation, it is no wonder that our patriotism has given in the present crisis such a splendid answer.

The Conscientious Objector

J. HARDING FISHER, S. J.

IN an article first published by the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, and reprinted, apparently with approval, by the New York Times in its issue for March 18, there occur several statements which, to say the least, are open to very serious misconstruction. The whole article is a confusing admixture of truth and error, but the most serious exception must be taken to the following paragraph:

> The case is simply this: That in all matters of national preservation the individual conscience must submit to the national conscience. With this fundamental principle in mind, the status of the conscientious objector is one of expediency as far as the nation is concerned. If he is needed as a soldier, he must go; if not, he may remain, but under no circumstances may he interfere with our prosecution of the war.

The "fundamental principle" laid down by the writer of the article calls for separate discussion, the present paper deals with the status of the conscientious objector.

To avoid all misunderstanding it is well to recall from the very outset the doctrine of Catholic ethics on warfare. War, according to the teaching of the Church, is not, of its very nature and necessarily illicit, on the contrary there are circumstances in which the State would seriously fail in its duty if it did not undertake it; every citizen of military age is obliged in conscience to take up arms in a just war, and, if need be, to lay down his life in defense of his country should he be commanded to do so by legitimate authority; the causes underlying a proclamation of war are so complex and the data available to the individual for forming a correct judgment as to its liceity are so slight in comparison with those possessed by the responsible heads of the country that it would be presumptuous in ordinary cases for the individual to set his judgment against the judgment of the Government, and, therefore, almost invariably in the absence of evidence of the clear injustice of the war, the individual may accept the call to the colors as justifiable and respond with a good conscience; once on the firing line he is under a strict obligation to obey orders and to do his best to reduce the fighting strength of the enemy.

Such is the undoubted attitude of the Church on war in general. On the war in which the United States is at present engaged the Catholic laity as a whole and the American Catholic Hierarchy, the official spokesmen for Catholic opinion, are agreed that it is just. The Cardinals, Archbishops and Bishops have unanimously supported the President's proclamation and urged their spiritual children, though no urging was necessary, to put their property, their strength and their lives at the disposal of the Government.

Among Catholics, therefore, as Catholics, there are no "conscientious objectors" to our war against Germany and Austria. If some Catholics should claim to be conscientious objectors, they would do so by reason of personal or racial prepossessions and prejudices, and not on the strength of Catholic doctrine. Should they object to the war on the ground that war is intrinsically illicit, they would maintain a doctrine at variance with the doctrine of the Church. Should they object to the present war on the ground that our participation in it is unjust, they would be voicing merely their own individual views, in opposition to those expressed by the ecclesiastical authorities whose function it is to voice official Catholic opinion.

Moreover, Catholics would agree with the writer of the article in the Post-Intelligencer that conscientious objectors should not be allowed to interfere in any way with our prosecution of the war, for to the right-minded person there is overwhelming evidence of the rectitude of our Government's efforts to maintain our national integrity and honor, to resist unwarranted aggression, to defend American lives, and to bring peace to a war-weary world. The strictest advocates of the supremacy of conscience would not go so far as to maintain that the State may not restrain wrong-headed individuals from actions which are a serious menace to the just welfare of our country.

To maintain, however, that "the status of the conscientious objector is one of expediency as far as the nation is concerned" is to lay down a principle not in accord with sound ethics. Great Britain has persistently refused to regard the status of the conscientious objector in the light of mere expediency, and the Congress of the United States has exempted from actual fighting members of religious sects whose creed forbids participation in warfare. In fact, the statement that the status of the conscientious objector is one of expediency as far as the nation is concerned is so obviously false that it need not be taken seriously. It sounds strikingly like the false statement that the end justifies the means. Whether or not the conscientious objector shall be forced to fight is a matter of right and wrong, which cannot be settled by the test of mere expediency.

The writer in the Post-Intelligencer says that if the conscientious objector is needed as a soldier he must go. This statement can be admitted only in a limited sense. It is true that he must, at the order of the Government, undertake non-combative service, and that he may be licitly punished for refusing this kind of co-operation with war work. Sound scholars also admit that he must, should public order require it, put on a uniform, take a place in the ranks, and expose his life to the hazards of war. But no one has any right to demand that he shall be compelled to inflict damage on the enemy if, after due consideration, he has arrived at the reasoned judgment that to do so is to co-operate in injustice. This is precisely the state of mind of the conscientious objector. He honestly believes that he would be guilty of injustice if he wounded the enemy. Under such circumstances, to wound the enemy would be a sin; for conscience is the ultimate subjective norm of morality. No amount of material gain will ever justify the commission of sin; and no power on earth is justified in demanding that a man be guilty of it.

Speculatively a distinction may be drawn between the culpably and inculpably erroneous conscience concernning the performance of civic duty, and compulsion, not justified in the latter case, might conceivably be justified in the former; but the distinction is so hard to draw in actual life that it is to a large extent impracticable. Nor does the question of national preservation, which in this country is at present purely speculative as far as the conscientious objectors are concerned, alter the essential principles at stake; not to save the whole world may sin be committed.

The application of this principle is made more difficult by the possibility that cowardice, selfishness and evasion of duty can masquerade under the guise of conscientious objection, and when there is immense need of every defense for the welfare of our country and the world, it calls for much patience and forbearance to tolerate the clear delusions of even sincere conscientious objectors. However, liberty of conscience is so priceless a good that it must be safeguarded at any cost. Moral compulsion may and should be brought to bear for the correction of erroneous views, but should this fail, there is no course left but to respect the supremacy of conscience.

The right to follow the reasoned dictates of conscience, when this involves no violation of the right of others and no injury to the community, is the inalienable and indefeasible right of every human being. The scruples of the conscientious objectors, in the present state of affairs, involve neither one nor the other, for their number is so small and the forms of non-combative service so many and so necessary, that they can easily be dispensed from actual fighting at the front. It may indeed be said, the question is at least debatable, that if a man refuses to perform one of the main duties of citizenship, he may be deprived of his rights as a citizen. But such a measure, even were it proved to be justifiable, is far from advisable. Certainly this was the attitude adopted by the British Government last summer, when the proposal to disenfranchise conscientious objectors was discussed and voted down in the House of Commons; and the Month in its issue of August, 1917, called the decision a sound one, "because it acknowledges and proclaims that the citizen has a higher duty than obedience to the State; a thoroughly Christian view which Catholics have always been ready to uphold with their lives." The general, unqualified statement, therefore, that the conscientious objector, if he is needed as a soldier, must go, calls for considerable limitation.

After the War, Peace?

J. B. CULEMANS

SECULAR papers in this country and Canada have commented in various fashions on this striking passage in Cardinal Bourne's Lenten Pastoral:

> The times through which we are passing are fraught with anxiety of every kind. It is not necessary to gaze upon the conflict of nations which afflicts the world to find matter for serious concern. At home, in our midst, there are signs of trouble and disturbance, which are only very partially revealed in the public press, but are well known to those in authority, and which portend the possibility of a grave social upheaval in the future. It is admitted on all hands that a new order of things, new social conditions, new relations between the different sections in which society is divided, will arise as a consequence of the destruction of the formerly existing situation.

Of all the countries at war perhaps none has ever gone through an experience so nearly similar to the present one as England. She had poured out her money and her man-power in the Napoleonic wars as she is doing now, and thinking Britons, acquainted with the conditions of their country at the end of that titanic struggle, are viewing the future with anxiety. After the close of the bloody contest with imperial France there was unparalleled distress among the laboring classes in the English mining and manufacturing districts. The price of labor diminished while the price of food increased. So wretched was the condition of the poor that there were constant insurrections, especially in the large towns. In the stagnation of business which followed peace, thousands could find no work at all. The disbanding of the immense armies that had been necessary to combat Napoleon threw out of employ hundreds of thousands of men who became vagabonds, beggars and paupers. The agricultural classes did not suffer so much as operatives in the mills, since they got a high price for their grain; but the more remunerative agriculture became to the landlords, the more miserable were those laborers who paid all they could earn to save themselves from starvation. In addition to the high price which the people paid for bread, there were heavy taxes on everything imported, on everything consumed, on the necessities and conveniences of life as well as on its luxuries. Money had to be raised to pay interest upon the national debt and to provide for the support of the Government. Then too there were pensions, sinecures and general extravagance. In the poverty which enormous taxes and low wages together produced, there were not only degradation and squalid misery in England, but violence and crime.

These abuses and distresses, culminating under George IV, led finally to the Reform Bill of 1832 under William IV. They were further righted under the reign of Victoria, but it took some of the ablest statesmen of England, like Peel, Disraeli and Gladstone to accomplish this end, and half a century of political struggles and popular uprisings. Sir Robert Peel's fame rests principally on his success in repealing the Corn Laws and in reorganizing the national finances which were in a state of absolute chaos. He reduced the interest on consols, or the consolidated government debt, thus reducing the taxes; he further eased the burden of the worker by limiting the hours of labor in the factories while the working time of children under thirteen years was set at six and one-half hours, provision being made at the same time for their instruction. Others continued his work, forced by circumstances to overturn many hoary theories and to upset many vested privileges.

This historical background to the arduous struggle for emancipation has produced among the English masses a vivid class-consciousness pitched to a high key during the present war. The staid London Times not many weeks ago, created a mild panic by calling attention to these sub-surface currents. The case is perhaps best put in the words of the conservative Liverpool Catholic Times:

> The war has been a bitter lesson to the multitude of the toiling people; they no longer regard the old rulers nor respect the old social order. They have paid in blood and hunger for the diplomatic blunderings of the governing classes who let the country drift into war. They have seen the traditional ways of doing or not doing things swept away by the necessities of a struggle that could not be carried on except by increased State control of commerce, industry and labor. They have been angered by the conscription of life and not of wealth. A new world has gradually dawned upon their eyes, and now they see visions of a future in which they can share more fairly and more fully in the riches so largely the product of their toil. They will never consent to go back to the conditions of the past.

It were a serious mistake to see in this only a vague yearning after Utopia. There is an undisguised demand for better conditions at whatever cost, an uncompromising insistence upon new standards. The British Labor party has put these demands in the form of a clear-cut program, and with the united strength of the nation's organized workers behind it is determined to carry it out.

It is becoming increasingly evident that the really big and permanent results of the war will be social rather than political. They will affect living rather than governing. As far as present indications go the forms of government will largely remain the same, since even America professes unwillingness to impose its own form of government upon other nations. But the functions of government will change considerably. The citizens who live by their daily work form by far the largest body of the population. They are not only organized but they have the vote besides. And what is even more important, they are backed by the driving power of new ideals that seem nearer of accomplishment than ever before. We can form a fairly accurate estimate of the new conditions from these demands of the British Labor party's program: In the very first place there must be a universal minimum wage fixed by law for the workers of all classes, a blow at the very root of poverty and want. Besides, the Government must take direct control of industry. What has been done during the war, and successfully, can and should be done after the war. Artificial inflation of the price of necessities like food and coal, that has gone to make up enormous individual fortunes, shall no longer be countenanced. There is no more need for extensive fluctuation in the price of fuel than there is in the price of railroad tickets. Finally, there must be a revolution in the national finances to take care of the war debt: large fortunes must be taxed much more heavily than they have been, and any surplus over and above what is needed for family maintenance, shall be taken by the State to be used for the common good, for educational and artistic purposes, for public works, parks, etc. These demands are no longer looked upon as the ravings of wild populism. Granted that they are of revolutionary extent, circumstances have shown that their concrete realization is within easy grasp. In England economic reforms have been largely effected by continued agitation, by appeals to reason and intelligence, and not as a rule by extreme violence and bloodshed.

In France infuriated mobs have been successful time and again in overturning governments and thrones and in reshaping the Constitution and the laws of the country. Russia has but recently presented the same spectacle. Little is known about the true internal situation in Germany and Austria, and whatever information is vouchsafed us is so contradictory as to offer no basis for sound inference. We have just recently entered the war and scarcely begun to feel its full effect. Capital and labor have failed, however, to come to a complete understanding. Numerous disclosures of excessive profits in government supplies as well as in the necessaries of life have set many sensibilities on edge. Where profits were greatest, wages were sometimes lowest. At the recent hearing of the packers before Judge Alschuler in Chicago, one witness testified that her husband, the last week of his life, worked eighty hours and received $23. Before that the highest wage he received was $10. At the same hearing, Mr. Morris, of Morris & Co., when asked whether he knew that the cost of living in Chicago had gone up 31 per cent, unblushingly answered he did not know. He also professed ignorance of the fact that the price of food was higher! In another field government investigations show that 1 per cent of railroad workers receive only $30 a month, that 9 per cent receive only $60. Examples could be multiplied, all adding new significance to the words of Cardinal Bourne.

The upheaval he fears has certain well-defined and obvious causes: insufficient wages in many industries; the high cost of all necessaries of life; the immense private fortunes built up by this twofold social injustice. A further complication will set in with the return from European battlefields of hundreds of thousands of able and disabled men all entitled to a living: they will flood the labor market, and greatly intensify the struggle for existence. This struggle may easily take a radical turn.

Some would sense danger in the fact that by conceding too much to the toiler, the rights of the capitalist will be minimized or overlooked altogether. In our American society with its intense individualism, the rights of the capitalist and his privileges too have been always respected as a matter of course. They have been looked upon too frequently as involving no correlative duties, beyond the doling out of charity through highly paid "welfare workers." The laborer wants none of these but insists on decent wages.

Whether after the war there shall be peace is a question that will not be settled at the conference table where the treaties are signed. On that day it will just begin to become acute, unless its inherent dangers can be forestalled by timely foresight, and just, wise and far-reaching measures, the first of which should be a drastic minimum-wage law.

War-Time Notes About Archbishop Hughes

THOMAS F. MEEHAN

THE recent anti-Catholic calumny that attributed to President Lincoln the assertion

> I have the proof that Archbishop Hughes whom I had sent to Rome that he might urge the Pope to induce the Roman Catholics of the North, at least to be true to their oaths of allegiance, and whom I thanked publicly, when under the impression he had acted honestly according to the promise he had given me, is the very man who advised the Pope to recognize the legitimacy of the Southern Confederacy and put the weight of his tiara in the balance against us in favor of our enemies.

carried its own refutation, but it also accentuates the fact that the present generation knows very little of the details of the career of New York's first Archbishop. It is only a few months ago that the text was published of the instructions he received when he set out on the diplomatic mission to France, entrusted to him by President Lincoln and Secretary Seward. To this project he added a visit to the Pope and afterwards to Ireland, also in the interest of the cause of the Union. In his reports to Secretary Seward Archbishop Hughes notes that Mr. Dayton, who was then our Minister to France, received him rather coldly. Not having been taken into the confidence of the Washington authorities as to the Archbishop's confidential mission, Dayton tried to hamper his efforts to obtain an interview with the Emperor Napoleon. This interview, however, the Archbishop brought about most satisfactorily on December 24, 1861. Three days later he wrote to Secretary Seward:

> I owe my introduction to the Emperor not to any kind encouragement or patronage of our people on this side but to determination that even the "cold shoulder" should not prevent me from a purpose which I had entertained; so I wrote to him as one man would write to another, in a polite and brief note to the effect: "Sir, I wish to have the honor of a conversation with you."

It was the very critical time of the "Trent affair," and the Archbishop in Paris and Thurlow Weed, his fellow-delegate abroad, in London, helped to avert an international crash. Then the Archbishop went to Rome, whence he reports to Secretary Seward, on February 21, 1862:

> I have had a most cordial and flattering reception in this capital among the civil and ecclesiastical magnates from the Pope downward. The Holy Father has been particularly kind. He and Antonelli both speak of you with kind remembrance and with great respect. . .
> The object which I hope to accomplish if I went to Spain can be as well accomplished here in Rome, and I shall see to it, with or without further instructions, for I consider Spain has the deepest interest in supporting the United States as they were, and as in a short time I hope to see them again.

In another letter to Mr. Seward written from Rome, on March 1, 1862, he says:

> You will hardly be surprised to learn that, on my arrival here I found communications from some of my Episcopal brethren not precisely censuring me, but yet complaining of my acceptance of any commission from the Government of our country, on the ground that it was, or might be, offensive or injurious to some of our Catholic brethren placed in circumstances of great embarrassment. I explained the whole matter to the Holy Father and to Cardinals Antonelli and Barnabo. I am happy to say that they all approved of my conduct, and instead of censuring me showed a disposition to confer additional honors.

Writing again to Mr. Seward, he informs him:

> A Roman gentleman told me a few days ago that the Southern Catholics who happened to be here hold me responsible for having prevented France and England from coming to the aid and support of their cause. My answer was, "I hope the accusation is true."

Early in July, the Archbishop went from Rome to England and thence to Ireland, where he preached at the laying of the corner-stone of the new Catholic University, on July 20. A brief tour of the country was a triumphal success. He reached New York on August 12, his return being celebrated as a civic fete. A week later he went to Washington.

> I arrived on Thursday evening, he says, describing this official visit, saw Mr. Seward and had a brief conversation with him. He invited me to dinner the next day. I reminded him that it was Friday, and not a good day for a banquet.

He said: "Never mind; I shall see that you will be provided for." He invited his company to meet me, secretaries, generals and other distinguished gentlemen and to my astonishment, there was not a particle of meat on the table for any one. This was in compliment to myself, and in fact what I consider the most delicate compliment I have ever received.

In recognition of the Archbishop's services on this mission abroad an official intimation was conveyed to the Holy See by the then United States Minister to Rome, Mr. Randall, that, unable to offer him a reward that he could accept, the President would feel particular gratification in any honors the Pope might have it in his power to confer upon him.

During the acute anti-slavery agitation before the war Cassius M. Clay wanted Archbishop Hughes to help the Republican party in politics. "I pray you," Clay wrote, "to change your alliances. Whilst we are not the advocates of 'Religion and State' we are the fast friends of religious freedom," and then he went on to express his "astonishment that our friendly and essentially unchanged feelings are not reciprocated by the Catholic Church."

In answer to this assumption that he had the management of the political consciences of his flock, Archbishop Hughes replied from New York, on February 6, 1858:

> My own principles are that the American people are able, in their own way, to manage their affairs of State without any guidance or instruction towards any class or religious denomination, by either priests or parsons. . .
> As for myself, I never influenced a human being, Catholic or Protestant, as to the party to which he might think proper to attach himself in his capacity of a voting citizen. I never voted but once in my life, and that vote was cast nearly thirty years ago in favor of your illustrious namesake, and I believe relative, "Harry of the West." He was, in my estimation, a statesman as well as an orator, and I voted the more readily because my congregation were in the main opposed to him, and some of them had almost threatened me on account of my good opinion of him as a man much calumniated, but of whom as a statesman and orator, his country might well be proud.
> You can easily perceive by all this that the Catholics vote as individuals in the proper exercise of their franchise; but without any direction from their clergy, so far at least as has ever come under my knowledge, and certainly so far as the clergy under my own jurisdiction is concerned.

When the war broke out the Archbishop had his own ideas about chaplains and nurses. To the Archbishop of Baltimore he wrote, on May 9, 1861:

> The Superior of the Jesuits here called on me more than a week ago to state that their Society would be prepared to furnish for the spiritual necessities of the army, North and South, as many as ten chaplains, speaking all the civilized languages of Europe or America. I heard him, but did not make any reply. For myself, I have sent but one chaplain with the Sixty-ninth regiment. . .
> There is also another question growing up, and it is about nurses for the sick and wounded. Our Sisters of Mercy have volunteered after the example of their sisters toiling in the Crimean war. I have signified to them not harshly that they had better mind their own affairs until their services are needed. I am now informed, indirectly, that the Sisters of Charity in this diocese would be willing to volunteer a force of from fifty to one hundred nurses. To this proposition I have strong objections. They have as much on hand as they can accomplish. Besides it would seem to me natural and proper that the Sisters of Charity at Emmitsburg should occupy the very honorable post of nursing the sick and wounded.

In time, of course, the evolution of the war forced a change in these opinions, and on October 21, 1861, President Lincoln wrote to Archbishop Hughes from Washington:

> I find no law authorizing the appointment of chaplains for our hospitals; and yet the services of chaplains are more needed, perhaps, in the hospitals than with the healthy soldiers in the field. With this view, I have given a sort of quasi appointment (a copy of which I enclose) to each of three Protestant ministers who have accepted and entered upon the duties.
> If you perceive no objection, I will thank you to give me the name or names, of one or more suitable persons of the Catholic Church to whom I may with propriety tender the same service.
> Many thanks for your kind and judicious letters to Gov. Seward, and which he regularly allows me the pleasure and profit of perusing.

The two histories, by John R. Hassard and Lawrence Kehoe, that record these and the many other interesting incidents of the career of this great prelate unfortunately have long been out of print. The copies still available in libraries would provide most instructive lessons of conduct just at present for all classes of patriotic citizens.

History Repeating Itself

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Those engaged in historical research happen upon interesting incidents of history repeating itself and sometimes hark back to the fruitful period of the Middle Ages to find the genesis of some present-day events. For instance, one finds that this year is the eight hundredth centenary of the forming of the Knights Templars of Jerusalem who had for their main object the laudable aim of reclaiming the Holy land to the Faith and were the first organization of pious laymen in the history of Christendom to defend womankind from barbarous attack. Today, in France the very country where the organization had its being in the Middle Ages there is the interesting coincidence of history repeating itself. The Knights of Columbus, which is only another name for Knights Templars, are achieving on a more modern scale the same deeds that made the early Order famous in the pages of history. In the same provinces in France where Godfrey de Bouillon and Raymond gathered their knights and pilgrims for the crusades for the defense of faith and chivalry, we find today the Catholic knights from all corners of the world gathered, one might say, in a revival of the deeds of the ancient soldiers. Instead of journeying to Jerusalem we find these modern knights attacking the massed hordes of Germans only a few miles away. As of old the battle cry is "Defend the Faith." Throughout the assembled camps we read of the great deeds done by these modern knights of chivalry; they are succoring the desolated women and children of the country; they are healing the sick and wounded; above all, they are safeguarding the Faith in every conflict. Is there any more interesting coincidence of history repeating itself than this?

Lincoln and Good Friday

Since there has been some malignant insinuations upon Lincoln's attitude to Catholics, and a recent issue of AMERICA has fittingly reprehended them, surely the repetition of an incident of Lincoln's last Good Friday will be welcomed to your readers, even though the relation of the incident may be found in the Ave Maria of February 2. Lincoln's phrase, "many of our best people," is doubtless a reference to his Catholic fellow-citizens. This bit of history is given by Major J. B. Merwin of Middlefield, Conn., and he confirmed the story for the editor of the Ave Maria in these words:

> I knew Lincoln from 1852 on to the day of his assassination. On that day I dined with him. After the Cabinet meeting, Lincoln locked the doors and ordered our dinner brought up. We ate dinner, and he read over the paper he had written on using the colored troops for digging the Panama Canal. One door was not locked. Mrs. Lincoln came in and said: "Abe, the Ford's Theatre people have tendered us a box for this eve, and I have accepted it. The Grants are going with us, and I do not want you to make any other engagement." Mr. Lincoln said in his pathetic pleading, plaintive way: "Why, Mary, I don't think we ought to go to the theater tonight. You know it is Good Friday, a sacred day to many of our best people." She replied that she did not know or think of that, and added: "I have accepted the invitation, and the Grants are going with us. It will be announced in the evening papers." Then the good man spoke up again, more pleading and plaintive: "I do not think we ought to go to the theater tonight; Good Friday is a religious day with a great many of our best people." She replied: "We are going, and I want you to dismiss this man and make no other engagement."

This touching protest of the great man against a bit of social conduct which might offend his Catholic fellow-citizens deserves a place among Lincoln memorabilia. There are others like it all along the pathways of his notable life, from his early youth when he made a set of chairs for the missionary Father St. Cyr, who set up an improvised altar in the Lincoln home, to one of the last utterances of the great President, when, in alluding to the perpetuity of our country, he referred to the Church as "the greater institution," in this sentence: "Of this nation it can be said, as it has been said of the only greater institution in the world, 'the gates of hell shall not prevail against it.'" Mr. Charles Phillips deserves a vote of thanks for gathering these memorabilia in the paper above mentioned.

A Catholic Daily Paper

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The question of a Catholic daily continues to assert itself in your columns. Almost every one with whom the writer has ever discussed this subject believes that it will take a great amount of money to maintain a daily press. After several years' experience as editor of a Catholic paper that is self-supporting in a vast field where the Catholic population is sparse and the chance for reaching more than one diocese almost negligible, I think I ought to be in a position to know exactly what it costs to maintain a newspaper under difficulties. All around me, in this sparsely-settled State, I find little dailies, sometimes in cities that do not have even 5,000 population. They manage to make both ends meet. Why cannot the Catholics do the same with a string of small daily newspapers stretching across the Continent?

It will not be possible, in my estimation, to finance papers that can enter the field in competition with the great secular dailies of our larger cities. To establish such a paper would cost a million dollars. In Colorado, a few years ago, a certain corporation spent $700,000 trying to build up one of these organs, then gave it up as an impossible task.

But it is not impossible to start a string of small dailies dealing mainly with Catholic news and carrying a limited telegraphic service of secular news. Both the Associated and the United Press furnish what is known as a "pony service," giving in brief form the important news of the day. As the Associated Press is somewhat of a monopoly, it could be secured in only a few cities; but the United Press service could be obtained everywhere, and we all must admit that it is well worth while. There is enough Catholic local news happening everywhere to give the necessary local touch to our little dailies. The large secular papers miss nine-tenths of the actual news occurring in Catholic circles.

If we established a Catholic "boiler-plate service" to handle national Catholic news and opinions, and furnished enough of it at a moderate rate to the papers that care for about three pages a day, allowing them to set up a page of news themselves daily, papers could be furnished to the subscribers for $3.00 a year at the most. The problem of getting advertising on a Catholic paper is not any more intricate than on any other publication. A paper that can show a circulation of more than 2,500 a day ought to be made a paying proposition, except in the very large cities. But 10,000 a day ought to be enough circulation there to make the paper pay. If it cannot, something is wrong with its business management. In a city the size of Denver, I am sure that 2,500 circulation a day would be sufficient. A large number of Colorado dailies have no more.

The live-stock industry all over the West has its daily press. These papers usually are very successful from a business standpoint. They have good circulations and get advertising results, but they do not reach nearly as many readers as the great daily journals issued in the same towns. They can get plenty of good farming articles in plate-form, and often set up only about a page of type a day. By this system, they not only pay their way but make money.

The average Catholic diocesan weekly is now $2.00. With proper pulpit-support and concentrated action which should emanate officially from the Board of Archbishops, the diocesan sheet can be made a daily at $3.00. These dailies will not compete with the secular press, but be an auxiliary to it. We do not want to compete with the secular press to the extent that we will make them our enemies. No Catholic paper, I know from experience, can be a success from a subscription standpoint without pulpit-support. In Colorado, our paper reaches nearly all the people in those parishes where the priest speaks about it occasionally from the pulpit, and it reaches only a few of the people where the priest is indifferent. The whole question of a daily press, in my humble opinion, based on actual experience, lies with the clergy. It should not take more than $10,000 or $15,000 to start a Catholic daily, if the plan I suggest is followed.

"Old Hickory" and Catholics

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The article "Irish, Not Catholic," by Thomas F. Meehan, in your issue of March 23, is an admirable contribution to the early history of our republic. Unfortunately, however, such articles are read by but a small percentage of the people in whose interest they are painstakingly prepared and published. The rot and rottenness appearing in the daily papers, the monthlies, and the "movies" of the land are more welcome to many, especially the enlightened young people, belonging to "the household of the Faith," than are the facts of history which should be remembered and handed down for the instruction and edification of coming generations.

On reading Mr. Meehan's article I turned to a copy of the "Biography of Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, Formerly Major General in the Army of the United States," published in New York in 1833, and read as follows:

> Another incident, which beautifully illustrates the devoted and patriotic feeling of the females of Louisiana in that trying period (the battle of New Orleans) we cannot persuade ourselves to withhold. Many of the citizens of Louisiana profess the Catholic religion. It is well known that those of that Faith dedicate almost every day in the year to the honor of some holy person, who has, by a life of piety and charity, merited the title of a saint. This distinction is not confined to sex; and the names of women, as well as men, are placed in the calendar, and claim particular reverence on the day which is consecrated to them.
> In the City of New Orleans is a convent, in which a number of respectable ladies have dedicated their lives to the practice of piety, to the education of poor children of their own sex, and to works of charity. This pious sisterhood were awakened from their rest, or disturbed in their holy vigils, before dawn of the 8th of January, by the roar of cannon and volleys of musketry. The calendar, which pointed out the prayers of the day, was hastily opened, and indicated the auspicious name of St. Victoria. They hailed the omen, and, prostrate on the pavement which "holy knees have worn" implored the God of battles to nerve the arm of their protectors, and turn the tide of battle against the invaders of their country.

Another page in the same volume tells how General Jackson on January 8, 1828, led a commemorative procession called by the legislature of Louisiana at New Orleans:

> The procession was then formed, the General on foot, and after moving through the principal streets in the city reached the government-house, where the Governor introduced him. From the legislature he proceeded to review the troops at the invitation of the Governor. The procession was again formed, and the General, attended by the Governor and the legislature, repaired to the Catholic Church, where religious exercises were performed. When the ceremonies were terminated, the General was conducted by the Committee to the house prepared for his residence.
> The tables occupied two rooms of vast dimensions, at which at least two hundred persons sat down. Mr. Marigny was chosen president of the day. General Jackson was placed on his right, Governor Houston, of Tennessee, on his left, and the venerable Father Antonio, and the Abbé Momie, sat on the General's left. Generals Carroll and Hands also sat in the vicinity of the president.

Historical reminders like the foregoing may serve to show that the benighted un-American bigots who in Florida, New Jersey, Arizona, and elsewhere, seek to defame and retard the spread of the Catholic religion are enemies of the God-fearing spirit and fame of "Old Hickory."

The Celt in America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his recent article on "The Mission of the Celt in America," Dr. Ryan makes some statements with which many of his first cousins will not agree. He is mistaken in thinking that wealth and high station are detrimental to the idealism and spiritual mission of the Celt in America or in his homeland. On the contrary during the days of her greatest prosperity, from the sixth to the ninth century, Ireland became one universal monastery and some of her greatest saints and idealists—Brigit, Columbkille, King Cormac, Celestinus, Angus the Culdee, and others, were princes brought up in luxury and acquainted with the highest thought and culture of contemporary Europe. It is a colossal mistake to think, as many Irish-Americans are inclined to think, that the lowly status of the Irish in America as "hewers of wood and drawers of water" has been a help rather than a hindrance to the spread of Catholicism in America. The contrary is true. Were the Irish a self-governing people, speaking their native language, with their ambassadors at all the world's capitals, America would long since have been converted to the Catholic Faith. The curse of the Irish immigrant was that he spoke English and was half-Anglicized before he came to America. He was taught to look upon his people as an inferior race, a conviction which the Gaelic and Sinn Fein movements have eradicated from Irish life today, but which is still noticeable in the mental make-up of the average Irish-American.

The fault of the Irish in America has been that their leaders have not appealed more to the so-called "pagan society," gone into it and leavened it by their idealism and spirituality. What were Columbanus, Coleman and Don Scotus but native Irish princes, the elite of the elite, and yet they converted the greater part of Romanized Europe and superimposed the culture of Christian Ireland on that of imperial Rome. They made their appeal not to the ignorant masses but to the kings, emperors and intellectual leaders, and the masses soon followed the lead of their masters. St. Patrick adopted the same policy towards the native aristocracy of the pagan Irish and Columbkille in Scotland followed his master's example.

An Austrian nobleman is insulted if you ask him whether he is a Protestant. To be anything else but Catholic is unthinkable in the society in which he moves. An Irish-American millionaire who occupies a prominent place in the social register cards and writes a belated account of his social activities in the American "Who's Who," is often ashamed to admit that he is a member of the Catholic persuasion. Why? Because he is an upstart; he is ignorant of the genius and material and moral greatness of his Celtic forefathers. The Irish princess, Grainne Naile, standing proudly before Queen Elizabeth and spurning her paltry titles because she was a princess among her own people, should be typical of the attitude of the Celtic race towards American society. The Irish have always occupied in Europe and in the world today a place similar to that occupied by the Greeks among the ancient nations, the repository of art, idealism and culture. Those who crawl on all fours to gain an entrée into "society" are not Irish and their influence can never interfere with the spread of Catholic ideals, one way or the other. The more Irishmen acquire wealth, influence and social station in America the better, provided they retain their distinctive individuality and Irishism, and, thanks be to God, the best of our race in America have done that. Moreover I contend there is more idealism in American life today than there is in any other country in the world. A people who willingly sacrifice their sons on the battle-fields of France for abstract principles must indeed have ideals of a very high order. The attitude of the American "pagan" highbrow towards the Catholic Church proves that no other people are more open-minded, liberal and impartial than the native American "aristocracy" to the idealism and culture of the Catholic Church. If we look at the lists of converts to Catholicism in America, we find the best and most influential of them come from the so-called "first families," the elite of the land, mentally and socially.

Besides no one is treated with higher respect or gets a warmer place in the hearts of the American people than the Irishman of good family whose culture and mentality are distinctively and purely Irish. The reception given to Padriac Pearse, Mrs. Sheehy-Skeffington, and Dr. Hyde is surely sufficient proof of that. The small number of upstarts who try to identify themselves with high "society" in America, and in doing so lose their faith and national characteristics, are treated by the better-informed and higher class of the American people as "upstarts" and "bounders." They are looked on with contempt. It is not, then, a question of wealth and social station; it is a question of blood and culture. Where these are lacking, nothing can be expected. The Irish Celt need never fear contact with true American life and culture. Let him enter it and get to the top, and American life will be all the better for him. Only a few years ago the savants of Europe such as Meyer, Thurneyson, De Jubainville and Loth were frequent guests in the homes of the Irish people. Why? Because Irish life had once again found its way into the main current of European thought. O'Donovan and Hyde and Yeats and MacDonough and Pearse had awakened the Celt from the nightmare of Anglicization and shown Irishmen their place in the social register of intellectual world-aristocracy. And so it is in American social life today. It is not the social world of the upstart "four-hundred" money-lenders and bankers and hangers-on of the British garrison in America that the intellectual leaders of the Irish race should aim at conquering; rather they must gain the hearts and the ears of those Americans whose forefathers wrote the American Constitution, and followed Washington into Valley Forge, and today represent the true soul and spirit of modern America. The Celts are a race of gentlemen and need never fear to place themselves on absolute equality with the best products that American life can show. The combination of modern Americanism with the grace, charm and innate culture of the Irish Celt is the finest product of American life today and to get that you must go among the real aristocracy of America.

Why Mothers Weep

THE Saturday afternoon crowd whirled about them in the Grand Central Station, unnoted by the boy in khaki and his mother. In that moment, she saw all her world in his eyes, and he in hers; and for both it was a world seen through a haze and a blur. The sight is common in these days of war when, with a brave and touching hypocrisy, mothers and sisters and sweethearts "send the boy away with a smile," and then go home with hearts whose aching cannot be assuaged by tears. The cynic smiles, too, and the lip-service patriot sneers. But the average American is apt to clench his fists and utter words which in no sense can be construed as a prayer for the prosperity of the Hohenzollerns.

For there is the source of the suffering that makes all the world dark for many a gentle heart. We know perfectly well why we have been asked to take our young men from their peaceful avocations in the fields, the counting-house, the schools and the professions, put an unaccustomed gun in their hands, and send them 3,000 miles across the sea. Whatever causes may have been at work in Europe, the United States furthered none of them. Only a lunatic can assert that our training camps are the result of a policy which Washington had been panting to put in effect. We did not wish to fight; Europe's quarrel, we thought, was none of our own, and we were a people so wedded to peace, that we bore ourselves as if war were, for us, an impossibility. As the days of conflict went on, we looked at the bloody fields of Europe, fertile with wo, and prayed that the call to arms might never be sounded in this country. Wrong, injury and insult, we passed over in patient silence, until the sneer that we were too craven to fight seemed to have a basis in sober truth. But the climax was inevitable, and it came in the senseless provocations of a militaristic Germany, faithful in all points to the blood-and-iron policy of its founder, Bismarck. That climax forced a choice. One was to allow the United States to become, through an ignoble peace, a vassal of Germany. The other was to avenge our peace and dignity, not by treachery, fraud and dishonor, but by the sword, vigorously wielded in a righteous war.

We made the choice, but we cannot forget that it was made reluctantly. It was a choice to which we were driven. We know why the hearts of mothers at home must bleed, and why our young men must face death in France. There is much excuse for the bitterness of the average citizen, but hard words break no bones, and little good comes from a denunciation of German militarism and insolence, that is purely verbal. If we cannot go to the front, it is always possible to do our part at home. There is work for all. If we have money, we can give of our wealth to every agency that is striving to make life easier for the country's defenders at sea and in France. The various committees for hospital service, for the care of the orphan, for recreation in the camps at home, and for the relief of needs that will become more pressing with our larger participation in the war, call for loyal support. Above all, we can do very much to bring the day of victorious peace nearer, by fervent prayer, imploring the blessing of Almighty God upon our beloved country, in the great conflict in which she is now engaged.

Can Man be a Criminal?

ON Easter Sunday morning, a New York gambler enticed a fellow-gambler into the hallway of an apartment house, and there murdered him. On the same day, a lady who, in the inscrutable designs of Providence, represents the imperial State of Montana in the lower House, published an article in a New York newspaper, in which the responsibility for this shocking crime is attributed not to the murderer, but to the State and City of New York. "Society," wrote the lady, with a fine disregard for fact and common-sense, "is responsible for the existence of criminals."

The District Attorney, however, is of a different opinion. According to his investigations, the murderer has always lived in communities which by a consent fairly common are rated as civilized. The man's early environment was favorable. He is passably well-educated. His parents were persons of respectable station in life, and they did all that they could to instruct the boy in his religious duties. It cannot be contended that the young man was forced into a career of law-breaking. His home was good, and he had a generous chance to make himself a useful member of society. Against the dictate of every force that had sought to mold his life, he deliberately chose a career of crime and violence. When a companion threatened to turn State's evidence, he mapped out a plan of murder as coolly as an honest business man might study a project to increase his next year's profits. Far from belonging to a low order of intelligence, he had been clever enough to outwit the authorities for a number of years. As the facts disclose, when he murdered his victim, he knew what he was doing, that it was a crime against society, an act abhorred of God and man. Yet, with studied deliberation, he carried his plan into effect.

Neither the parents of this man, his synagogue, his school, nor the State, failed in any duty in his regard. On the contrary, each of these factors did all that could be reasonably expected to make him a good and useful citizen. But, according to the lady from Montana, "Society is responsible for the existence of criminals." That this dogma should be put forth, at a time when our lawmakers are beginning to see the necessity of decreeing the death penalty, if the spy system is to be brought to an end in this country, may serve to show how lasting was the impression made upon shallow minds by the absurdities which, in times of peace, some men, otherwise mentally sound, allowed themselves to utter. One of the blessings of war is found in the short shrift which it allots "free speech," birth-control, the campaign against capital punishment, and other social shams. In many instances, as psychologists and moralists have long recognized, the effort to arraign the State and acquit the criminal, especially if he be a murderer, or a gross offender against public decorum, is the outcome of a morbid and dangerous sentimentality. In others, to pass over the cases of plain ignorance, it springs from a love of notoriety, or from a desire to justify libertinism by denying responsibility. But nothing is so fatal to sentimentality and fine-spun theory, particularly that theory which strives to do away with the actuality of sin, as hard fact.

A Word from the Editors

WHEN "Constant Reader" fills a page with burning, winged words aimed at the editors of AMERICA, those patient men bow their diminished heads and wait until the storm passes. "Constant Reader" has just cause for complaint; his copy of AMERICA comes most irregularly. According to the calendar, mid-April is now in flower, yet he has not seen AMERICA for March 23. But the issue for March 30 is in his hands, and it was preceded by the issues, arranged in the order of their delivery by the postman, for March 9, March 2, and February 23. So far as he is concerned, the issue for March 16 does not exist, or it may be wandering through New England, although addressed to a city in California. "Constant Reader" gives notice that he will hold the editors to a strict accountability, unless "something is done."

"Something" has been done, and the editors wish they could do more, to insure a prompt delivery of AMERICA. It is just possible that subscribers whose experiences have been similar to those of "Constant Reader" can do more by sending a written complaint to the local postmaster, and, if the fault continues, to the chairman of the Congressional Committee on Post-Offices. No doubt, conditions brought about by the war must be taken into account. Labor of a suitable kind is scarce, and the railroads are congested. Both these facts directly affect the post-office department. But when a letter, electing one of AMERICA's editors to life-membership in the I. W. W., consumed seven whole days in its travels from Denver, and a communication, bearing a perfectly good three-cent stamp, tarried eighty-six hours en route from New Orleans, and when magazines are either delivered a month late or not at all, it is clear that the postal service has fallen far below the excellence attained shortly before the Mexican war.

The editors and publishers have never failed to issue AMERICA at the appointed time, and feel, therefore, that for the non-delivery of the magazine they cannot be held at fault. They ask all subscribers to wait for a few days before sending notice that AMERICA has not been received, and in case of repeated fault to lodge a vigorous complaint with the proper authorities.

Unjust Profiteering

IT has been often asserted that we are a selfish people, unwilling to submit to the restraints which duty or necessity imposes, and restless under the trammels of the law. The crisis through which we are passing is proving every day that the charge on the whole is unfounded. With a readiness and an obedience which many perhaps did not suspect, the country has faced with courage and cheerfulness the ordeals and the sacrifices imposed upon it. Private interests have been merged in the generous effort to obtain the common good. That is the very essence of patriotism. Jealous as we are of our privileges and little disposed to see them infringed by statute or limited by regulations, we have submitted to restrictions keenly felt no doubt, but cheerfully borne. Little disposed to let the Government interfere in the ordinary transactions of life, we have submitted to those regulations which it deemed necessary for the economic welfare of the nation. The war is teaching us all how to obey.

There have been exceptions to the general rule, cases when, heedless of others, individuals and corporations have looked to their own selfish ends. Some do not know how to submit to sacrifice or to comply with the law. In the case of those whose selfishness and disregard of authority are apt to cause suffering to others such conduct is unmanly and unjust. It is gratifying to note that the Government does not seem inclined to tolerate it. Only a few days ago, the Chairman of the Food Board, John Mitchell, and the Federal Food Administrator, Arthur Williams, in a report sent to United States Food Administrator Herbert Hoover, recommended that one of the largest packing and produce firms in the country be prohibited from buying or selling eggs from its New York branch for the period of thirty days; that the company be obliged to give to the Red Cross the $6,000 made by excess charges on eight carloads of eggs, and that the brokers who acted for the firm be also suspended from doing any egg business in New York for the period of thirty days.

It is evident that the Government is bent on suppressing as far as lies in its power all unlawful profiteering in food supplies. In doing so the Government is performing one of its noblest duties. No other action on its part will so heartily recommend itself to the general public, for it is protecting those most in need of it, the poor. In such unlawful dealings as the United States officials single out for penalty and fine, the poor are the inevitable victims and the greatest sufferers. It is upon them that the injustice most heavily weighs. The official report, in which the conduct of the firms is so severely blamed, states that the fault of the individuals concerned lay in the fact that they did not seem to understand that "especially in a time of national crisis such as the present, directions of the United States Government are for the purpose of being obeyed, and not lightly disregarded at the convenience of any dealer who sees fit to disregard them." If such firms fail to realize that Government regulations must be obeyed, the Government itself must make them and all such violators of the law realize that "No dealer, be he large or be he small, can, for the sake of personal gain, disregard those regulations of the Government, which are made solely in the interest of all the people."

A Texas Parson

AS exemplifying a curious phase of the Protestant clerical mind, the appended letter from a Presbyterian clergyman, dwelling in Sherman, Texas, is worthy of preservation. After misdirecting his communication, and addressing the business manager as "Dear Miss," the worthy man proceeds:

> I have yours of recent date advising that a Sherman friend has interested himself in my becoming a subscriber for the America, the national Catholic weekly paper.
> I have to advise you that I will greatly appreciate it if you will advise my Sherman friend that I consider it not only a reflection on my intelligence but an insult as well, when anyone wishes to inform me of anything I should know concerning the Catholic church. I know all I wish to know about the Catholic church and do not care for any of its literature, either that which is sureptitiously [sic] put in my mail box or mailed to me from the post office in Sherman or from the America, said to be by Catholic authorities, "the ablest Roman Catholic paper in the country."
> Yours respectfully,
> B. Wrenn Webb.

Rarely has a prayer for darkness in the intellect been more fervently uttered. This clergyman will allow no one to inform him of anything "concerning the Catholic Church," a subject which, it must be admitted, has occupied a fair amount of space in the world's history, and is not absolutely devoid of interest even today. Eminent scholars, Catholic and non-Catholic, some of them the intellectual equals, possibly, of the Rev. B. Wrenn Webb, are burning the midnight oil in an honest effort to know more about the Catholic Church. But Mr. Webb is not of their number. He has exhausted the matter; he knows all that he wishes to know; the subject is closed, like Mr. Webb's mind, and the Texas clergyman has succeeded, where Aesop's frog failed, in blowing himself to the size of an ox. To suggest that some small fragment worthy of entrance into the gigantic maw of his stupendous intellect may have been overlooked is more than a reflection upon his "intelligence." It is an "insult," and in Texas an insult is frequently the brief and hasty prelude to a funeral service.

Mr. Webb excellently represents the numerous tribe who, as Newman says, would know more about the Catholic Church if the Catholic Church were on the other side of the moon. Yet it must be granted that the "Sherman friend" was hasty in recommending him to read AMERICA. Apologies are due the Rev. B. Wrenn Webb, but, although he knows all he wants to know about the Catholic Church, he might discover some things which he does not know about sentence-structure and orthography in "Bone Rules" written by a Papistical poet, Father Tabb, and in the excellent spelling-book edited some years ago by those veteran educators, the Christian Brothers.

Exit the Dramatic Critic

"WITH 'give the people what they want' the prevailing law of press and theater, it is idle just now to look for dramatic criticism of value in our newspapers," is the conclusion reached by Mr. James S. Metcalf in a paper on "Dramatic Criticism in the American Press," which he contributes to the current Atlantic Monthly. The late William Winter, as all the world is aware, was the last of our real critics of the stage. Because he indignantly refused to recede from the firm stand he took against all uncleanness in theatrical productions, he was dismissed from the staff of a New York journal, a paper he had served for fifty years, and "his last days would have been devoid of comfort" if his actor-friends had not loyally stood by him. The finances of the paper were very low, and a powerful firm of managers whom Mr. Winter held chiefly responsible for the growth of indecency on our stage were large advertisers in the paper; consequently the great American dramatic critic was sacrificed to Mammon and expediency. On that melancholy day of Mr. Winter's retirement, commercialism and uncleanness in the realm of the drama may be said to have won an exulting triumph over art and decency.

Taught by Mr. Winter's fate, the so-called dramatic critic of the metropolitan press always keeps in mind what is likely to happen to him "if he launches into any general denunciations of theatrical methods, or if he attacks the enterprise of the advertising manager in a way that imperils profits." He is now expected to reflect rather than direct the taste of the theater-goer. As a consequence, the dramatic critic's calling is now quite obsolete and his successor is the clever reporter. For, according to Mr. Metcalf:

In the majority of newspaper offices the function of dramatic critic devolves by chance or convenience, and frequently goes by favoritism to some member of the staff with a fondness for the theater and an appreciation of free seats. One of New York's best-known dailies frankly treats theatrical reviewing as nothing more than reportorial work, to be covered as would be any other news assignment. This publication and a good many others are far more particular about the technical equipment of the writers who describe baseball games, horse-races and prize-fights than about the fitness of those who are to weigh the merits of plays and acting. The ability to write without offending the advertising theatrical manager seems in the last case to be the only absolutely essential qualification.

In the light of the foregoing, it is not surprising that the average dramatic critique in our daily press is so worthless and misleading. The reporter assigned to "write up" a new play can be pictured preparing for his task by carefully examining the Sunday edition of his paper to learn how much advertising space has been bought by the theatrical syndicate that is producing the play he is to "criticize," and having equipped himself with this important information, he knows pretty well, no doubt, even before he sees the play, what will be the general character of his "criticism." Being a skilful reporter, he is quick to see the "news value" too of the production he is "covering," and of course emphasizes that characteristic of the play in his "copy."

Since both the stage and the press are so hopelessly commercialized today that sincere and fearless dramatic criticism has become practically a lost art, the best way of cleansing our stage would seem to be by making managers realize that the exploiting of the salacious, the immodest and the indecent is financially unprofitable. But as long as Catholics themselves form a large portion of the audiences that attend these immoral plays, and as long as the children of the Church, notwithstanding their numerical strength, are willing to take no effective steps to purify the American theater, the lamentable corruption of our youths and maidens by means of a licentious and commercialized stage will no doubt continue.

Literature

MILTON AND A COMPARISON

MILTON is one of the few poets in English literature who looked upon poetry as a vocation. He deliberately set out to become a poet and a great one. He speaks at an early period of "An inward prompting which grows daily upon me, that by labor and intent study, which I take to be my portion in this life, joined with the strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to aftertimes, as they should not willingly let die." After leaving college he spent five years (1632-1638) at Horton, his father's country place, in assiduous cultivation of what seemed to him would best qualify him for poet. He read widely and diligently in the classics, in history, in medieval and contemporary literature. His purpose was to select and store material for the Muse, as bees the sweets from the flower for the honey of the hive.

He was not, however, entirely preoccupied in gathering material. He did not neglect the practice of his art. It was from this period that came the fruit of what was the happiest kalends of his poetical activity. It was the hey-day of the poet's lyricism: "L'Allegro," "Il Penseroso," "Arcades," "Comus," "Lycidas"—Milton, it is true, but not the Milton of "Paradise Lost." It was the Milton who still felt the Elizabethan afflatus blowing from those spacious times, before the austerity of Puritanism had overshadowed his brighter imagination. Not that he was not even then Puritan, but he was happily more poet. What might have been his ultimate poetical development, if those intervening twenty years of fierce polemical and political strife had not swept his seas into furious storm, it would be difficult to say. "Paradise Lost" might not have been his great achievement. The Arthurian legend, which allured his genius in early life, might have been the wings of his flight in drama or in epic. At least the story of Uther's heroic son would have been more in keeping with the promise of the Horton preoccupation.

The formative elements of Milton's first period, the six years at Horton, were the still lingering tradition of the Elizabethan age and humanism, which had then reached its zenith at Cambridge, Milton's university. "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" are exercises in imagination depicting the contrasted moods of joy and melancholy. They are pastoral in form and theme, as indeed was the entire series of that first period. In "Lycidas" alone do we meet a distinctive Miltonic note, a hint of the polemical Milton of after years, and a larger purpose than the simple singing of a poet's mood. A threnody on the untimely death of a university friend by drowning at sea, through the poet's lamentations, woven out of classic and pastoral imagery comes the swelling diapason of an enormous menace to the hated prelacy of the Established Church, which the Puritanism of the time linked in its detestation with the Papacy. Strange to say Milton uses St. Peter, the rock of the Papacy, as the mouth-piece of his tremendous denunciation, concluding with the dire threat:

> "But that two handed engine at the door, > Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more,"

a tantalizingly obscure indication of the instrument of destruction, unless it mean the

> "Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
> (The golden opes, the iron shuts amain)."

Howbeit, we have here a revelation of the Milton of the two later periods, the virulent pamphleteer of the Commonwealth and the blind poet of "Paradise Lost" and "Samson Agonistes."

After Horton, the visit to Italy and then a hasty return to England. From this time the Muse was deserted for nearly twenty years, save for an occasional sonnet. The high vocation was temporarily abandoned amid the turmoil of the times, the Revolution and the seething controversies of the Commonwealth. Milton gave himself over to the battles of pamphleteering, in which abuse and vituperation abounded more than argument. The poet was lost for the time being in the polemicist and by no means to the benefit of the latter.

After the Restoration Milton went into retirement. He had become blind. His polemical life over, he turned his energies to that great achievement, which had been in his mind's eye from the beginning. He wrote "Paradise Lost," "Paradise Regained" and "Samson Agonistes." "Paradise Lost" is his great achievement, the fullness and the climax of his poetic genius. "Paradise Regained" is far below it in imaginative and constructive power and seems to have been only an after-effort to redeem "Paradise Lost" from the deserved imputation of merely rehearsing the triumph of Satan. In "Paradise Lost" Milton made English an epic tongue. In his hands, blank verse became a flexible and mighty instrument of the heroic theme. "Mighty-mouthed inventor of harmonies" is no exaggeration of his power. In cadence, balance and variation no verse in the language surpasses the metrical structure of "Paradise Lost." He is here the peer of Shakespeare, with, of course, the difference between epic and dramatic verse.

When we weigh the subject-matter of "Paradise Lost" we find evidence of the spiritual decline which divides the epoch in which Milton lived from the pre-Reformation ages. A comparison between Dante's "Divine Comedy" and "Paradise Lost" will show us how far from the intense and comprehensive spirituality of Catholic thought English Protestantism had departed in Milton's time. Both epics treat of the other world and are rooted in radically diverse conceptions of Satan and God. Satan is Milton's protagonist and is sympathetically drawn by the Puritan poet. He is indeed the author of evil and a fallen angel, but he is splendid in his fall. He is a defeated rebel, overthrown by the might of his opponent, but he is still indomitable. His pristine beauty has been marred but not extinguished:

> . . . his form had not yet lost
> All his original brightness, nor appeared
> Less than archangel ruined and the excess
> Of glory obscured. . .

His loss is not the loss of the supreme and essential good, but the forcible and unjust rape of his high estate. Hell is not an abode of essential disaster and wo, but the fallen hosts by virtue of their still architectonic and celestial powers erect out of it a mighty and orderly fabric that

> Rose like an exhalation with the sound
> Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,
> Built like a temple. . . .

The Dantean Satan, like the Miltonic, is the author of sin, but sin is essentially hideous. It is the prime disorder of the universe, the deadly breach in creation. Its effect in the sinner is moral death, and in Satan, the first and greatest of all sinners, the source of all evil, its effects are more hideous and deadly than in all else. Satan, a gigantic and hairy monster, with three faces and six bat-like wings, whose slow flapping is his sole power of movement, frozen at mid-breast in the ice of Cocytus, is the picture of supreme moral death, the creature eminent in beauty once, now in all the hideous deformity flowing from the primal sin. It is a horrible picture, and it is intended to be such, for sin in its effects is essentially hideous. Sin in the Miltonic scheme is merely external rebellion and Satan is only a defeated rebel. Sin in the Dantean conception is essentially destructive, an intrinsic disorder, which brings moral ruin and death, and Satan is its quintessential and personal evidence. He is not only fallen, but lost. In his sin he aimed directly and destructively at the Supremely True and the Supremely Good and, if it were possible, would have mortally assailed the Supreme Existence. He, the creature, sought to be God.

Milton's image of God is that of Jupiter Tonans; he is a God of omnipotence, whose chief glory consists in manifesting his might. The council between the Father and His Arian Son—for the Son, in Milton's theology, is not con-substantial—as described in Book III, is simply revolting to the Christian sense. Such a conference might well befit Zeus and some Olympian deity, or some earthly chieftain and one of his captains, but when the human imagination essays to penetrate into the Divine Council and portrays the Thrice-Sacrosanct after the manner of a Indian chief in a pow-wow with one of his braves, our sense of reverence is outraged and our appreciation of the ineffable mystery suffers profound eclipse.

Dante never attempts to penetrate into the presence of the Divine mystery save in the great conclusion, when he is vouchsafed a glimpse of the beatific vision, and here he veils it in imagery which but expresses the incapacity of putting into human speech what so infinitely transcends human faculty.

> O speech,
> How feeble and how frail art thou to give > Conception truth.

God is the ineffably holy, nor throughout the entire "Paradiso" is there a single Divine utterance; yet He is ever present in the light of glory in the beatified hosts, a supreme effulgence and illumination. Dante never has vision of Him, save in that last fleeting moment, and the rest is silence. Only once does he symbolize the Divine essence, under the single intense indivisible point of light, around which the nine choirs wheel in ardourous flight, and from which all the Heavens depend.

It would be interesting to compare further the Catholic with the Puritan poet in their treatment of their respective celestial themes. But we have seen enough to show how far apart their treatments lie; how gross and terrene the method and the conception of the Puritan poet in contrast with the spiritual delicacy and the reverence of the Catholic. Both are great architectonic poets, but their conceptions of things celestial and spiritual are as far apart as the poles. The theme of "Paradise Lost" is triumphant hate, that of the "Divine Comedy," triumphant love.

BOOK REVIEWS

The Future Life, According to the Authority of Divine Revelation, the Dictates of Sound Reason, the General Consent of Mankind. By the Rev. JOSEPH C. SASIA, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. $2.50.

This book, with its 562 pages, is a veritable arsenal of information concerning the future life. The author has ranged through the sacred and profane literature of all time, and gleaning the best, has woven it into a connected treatise on man, his destiny, the possibility of attaining it and the danger of losing it, the immortality of the human soul, heaven and hell. It is filled with exhaustive and accurate expositions of those points about the future life which have always occupied the mind of man. It is logical, satisfying and complete.

The end of man, his ceaseless quest for happiness, the purpose and importance of his earthly pilgrimage, form the first part of the book. This is followed by a treatise on the sanction of God's laws, begun in his life but finding its perfect completion in endless recompense or retribution. This sanction, remunerative and punitive, naturally supposes the immortality of the soul, which the learned author proves from reason, revelation, the testimony of ancient and modern peoples, and the general consent of mankind. Having thus prepared the way for the discussion of the two main subjects of the book, Father Sasia takes up heaven and hell. He goes into great detail as to the happiness of the beatific vision, the nature of the joy that floods the soul of the blessed, the functions and pleasures of the glorified senses, the proof of the doctrine of the resurrection from Holy Writ and its harmony with reason; and the means God has put into the hands of man to enable him surely to reach his destiny of everlasting happiness.

Almost one-half of the book is devoted to the discussion of the doctrine of hell, as promulgated and described in Holy Writ, persisting with an unbroken though at times grotesque and fragmentary tradition in the writings of pagan literature, reinforced by the teaching of Jesus Christ, and developed, defended and explained in Christian theology and philosophy. Sixty pages are devoted to the discussion of difficulties against the dogma of hell, and almost fifty to the place the doctrine holds in the systems of Protestant sects.

The thoroughness of the treatment of every phase of the subject, the calm, deliberate accuracy of its logical development, the vast amount of philosophical, theological, patristic and historical knowledge which the author has brought to bear on the question, together with the inherent and intrinsic interest which it has for every human being, all combine to make Father Sasia's work a valuable one. It deserves an honored place in every seminary library, it should be within easy reach of every preacher of eternal truths, it should be familiar to every one who deals with converts, and in general it will well repay being read by every one who is wont to test the value of ephemeral things by their relation to eternity. A Year with the Birds. By ALICE E. BALL. Illustrated by ROBERT BRUCE HORSFALL, Painter of Backgrounds in Habitat Groups, American Museum of Natural History, New York City. 57 Colored Plates. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $3.00.

As her answer to the query: "What is the most attractive form in which bird study can be presented to children?" the author offers this beautiful book. There are descriptions in verse of the appearance and habits of fifty-seven kinds of birds that can be seen in the Northern States every year, and there are finely executed full-page pictures in color to accompany the text, most of them being made by Mr. Robert Bruce Horsfall. Such winter residents and visitors as the bluejay, the cardinal, and the chickadee are first described, then come the birds of the early and late spring migration, from the song sparrow to the sandpiper. Thus the children can learn to know each of their little feathered friends in the order of its appearance. Most of the verse in the volume is by the author, but there are also appropriate selections from Bryant, Lowell, Longfellow, etc., and James Ryder Randall, Maryland's Catholic poet, tells in the following stanzas "Why the Robin's Breast was Red":

And from the agonizing wreath ran many a crimson rill;
The cruel Roman thrust Him on with unrelenting hand
Till, staggering slowly, 'mid the crowd, He fell upon the sand.

A little bird that warbled near, that memorable day,
Flitted around and strove to wrench one single thorn away;
The cruel spike impaled his breast—and thus, 'tis sweetly said,
The Robin has his silver vest incarnadined with red.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The April 8 issue of the Catholic Mind contains Cardinal Bourne's remarkable pastoral on "Catholics and Social Reform." Though the letter is addressed to the people of England, the evils his Eminence describes are so much like those that prevail in this country that Americans will find the remedies he suggests to be very practical. The Cardinal lays down the Catholic principles that > Each man has a right to a true human life, and to the labor whereby, materially, that life may be maintained; and to that labor is due a wage proportionate at least to the maintenance of such true human life. In the same way he is entitled to have and to retain property as his own personal possession, and at the same time it is his duty to render to the society of men in the midst of which he lives, the service and obedience without which all corporate existence would be impossible.

Father Plater then has a short article on "The Social Revolution," and the number ends with a new instalment of Father Reville's list of books for Catholic readers.

The January Dublin Review opens with a paper on Lord Acton, by Canon Barry, who justly calls him "our burden" and "our embarrassment," for "Hardly any writer, not professedly the foe of Catholic dogma, has left such violent pages to be quoted by a censorious world in condemnation of Popes and their policy, during seven hundred years. He is of us, yet in effect against us." Mr. Ronald Knox, a recent convert, then contributes a very informing article on "Tendencies of Anglicanism," in which he shows that the Church of England is no longer divisible into three parties only—High, Low and Broad—but that now there are in it no less than nine schools of thought which he labels as follows: "Active Protestants. Evangelicals, Neo-Evangelicals, Evangelical Liberals, The Rest, High Church Liberals, High Churchmen, Anglo-Catholics and Ultramarines." The last-named party, to which Mr. Knox himself belonged, concedes "primacy to Peter, and often a great deal more," and looks forward to corporate reunion between Anglicanism and Catholicism. The Rev. Dr. Adrian Fortescue has an authoritative paper on "The Latin Church in Russia," Mary Ryan gives a critical review of "Charles Péguy in His Prose," W. F. P. Stockley contributes some interesting "Notes by a Reader of 'The Dream of Gerontius'," and Mr. Shane Leslie writes a scintillating paper on "The Legend of the American Presidency." But the author is hardly correct in saying that "Tyler found an unmarked, unhonored grave," for that humdrum President has a fine monument at Richmond. The book reviews in this number of the Dublin maintain their usual high standard of excellence.

"Aliens" (Doubleday, Page, $1.50), by William McFee, is a decided improvement in moral tone on his previous novel, "Casuals of the Sea," although in this also there is a taint, now and then, in the atmosphere. The story is told in an original way, quite out of the ordinary run of novels, and it is filled with quaint reflections on life and happiness; but it lacks the ordinary elements of idealism and romance that go into the making of most stories and depends for its interest almost entirely on its author's undoubted power of handling effectively the commonplaces of real life.——"Love and Hatred" (Doran, $1.40), by Mrs. Belloc Lowndes, is clever in its treatment of suppressed emotion, but its character is sufficiently indicated by the fact that it is built up on two triangles, resulting in a murder and a suicide.——In "My Two Kings" (Dutton, $1.50), Mrs. Evans Nepean has written a fanciful reconstruction of the days of the Stuart restoration. Imagining herself a relative of King Charles II, occupying an unobtrusive but confidential place at court and enjoying the affection of the King and the Duke of Monmouth, she writes with the vividness of an eyewitness and gives to her story a realism that is very remarkable. Her purpose is to show that there was in both the characters she describes, a best side which contrasted with, if it did not counterbalance their very obvious faults. Were her work historical and not a creation of the imagination, it would go far to substantiate her thesis. In a book which sets forth the life and times of Charles II, there must of course be a background of futility, frivolity and immorality, but the author has been content to leave them mostly as a background. In this she has done wisely, but there can be nothing but condemnation for her unstinted approval of the relations of the Duke of Monmouth with Lady Wentworth, nor is there any justification of her plea, "Other times, other morals." The book, which the author warns the reader in the preface is neither a diary nor fiction, but a visualization of scenes, partly read, partly seen, is so very realistic, that it is aptly described in her own words as "a wearing thin of the veils between those times and these."

Morality, but No God

THIS is told, as a tale might be told of Prince Hamlet, with all direct reference to Denmark studiously excluded. For I had it in mind to quote with some copiousness from the new morality code for which Dr. Hutchins of Oberlin College has received the sum of $5,000; but it seems that I may not do this thing, or do it only under conditions, which on principle must be rejected. Unlike older codes of morality, one of which is vigorous after centuries of attack, the new code cannot take the air, except by the permission, and in the company of, its nurse. "I am willing," writes the President of the National Institution for Moral Instruction, which has played the part of incubator to this new-fledged morality, "that you should publish extracts from the Hutchins morality code, provided you will allow me to print in AMERICA a reply article if I want to in view of any criticism you publish."

WHY HAMLET IS OMITTED

NOW even as your lion among ladies is a dreadful thing, so a gentleman desirous of defending the theory that morality can be taught without religion, would be a more melancholy sight than Jacques, as I conceive it, if permitted to wander in the Arden-like pages of this most orthodox review. The very thought makes my flesh creep, as if I were nearing Smithfield or a rack. "For," continues the President, "that is only common morality under the title 'fair play' which every human heart sanctions and also the good God if I understand Him correctly." Doubtless the President's implied query, which suggests some doubt whether or not he can understand infinity, is merely a verbal slip, but his conditions put me in an awkward position. For if I do not allow him entrance to the pages of AMERICA, a power of life and death which neither truth nor modesty will permit me to assume, and yet quote his code, I am guilty of an offense against common morality. On the other hand, to admit the contention that every propaganda has the right to be heard, is manifestly impossible. Sincerity in those who hold it, is no guarantee of a doctrine's truth or of its claims to a day in court. There was never a heresy that could not count devoted followers. "What of assassins, revolutionaries, teachers of Malthusian practices, and criminals who proclaim any other mission which the moral law forbids?" asks Canon Barry, in criticism of Lord Acton's astounding demand "that every man shall be protected in doing that which he believes to be his duty, against the influence of authorities and majorities, customs and opinions." "Would he have urged the same policy," comments the Canon, "had there been a question of a Congress of Socialists in Paris, or of Nihilists at Geneva," or, we may add, of Thugs at Singapore or of birth-controllers in New York?

RELIGION SPECIFICALLY EXCLUDED

LET it not be thought that the code which I may quote only under impossible conditions, advocates even one of these specific enormities. Far from it. But in some respects it goes beyond whatever constitution might be drawn up by any of these assemblies. For it proposes as a system of morality, sufficient for the needs of the coming generation, a program from which, of set purpose, is excluded every reference to natural or supernatural religion. "You have no reason for surprise at the absence of all reference in the morality code to religion," the President writes me, "because you know that the specifications did not allow the authors to include religious ideas." Why, then, it may be asked, were specifications so absurdly insufficient provided the builders of the new code? "It would have raised a great fuss," the President answers, "if we had allowed religious ideas to be included in a code written and sanctioned by us for the public schools." Habemus reum confitentem. It would be difficult to draw up an indictment against the public schools more conclusive than that presented by the President of the National Institution for Moral Instruction. If to include religious ideas in a moral code intended for children in a nation which has been declared "a Christian nation," would arouse "a fuss," it would seem that in practice, as well as in theory, the public schools measure up very well to the ideals so zealously fostered by Julian the Apostate.

ECLECTIC MORALITY

BUT the President is justified in his remark that I should not have been surprised at the exclusion from the code of all reference to religion. Consulting the pamphlet issued some years ago by the Institution, it is clear that by "moral truth" the advocates of the new code understand little more than "the wisdom of human experience." That the Author of all being, God, who is the source of truth and morality, can be known by the testimony of the things that are, is a fact which seems to have escaped them. Not recognizing God in His creatures, they are constrained to bar the sanctions even of natural religion from the code. As for supernatural religion, they regard it as a collection of "theological dogmas" which the individual may accept or reject at pleasure.

> Theological dogmas are not to be included in the code of morals to which the prize is awarded. This restriction does not mean that either the donor or the National Institution regards morality as not a part of religion, but it is imposed because toleration in religion assigns to each the right to hold individual opinions in matters of theology.

But it is also true that "toleration" assigns "to each the right to hold individual opinions in matters" of morality quite as fully as in theology. A man may hold what opinions he wishes, and in this country he is allowed exceedingly large and easy bounds within which he may even practise them. For many, the highest standard in morality is that set up by statute law. Thousands practise polygamy in its legalized form, and if the testimony of birth statistics has any force, even a larger number of outwardly respectable citizens continually violate the law of nature. For a still greater body, perhaps, sin is not in the fact, but in the discovery of the fact; disgrace is not in the deed, but in "being found out." This moral anarchy is the natural outcome of the rejection of religion. If in that sphere I am free to choose, independently of Almighty God and of any authority designated by Him, there is no reason why I may not claim the same right in the domain of morals. For I am, in the circumstances indicated, the sole and ultimate judge, assessing myself in the light of law made by myself. True, social conditions may impose certain limits which I must observe, if I wish to remain with my fellows, and may constrain my acts by fear of social ostracism. But these facts are merely accidental. If I reject the supremacy of Almighty God, I set up myself as God.

A WEAK AND BEGGARLY CODE

WHAT, then, is the sanction of the godless code by which the Institution seeks to bind me? If I am free to "hold individual opinions in matters of theology" independently of whether or not Almighty God has proposed for my acceptance so elementary a point of theology as His existence and supreme dominion, the Institution cannot in justice or in logic, force upon me its prize-winning moral dogmas. If I may reject Almighty God's code of morality, I am at a loss to see why I should be asked to accept the code of Dr. Hutchins. By a "code" is generally understood a body of coordinated laws, promulgated by competent authority. Law, a moral power over human acts, implies two distinct entities, one who is bound, and one who by right, binds. "That which doth assign unto each thing the kind," writes Hooker, "that which doth moderate the force and power, that which doth appoint the form and measure of working, the same we term a law." Thus law also implies necessity. But there is no necessity in Dr. Hutchins' code. His "suggestions," his codified "experiences of utility," as Lilly says,

> Can do no more than counsel. They can lay no necessity upon us to fulfil what they indicate as desirable. They are devoid of that categorical imperative indicated by the word "ought" which is the very note of an ethical law.

But Dr. Hutchins, as I understand him, eschews the "ought" and "must," thereby destroying the very nature of "an ethical law." He would induce me to conform to his moral code by appealing solely to my self-interest. I am to be moral, not because a Supreme Being authoritatively commands what is good and proscribes all evil, but because "it pays" to be moral. I hope I am not unjust in saying that the Oberlin morality is only a variant of the cynical, "Be good, if for no other reason, at least for the reason that in the long run goodness leads to health, financial independence, and a respectable grade of American citizenship." As for the life to come, man's real life which begins only beyond the grave and lasts forever, Oberlin morality knows nothing.

'Irrational and Degrading

DESTITUTE of all binding force, narrow in concept, chauvinistic in scope, irrational in ignoring God's right to command His creatures, and degrading in its patent rejection of religion as the basis of morality, Dr. Hutchins' morality code is an abomination against which the mind of the child must be fully protected. It is true that the public schools are deplorably destitute of any consistent scheme of moral training, but since so many teachers and officers are superior to the system of which they are a part, it is hard to believe that the State schools are so poor as to find this code a boon. As for our unfortunate Catholic children in the public schools, we best fulfil our duty by endeavoring to withdraw them, and failing this happy consummation, by strengthening our various societies for the extramural teaching of Christian doctrine. But this, although infinitely superior to any training based on a moral code from which Almighty God has been definitely and purposely excluded, is not our ideal. We shall attain that only when instead of less than one-half of our children, we have every Catholic child in the United States in a Catholic school.

ECONOMICS

Economic Determinism

THE materialistic theory of history, or economic determinism, one of the basic doctrines of Socialism, is a fusion of Hegel's dialectic with the materialism of Feuerbach. The predominance of the materialistic philosophy over the spiritualistic element of Hegel, may be gaged from the following quotation from Marx's "Das Kapital":

> My dialectic method is not only different from the Hegelian, but is its direct opposite. To Hegel, the life process of the human brain, which, under the name of the Idea, he even transforms into an independent subject, is the demiurgus of the real world, and the real world is only the external phenomenal form of the Idea. With me, on the contrary, the ideal is nothing else than the material world reflected by the human mind.

He tells us that in order to catch the ear of the public he "coquetted with the modes of expression peculiar to him (Hegel)." Marx's materialistic theory may be briefly described as materialism, expressed in Hegelian terminology. Its principal assertion is that the method of production and exchange is the only and ultimate cause which sets in motion and guides the ever-flowing course of history, and the ideas by which it is carried out.

Kinetic Economics and Static Ideas

THE enunciation of this theory is a good illustration of the general method of modern philosophy, which simply consists in reversing the meaning of any hitherto acknowledged truth. It takes no brains to do this, and always attracts as much attention as the man who reverses ordinary usage by walking on his hands. Until Marx's proposal of his theory, men believed that ideas and will power dominated the method of production and exchange, and even today this notion has a considerable following. That people are justified in clinging to their pre-Marxian idea is clear from an examination of the theory merely on its historical side, although it is disproved by other lines of argument as well.

According to Marx, every historically developed social order is in a constant Heraclitean flux. Economic conditions are ever varying, bringing in their train as effects, new ideas of morality, of religion, of politics, of philosophy. Now we freely admit that all states of society are in a process of gradual change, and that as a matter of fact, the world has run through various economic cycles in historic time, for the simple reason that nothing has yet been found strong enough to keep the world from moving on. The economic order of things is then a variable. But side by side with the kinetic order of production and exchange, we can discern all through the course of history a static order of ideas. History and ethnology reveal the fact that certain ideas have ever remained fixed and unvariable. The ideas of God, the Creator and Judge, ideas of right and wrong, the primary dictates of the natural law, the idea of the immortality of the soul, the first principles of reasoning, such as the principle of causality, have been exempt from the law of change which characterizes the economic order. Now, as we admit, it is of the essence of the economic order to be a variable quantity; it is of the essence of the moral and religious ideas noted above to be an invariable quantity. To believe Marx's statement that an economic order which is inconstant inconstancy, a fixed state of unfixity and an invariable state of variability is the cause of an order of ideas which is ever static, fixed and invariable, would involve a credulity highly repugnant to reasonable men.

Marxianism, Unphilosophical

IF the economic order is not the cause of the ideal order in a general way, it is just as little the cause of special phases of that order. Still the opposite is the contention of George Herron, a leading representative of Socialism.

> The world's sentiments and religions, its laws and morals, its arts and literatures, are all rooted in the struggle between classes for the control of the food supply. Moses and Jesus, Wyclif and Mazzini, Marx and Millet, are products of the stress and injustice of intensified economic conditions.

The superficiality of Herron's view is seen in its attribution of all historial effects indifferently to one cause, the economic order. The most obvious feature of historical phenomena is their seeming defiance of all laws, the complexity and intricacy and multiplicity of causes which are blended together to produce them. In fact, the only reason why no satisfactory philosophy of history has emerged out of the labors of so many investigators, is just the lack of some one unifying principle, some one cause to which all events can be finally reduced. Marx's is a one-sided and unphilosophical theory, the view of a man who has lost his intellectual perspective by regarding everything from the economic viewpoint. It is no wonder that his disciple travesties historical truth to the extent of declaring that Christianity was an inevitable product of the economic conditions in which it arose. If this were the case, why it may fairly be asked did its Divine Founder counsel his followers to have nothing to do with riches, and with economic problems? Why did he tell them not to ask, "What shall we eat or what shall we drink or wherewith shall we be clothed?"

Facts Disprove Theory

BESIDES, the actual facts connected with the origin of Christianity do not agree with Marx's general theory. We know that for Marx "the ideal world is nothing else than the material world reflected by the human mind." Now, only a warped mind can contend that the ideal world of moral ideas mirrored in the minds of the first Christians was a reflection of the material world of rank corruption surrounding them. Why was Christianity so bitterly persecuted if it was so exact a reflection of the time and place of its origin?

Ordinarily people do not hate their own reflection in the mirror so much as to persecute it for three hundred years, granting that they live that long. The facts of its origin force the conclusion that Christianity introduced into the world a circle of ideas that could never have been deduced from the actual economic conditions of the Roman world.

The course of art and literature is as inexplicable on Marxian lines as is the course of religion. What economic factor is able to explain the almost miraculous rise, culmination and decay of Gothic architecture? All the ideas expressed by this noble art, all the symbols that mediate that expression, are religious, and have no more connection with economic causes than shooting stars have with seismic phenomena. Economic causes do not tell us why, when European architecture was decadent during the eighteenth century Spanish America produced a beautiful architecture. The crusades of Spain against the Moor for eight hundred years, and the religious wars at the time of the so-called Reformation were not instigated by economic but by religious motives. Sophocles, Dante, Milton and Shakespeare cannot be ascribed to the peculiar methods of production and exchange in vogue, when they wrote, nor can the unrivaled succession of musicians in Germany be assigned to an economic determinant. Philosophies like Kantianism or Scholasticism owe just as little to the laws of demand and supply. But all literatures, philosophies, religions and even wars, embody ideas. There is, then, a vast range of ideas which are not results of a fight to corner the food supply, and hence the materialistic theory which asserts the dominance of economic factors over all others is out of joint with the facts of history.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Growth of the Church in England

THE English "Catholic Directory for 1918," indicates a steady continuation of the advance of British Catholicism. Judged by the record of any particular year, says the London Universe, this growth has been small in volume, yet its cumulative effect is marked when comparison is made with earlier years. Thus the number of convents in the original diocese of Westminster in 1866 was only 32, in 1917 it had risen to 174. During the past year the number of archbishops and bishops in England, Scotland and Wales rose from twenty-six to thirty, and of the priests from 4,532 to 4,551. Unfortunately, England, too, has its problem of "leakage," which, however, is far more pronounced in the case of non-Catholic bodies. The fact remains, as Cardinal Bourne states, that "Catholics are increasing more rapidly than the normal growth of the population. The same cannot be said of any other religious organization in the country." It is only necessary, his Eminence adds, to compare the few leaves of the "Directory" of 1851 with the bulky volume that now relates to the same area, to realize how great the steady advance of the Church has been.

The "American Patriots"

THE anti-Catholic and anti-American society, camouflaged under the honorable name of "American Patriots," whose purpose, as quoted by the press, is to pledge candidates for office to vote against everything Catholic and publish a preferred list informing voters of the "Romanists" on local and national tickets, recently held two meetings in Buffalo. Genuine patriots were too numerous to leave more than a handful to attend these traitorous conspiracies against national peace, fraternity and unity, abetting the national enemy at the present critical moment. Significant, however, is the list of national vice-presidents of this society as read at the second meeting:

> Hon. James Wethycombe, Governor of Oregon; Hon. B. I. Manning, Governor of South Carolina; Rear Admiral George B. Ransom, U.S.N.; Hon. Arthur Capper, Governor of Kansas; Hon. Wm. H. King, United States Senator, Utah; Judge A. Chester Clark, Concord, N. H.; Hon. Sherman E. Burroughs, Member of Congress, New Hampshire; Hon. Charles E. Townsend, United States Senator, Michigan; Hon. Frank L. Houx, Governor of Wyoming; Lee Stewart Smith, Grand Master, Grand Encampment of the Knights Templar of the United States of America; Hon. Walter A. Dutton, Public Service Commission, Vermont; Hon. John L. Reade, secretary, Sons of American Revolution, Maine; Hon. Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida; Frank C. Goudy, grand sire, Odd Fellows of the United States; Hon. Thos. C. Cheney, ex-Speaker, Vermont Legislature; ex-Governor William T. Haines, Maine; Hon. Edwin C. Bean, Secretary of State, New Hampshire; Hon. W. C. Comings, collector of customs, Vermont; Hon. Louis B. B. Goodall, Member of Congress, Maine; Hon. Thomas H. Jeffries, great incononee, Red Men; Hon. Miles Poindexter, United States Senator, Washington; Hon. Ed. S. Johnson, United States Senator, South Dakota; John J. Brown, supreme chancellor, supreme government, Knights of Pythias; Major-General George W. Goethals, Quartermaster General, United States; Hon. Charles A. Crisp, Member of Congress, Georgia; Major-General Henry P. McCain, Adjutant-General, United States; Rear Admiral Millingham, U.S.N.; Rear Admiral Albert W. Grant, U.S.N.

We trust that many of the men whose names are found in the foregoing list will be able to prove that they are unjustly included in that roll of infamy and bigotry, or else that their names were obtained under false pretenses.

Who Is the "Teetering" Vulture?

THE distortion of facts to serve the purpose of bigotry has seldom been more outrageous than in the now unmasked slander of the Saturday Evening Post, to which previous reference has been made in America. The priest-villain of the story, "teetering rhythmically in his long robe, as lean, black vultures rhythmically teetering through the gutters of a tropic town," turns out to have been in reality a heroic pastor, the Rev. D. Cantelmi, of Anita, Pa., who at that very moment was performing as noble a service in the interest of law and order as any soldier who ever went "over the top." Says the statement issued by the attorneys-at-law, Gillespie & Gillespie, after careful investigation of the facts at the scene of the struggle:

> The testimony . . . showed that instead of acting the coward, instead of being in league with the criminals as is directly inferred from this "story," Father Cantelmi voluntarily went up to the house at the risk of his life and spoke long enough to the sole inmate of the same (Tabone) to learn who it was and to try to persuade him to come out and surrender himself. Tabone was a man completely demented and the wonder is that he did not shoot Father Cantelmi then and there as he had the State policemen.

There was no secret passage, no garrison of desperadoes, no dropping of bodies into the ruins of the falling house, but only a single, demented inmate, a trained sharpshooter, supplied with rifles and ammunition. To save the men "of the force," the heroic priest was prepared to yield up his own life and bravely sought to do their work in the face of death. Should the Saturday Evening Post be base enough to refuse an ample reparation for the printed calumny, the necessary legal steps will be taken to secure justice to "a very good and praiseworthy priest."

The War.—The brunt of the fighting has been shifted from the Morisel-Montdidier-Lassigny-Plemont-Pierremande-Folembray-Anizy line to the northern sector stretching between La Bassée, Armentières and Messines Ridge. On April 8 the enemy opened a heavy fire on the British lines between La Bassée Canal and Armentières. South of La Bassée the British positions were flanked by Vimy Ridge, north by Messines Ridge, the objective of the German attack. Though both flanks of the British armies stubbornly resisted the forty-eight-hour bombardment and the fierce infantry attacks directed against them, their center had to withdraw to the Lawe River, a branch of the Lys, and along the southern bank of the Lys itself. Neuve Chappelle, the scene of the first English offensive in the spring of 1915, was taken and passed and the line ran back to Vieille Chapelle on the Lawe. From here the British line followed the Lawe to its junction with the Lys at Estaire, after which it followed the Lys. On their southern flank the British were strong enough to counter-attack at Givenchy. Here they captured nearly a thousand prisoners and regained some of the ground which they had previously lost. At this crisis in the battle the Germans again swung northward and struck a heavy blow at the Ypres sector. From Hollebeke to Armentières they moved forward regardless of severe losses and established a line extending along the road from Ploegsteert to Wytschaete, and thence to Hollebeke, passing through Messines. The town of Messines changed hands several times, but the ridge remained in British hands. As a result of these movements Armentières was opened to the enemy on three sides. It was soon heavily "gassed" and the British had to withdraw. In the fighting which followed the withdrawal the Germans, already astride the Lys River, advanced along the river towards Estaire and towards Steenwerck and Bailleul. The fighting during this stage of the battle was of a character unequaled in intensity perhaps during the present offensive. Official British reports of Saturday, April 13, told of a further advance made by the enemy from the Ploegsteert-Estaire-Lestrem line to a line drawn from Neuve-Eglise, thence east of Bailleul to Merville on the eastern edge of the Nieppe Forest. At this crisis Field Marshal Haig, who from the first day of the German offensive has been obliged steadily to withdraw before its onslaught, issued an order of the day to his troops, in which, after stating that the object of the enemy was to separate the British army from the French and take the channel ports, ordered every position to be held to the last man. "There must be no retirement. With our backs to the wall, and believing in the justice of our cause, each one of us must fight to the end. The safety of our homes and the freedom of mankind depend alike upon the conduct of each one of us at this critical moment." The British commander also assured his troops that the French army was moving rapidly and in great force to their support. The reports of April 13 told of the recovery by the British of Neuve Eglise, in the northern sector, three miles southwest of Messines, and that on the southern line the French had regained some ground at Orvilliers, southeast of Montdidier, and that Hangard-on-Santerre was again completely in French hands. The latest dispatches from the Lys front tell of the fiercest fighting, with the British still holding their lines. The enemy, however, claims to have taken Merris and Vieux Berquin southwest of Bailleul.

Bulletin, Apr. 8, p.m.-Apr. 15, a.m.

In the Toul sector and on the Verdun front the American troops were under heavy fire and made several successful raids and took some prisoners. On the right bank of the Meuse north of St. Mihiel they repulsed a heavy attack.

All doubts with regard to General Foch's rank in the Allied Army have been removed by an official note from Paris stating that the British and French Governments have agreed to give him the title of Commander-in-Chief of the Allied forces operating in France.

An official statement giving the text of a telegram from Emperor Charles to Emperor William relative to the assertion of Premier Clemenceau that the former recognized the claims of France to Alsace-Lorraine was issued on April 11. The Emperor accuses M. Clemenceau "of piling up lies to escape the web of lies in which he is involved" by making "the false assertion" that the Emperor had in some manner recognized France's claims to Alsace-Lorraine as just. "At the moment," says the Emperor, "when Austro-Hungarian cannon are firing alongside the German artillery on the western front, no proof is necessary that I am fighting for your provinces."

Almost simultaneously with the appearance of the imperial telegram the French government published what it affirms is the text of an autograph letter of the Emperor Charles communicated on March 31, 1917, by Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, the Emperor's brother-in-law, to President Poincaré and communicated immediately with the Prince's consent to the French Premier. In the letter the Emperor begs the Prince "To convey privately and unofficially to President Poincaré that I will support by every means and by exerting all my personal influence with my allies France's just claims regarding Alsace-Lorraine." In the same letter the Emperor gives his views with regard to the Belgian and Serbian questions. With regard to Belgium he says "Belgium should be entirely re-established in her sovereignty, retaining her African possessions without prejudice to the compensations she should receive for the losses she has undergone." The Viennese press doubts the authenticity of the letter. Some papers call it a downright forgery, others say that it was garbled.

Canada.—During the week much light has been thrown on the Quebec riots. On April 9 the special correspondent of the New York Evening Post presented Borden's and Laurier's version of the incidents which led to the disorder as follows: According to the former the Federal police arrested a man named Mercier who had been exempted from military service and detained him until his exemption papers were presented. A small crowd gathered and followed a dozen of the Federal police who took refuge in a police station, where they were attacked. The next night another crowd attempted to burn the building where the offices of the registrar are, and failing this, they attacked the offices of two pro-conscriptionist papers. The Government deemed that the municipal authorities of Quebec had not taken adequate steps to curb the disorder and therefore sent Federal troops from Ontario. These arrived Sunday morning and paraded the streets. On Monday night six civilians were slain and a great but unknown number were wounded by machine-gun fire. Laurier, rising immediately after Borden's speech, declared that the latter could scarcely mean to imply that the Mercier incident had sufficed to arouse Quebec. For months imported Federal police had been arresting Merciers and detaining them. Indeed men of class B, a class not yet called up, had been subjected to similar treatment. This caused friction, especially since among the Federal police, there were men like Desjardins charged with dynamiting Lord Athelstane's residence. The Canadian Minister of Justice had confessed in the House of Commons that Desjardins was his employee, and that the Government had provided the bail of this agent provocateur. The Government had been equally unfortunate in its choice of other officers. Moreover 27,000 draft cases had been appealed; of these appeals 25,000 were made on behalf of the Government, although the grounds for exemption had been restricted practically to one, physical unfitness. These and other incidents made the law unpopular, and tactless applications of the statute led to the slight disorders of March 28. In these disturbances no lives were lost and the damage done to property was estimated by the Government press at between $15,000 and $25,000. On March 30 the Government decided to call on the Federal troops, alleging that the mayor of Quebec had not adopted adequate measures of defense. Then the mayor of Quebec wrote this message to Borden:

The Quebec Riots

> I am unaware of press accounts on which you base statement contained in your telegram of March 29 to the effect that the attitude of the municipal police authorities was passive, that no real effort was made by the civic authorities to prevent the assault on Federal officers or put down disturbers. Such accounts, doubtless, were grossly exaggerated in the outside press. The disturbances of last night and tonight are sincerely deplored by myself and citizens of Quebec. The lack of discretion, tact, and discrimination on the part of the officers responsible for the enforcement of the Military Service act seems, to a large extent, to account for these unfortunate occurrences. I sincerely hope that immediate instructions will be issued to the proper authorities here in order that further trouble be avoided.

Borden replied:

> Your telegram has been received and transmitted to the Military Service Council for their consideration. They desire to have particulars of the alleged lack of discretion, tact, and discrimination to which you allude. My telegram to you made no statement beyond a reference to the press reports, which were fairly summarized therein. If these reports are inaccurate it would be greatly in the public interest that the truth should be known immediately. To that end I hope that you will let me know what steps were taken by the civic authorities to identify those who engaged in the assault upon the Federal officers and whether any arrests have been made.

Troops followed hot on this wire, but, as it appears from the appended affidavit, bloodshed could still have been avoided. Unfortunately the Orange Sentinel and other Ontario papers had been exhorting the soldiers to violence, and violence eventuated. Cardinal Bégin and the clergy immediately appealed to the people and were successful in placating the enraged citizens of Quebec. The following affidavit gave a clear and succinct account of events:

> I, Armand Lavergne, of the city of Quebec, advocate, being duly sworn upon the Holy Evangelists, doth say and declare:
> (1.) Sunday, the 31st of March, about 6:45 P. M., at my house, where I was confined by a slight attack of grippe, I was called to the 'phone by Mr. Alleyn Tachereau, public representative of the Minister of Justice for district E, under the Military Service Act;

(2.) Mr. Tachereau, who has been for long a personal friend of mine, requested me to go over immediately to the Château Frontenac, and meet him at room 301, stating he had something very important and urgent to talk to me about;

(3.) When I got there, about a quarter past seven, I was introduced to Col. Machin, and another gentleman by the name of Carruthers, captain or colonel;

(4.) After a few friendly words, Col. Machin asked me what I thought of the present situation in Quebec city, how it was caused, and the best means to face it;

(5.) I told Col. Machin that in my humble opinion the situation had been brought about by the choice and lack of tact of the Government Federal detectives charged with enforcing the Military Service Act. On this point we all agreed.

(6.) I then said that my impression was that the whole thing could be stopped if anybody was willing to go and meet the rioters, speak to them, tell them that those detectives which are known in the city as very low characters would not have anything more to do with the enforcing of the act, and that the troops who were patrolling the streets would be retired to barracks; if that were done all the trouble would end.

(7.) Col. Machin, or one of the parties present, informed me that we should try to avoid bloodshed, as the troops that night were going to fire.

(8.) To this I agreed willingly, as Col. Machin, myself, and others present were desirous to bring the thing to an end, as soon as possible, with the least serious consequences. I suggested sending anybody, and said that as far as I was concerned, I was willing to do it if I could state the above-mentioned conditions, namely, the removal of objectionable detectives and retirement of troops.

(9.) Col. Machin told me that he had not the necessary authority to assure me of that, but he would do his best to have those things accepted in Ottawa, and he thanked me for my willingness as the best means to end the trouble.

(10.) He then asked me to dine with him, which I refused, saying that I was going to try immediately, to which he consented, and wished me Godspeed.

(11). I left the Château Frontenac and went down to headquarters, where I saw Gen. Landry, officer commanding Military Division No. 5. I told Gen. Landry that I had seen Col. Machin, and what I proposed to do. He told me it was the best service I could do them, and the city, under the circumstances. I then asked him where he expected the most serious trouble to break out that night. Gen. Landry told me the rioters had just burnt the store of Martineau on St. Joseph Street, and he was informed they were coming to lower town to the Mechanics' Supply, via St. Paul Street, and asked me to go down that way and meet them.

(12.) I then left and went down alone by Mountain Hill, St. Peter, and St. Paul Streets. Opposite the Mechanics' Supply I met two municipal policemen, and asked them for any sign of rioters, which they told me they had not yet. I then walked out St. Paul Street and met a small group opposite the C. P. R. Station, composed of about thirty, which group came to my notice as they were walking on the sidewalk, by some whistles being blown, and some of them yelling "Let us go down (en bas)." I made a sign to them with my hand to stop and asked them where they were going. Their welcome to my question was very equivocal, so I said to them, "You know who I am," gave them my name, and told them that if they went further they would be mowed down by the troops; that on the other hand, I was the bearer of a message of peace if they would stop trouble. After some discussion, their number had then increased around me to about three or four hundred, who could hear what I was saying. I made them the above proposals, and a few of them suggested my addressing them to the whole crowd, which might number one thousand or fifteen hundred. I got up on a Ford automobile, which was there, and repeated what I had said, and asked them to disperse, stating that the military authorities would rely on their honor to keep quiet, and that they in their turn could rely on the honor of the military authorities to have things in the city restored to their normal state the next day if they would be peaceful that night, and if the military authories kept their word, to pledge themselves (the rioters) to create no further disturbances on any of the following days. To this they agreed in great majority enthusiastically, although I had to meet objections and insults from a very few scattered individuals.

(13.) After that some one suggested that a great crowd was assembled on the Jacques Cartier Market Place, and to prevent any trouble from them that I should go and repeat my remarks there, to which I agreed.

(14.) The crowd was swung back, and we walked back to the Jacques Cartier Market Place, where I repeated practically the above remarks before an audience of five or six thousand persons. The people then again pledged themselves to keep the peace, and the propositions I was bearer of were greeted with enthusiasm, except from the same few scattered voices.

(15.) After that, they requested me to let them accompany me to the Château but I begged them to disperse and go home immediately. I boarded a street car, came up to the Château, and reported to Col. Machin, who thanked me for what I had done, and I told them that, although I understood that the troops had to be kept in readiness, if they were taken away from public view, I felt assured perfect quiet would reign in the city. He agreed with me, and said he would report same to Gen. Lessard. I then reported by telephone to Gen. Landry, stating the same opinion, and also personally to Gen. Lessard, who appearad at the Château a few minutes later. I must say that, of all the people I saw last night in the crowd of rioters, I knew nobody personally except one man, to whom I had not spoken for the last five years. When I went home about one o'clock, practically all the troops had gone back to headquarters, and no trouble had been reported since.

(16.) I also want to state further that if it had not been for Col. Machin's earnest request and sincere desire for peace, I would not have taken any action in the matter, and I have signed.

Maire de Quebec.

Added to this, is the verdict of the Coroner's jury which attributed the riots to the "tactless and grossly unwise fashion in which the Federal police acted toward absentees under the Military Service act." The conscription law has been modified by an order in council so that now martial law prevails in Quebec and the penalty for assembly is summary arrest by the military and conscription irrespective of the class allotted by the Military Service act.

Conscription and the Convention

Ireland.—On April 9, Lloyd George announced in the House of Commons that conscription would be extended to Ireland as soon as possible. He justified the act on the ground that Ireland, through her representatives, had approved of the war and voted to commit the Empire to it. Moreover, by its very character the war was as much Ireland's as England's. As a consequence there should be equality of service as far as possible. The Premier then declared that conscription was not a guarantee of Home Rule; on the contrary, the latter problem would be solved on its own merits. These statements brought forth a storm of angry protests from the Nationalists, who declared that Lloyd George's words constituted a declaration of war on Ireland and that not a man would be had under compulsion. Mr. Devlin then moved an adjournment, which was defeated by 323 to 80, and the same evening, April 9, the War Power act, which will place at the disposal of the Government every able-bodied man from the age of eighteen to fifty, and in some cases to fifty-five, was introduced by a vote of 299 to 80. On April 13 the proposal of the Nationalists to omit the Irish Conscription clause from the bill was rejected in the House of Commons by a majority of 172, and the same day the clause was passed by a vote of 281 to 116. All this has lashed the Irish nation to fury. On April 9 the Dublin Corporation, by a vote of 39 to 30, warned the Government against any attempt to draft the Irish, and the Lord Mayor was requested to invite Messrs. Dillon, Devlin, De Valera, Griffith and representatives of the Irish Trades Union Congress to meet him in conference with a view to united resistance, and though Carson accepted conscription in the hope of preventing Home Rule, an Ulster delegation sent word to Dublin that Ulster would also resent the draft.

The Irish Bishops met in Dublin, amongst them many who favored recruiting, and issued a unanimous protest. T. P. O'Connor, at present in America, wired Lloyd George a "solemn warning that conscription would paralyze [Ireland's] friends and encourage [Ireland's] bitterest enemies in this country [America] and . . . render futile the best efforts of Irish leaders everywhere." Even such papers as the English Daily Chronicle protested against the measure as a blunder, and ex-Premier Asquith pleaded for moderation and time for serious consideration of the clause.

On April 12, while the clause against the draft was at its height, the Convention submitted its findings. There are a majority report carried by 44 to 29 and two minority reports, one by the Ulsterites, who submitted one scheme to the Convention, namely, the exclusion of Ulster, and one by a small group of Nationalists, who differed from the majority in only one important detail, namely, the control of customs, which the Nationalist minority would give to Ireland immediately. The majority report is summed up as follows:

Section 1. The Irish Parliament to consist of the King, Senate and House of Commons. Notwithstanding the establishment of an Irish Parliament, the supreme power and authority of the Parliament of the United Kingdom shall remain unaffected and undiminished over all persons, matters and things in Ireland and every part thereof. (Section carried by 51 to 18.)

Section 2. The Irish Parliament to have general powers to make laws for the peace, order, and the good government of Ireland. (Section carried 51 to 19.)

Section 3. The Irish Parliament to have no power to make laws on the following: Crown and succession, the making of peace and war, army and navy, treaties and foreign relations, dignities and titles of honor, necessary control of harbors for naval and military purposes, coinage, weights and measures, copyrights and patents. The Imperial and Irish Governments shall jointly arrange, subject to imperial exigencies, for the unified control of the Irish police and postal services during the war, provided that as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities the administration of these two services shall become subject to the Irish Parliament. (Section carried 49 to 16.)

Section 4. Restriction of the power of the Irish Parliament; prohibition of laws interfering with religious equality; a special provision protecting the position of Freemasons; a safeguard for Trinity College and Queens University; money bills to be founded only on a viceregal message; privileges and qualifications of the members of the Irish Parliament to be limited as in the act of 1914; rights of existing Irish officers to be safeguarded. (Section carried 46 to 15.)

Section 5. Constitutional amendments as in the act of 1914. (Section carried 46 to 15.)

Section 6. The executive power in Ireland to continue to be vested in the King, exercisable through the Lord Lieutenant on the advice of an Irish Executive Committee, as in the act of 1914. (Carried 45 to 15.)

Section 7. Dissolution of the Irish Parliament, as in the act of 1914. (Carried, 45 to 15.)

Section 8. Royal assent to bills, as in the act of 1914. (Carried, 45 to 15.)

Section 9. Constitution of the Senate as follows: One Lord Chancellor, four Bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, two Bishops of the Church of Ireland, one representative of the General Assembly, three Lord Mayors, of Dublin, Belfast, and Cork; fifteen peers resident in Ireland, elected by peers resident in Ireland; eleven persons nominated by the Lord Lieutenant; fifteen representatives of commerce and industry, four representatives of labor, one for each province; eight representatives of County Councils, two for each province. Total, 64. (Carried, 48 to 19.)

Section 10. Constitution of the House of Commons. The ordinary elected members shall number 160. The University of Dublin; the University of Belfast, and the National University shall each have two members, elected by graduates. Special representation shall be given to urban and industrial areas by grouping the smaller towns and applying to them a lower electoral quota than the rest of the country. The principle of proportional representation shall be observed wherever a constituency returns two or three members.

Forty per cent. of the membership in the House of Commons shall be guaranteed to the Unionists, and, in pursuance of this, twenty members shall be nominated by the Lord Lieutenant, with a view to due representation of interests not otherwise adequately represented in the provinces of Leinster, Munster and Connaught, and twenty additional members shall be elected by Ulster to represent commercial, industrial and agricultural interests; the nominated members to disappear in whole or in part after fifteen years. Extra Ulster representation is not to cease except on the decision of a three-fourths majority of both houses sitting together. The House of Commons shall continue for five years unless previously dissolved. (Carried, 45 to 20.)

Section 11. Money bills to originate only in the House of Commons, and not amendable by the Senate. (Carried, 45 to 22.)

Section 12. Disagreement between the houses to be solved by a joint sitting. (Carried, 45 to 22.)

Section 13. Representation in the British Parliament to continue. Irish representatives to have the right to deliberate and vote on all matters. Forty-two Irish representatives shall be elected to the British House of Commons. Irish representation in the British House of Lords to continue as at present until that chamber is remodeled, when that matter shall be reconsidered. (Carried, 44 to 22.)

Section 14. Finance-Irish exchequer and consolidated fund to be established; an Irish Controller and Auditor General to be appointed as in the act of 1914. If necessary, it should be declared that all taxes at present leviable in Ireland should continue to be levied and collected until the Irish Parliament otherwise decides. Necessary adjustments of revenue between Ireland and Great Britain during the transition should be made. (Carried, 51 to 18.)

Section 15. Control of customs and excise by the Irish Parliament to be postponed for further consideration until after the war, provided that the question shall be considered and decided by the United Kingdom. Parliament within seven years after the conclusion of peace. Until the question of the ultimate control of Irish customs and excise shall be decided, the United Kingdom's Board of Customs and Excise shall include persons nominated by the Irish Treasury. A joint Exchequer Board, consisting of two members nominated by the Imperial Treasury and two nominated by the Irish Treasury, with a Chairman appointed by the King, shall be set up to determine the true income of Ireland. Until the question of the ultimate control of the Irish customs and excise shall be decided, the revenue due to Ireland, as determined by the joint Exchequer Board, shall be paid into the Irish exchequer. All branches of taxation other than customs and excise shall be under the control of the Irish Parliament. (Carried, 38 to 30.)

Section 16. The principle of imperial contributions is approved. (Carried unanimously.)

Section 17. Accepts the report of the sub-Committee on Land Purchases. (Carried unanimously.)

Section 18. Deals with the judicial power similarly to the act of 1914. (Carried, 43 to 17.)

Section 19. The Lord Lieutenant shall not be a political officer. He shall hold office six years. Neither he nor the Lords nor Justices shall be subjected to any religious disqualification. His salary shall be sufficient to throw the post open to men of moderate means. (Carried, 43 to 17.)

Section 20. A Civil Service Commission consisting of representatives of the Irish universities shall formulate a scheme of competitive examinations for admission to the public service, and nobody shall be admitted to such service unless he holds a Civil Service Commission certificate. A scheme of appointments and salaries shall be prepared by a special commission, and no appointments shall be made until the scheme of this commission has been approved. (Carried, 42 to 18.)

Section 21. The Irish Government, if desired, may defer taking over the departments of Old Age Pensions, National Insurance, Labor Exchanges, Postal Savings Banks, and friendly societies. (Carried, 43 to 18.)

The concluding paragraph submitting the report to the Imperial Government was carried by 44 to 29. The Nationalist minority report, signed by such men as Archbishop Harty, Bishop O'Donnell of Raphoe and Joseph Devlin, advocates a Dominion system which would put all Irish affairs, including taxation, under the Irish Parliament, while leaving foreign relations, the army, the navy, the declaration of war and treaties of peace under the Imperial Parliament. This report presents a detailed argument for Irish control of taxation, suggests a British-Irish commission for commercial and postal matters, proposes an arrangement for imperial contribution by joint negotiations and insists that Ireland shall have the same power as the Dominions for providing local defense. Conscription without the sanction of the nation is denounced as impolitic, unjust and bound to end in disaster. The report further opposes membership in the British Parliament; it prefers a joint council, but waves objection and agrees to a delegation of forty-two members at Westminster. Agreement is expressed to a Unionist representation of forty per cent. in the Lower (Irish) House and the majority scheme for representation of the Southern Unionists. Postponement of vital problems till after the war is opposed. Ulster issued a protest signed by nineteen members of the Convention, including the Marquis of Londonderry, the Duke of Abercorn and the Lord Mayor of Belfast. The document is aimed principally at a distorted view of the Nationalists' minority report and protests:

(1) A sovereign independent Parliament for Ireland, co-equal in power and authority with the Imperial Parliament.

(2) Complete fiscal autonomy for Ireland, including the power of imposing tariffs and control of the excise, involving, as it would, the risk of hostile tariffs against Great Britain, the right of making commercial treaties with foreign countries, and full powers of direct taxation.

(3) The right to raise and maintain a military territorial force in Ireland.

(4) Repudiation of any liability for national debt, on the plea of overtaxation in Ireland in the past, but admitting the principle of a small annual contribution to the imperial expenditure.

(5) Denial of the right of the Imperial Parliament to impose military service in Ireland, unless with the consent of the Irish Parliament.

The report proceeds to reject as undemocratic the proposal that Ulster be represented in the House in excess of its population, and expresses fear that Sinn Fein would control Ireland under the Convention scheme.

Finland and the Vatican

Rome.—The newly etsablished Republic of Finland has opened direct diplomatic relations with the Holy See. On March 2 the three members of the delegation sent by the Finnish Government to convey to the Vatican the official announcement of the existence of the new Government were received by the Holy Father with all the honors due to official representatives of free and independent States. The delegates expressed the desire of their Government to enter into direct and friendly relations with the Holy See. The Pope acceded to their request with the utmost cordiality, and as a mark of his good-will, with his own hands conferred the decoration of the Grand Cross of St. Gregory on Messrs. Wolf and Kihlman, the heads of the delegation, and on the Secretary of the delegation the decoration of the Commendatore of the same order. The act of Finland is the more remarkable, as it is not a Catholic State, and this is one of the reasons why the Corriere d'Italia regards the Finnish Mission as one of the most significant in the whole history of the Church.

In its issue of March 16, the Civiltà Cattolica quotes a passage from the official note sent by the Military Administration of Austria-Hungary to the Holy See, which gives proof positive that it was at the solicitation of the Pope that the Italian prisoners, suffering from tuberculosis, were sent back to Italy during the months of January and February of the present year. In the quoted document the Austro-Hungarian Government begs the Holy Father to use his influence to have the prisoners of war, belonging to Austria-Hungary, but at that time held in Italy, restored to their own country. In the same issue attention is called to the fact that at the time that the Swiss Federal Council proposed an exchange of severely wounded prisoners, the Holy See addressed a formal proposal of the same nature to the belligerent powers. As a result of these efforts between March, 1915, and November, 1916, 8,668 French and 2,343 German prisoners passed through Switzerland on their way to their respective countries.

The Pope's Beneficence

Another proposal made by the Holy See to the Swiss Federal Council concerned the internment in Switzerland of less severely wounded prisoners and those who were suffering from permanent or temporary illness. The Swiss Government gladly accepted the proposal in May, 1915, and began negotiations with a view to carrying it out. Germany, in an official reply, dated August 25, 1915, declared that the Emperor "was in agreement with the good intentions of His Holiness, and accepted the principle of internment, leaving the conditions to be determined at a latetr date." Mgr. Marchetti, the then official representative of the Holy See at Berne, succeeded in arranging the final settlement, and on January 26, 1916, the first transfer of French and German tubercular prisoners to Switzerland took place, 100 from each side being interned.

As noted in AMERICA at the time, on the feast of St. Patrick, whether by a happy coincidence or by deliberate design, there took place in the hall of the Consistory in the Vatican, a ceremony which will long be remembered with grateful happiness not merely by the French and Irish, but by the whole Catholic world. In the presence of the Holy Father and many distinguished prelates, Mgr. Verde, Secretary of the Congregation of Rites, read the text of the decrees, technically called "De tuto," in which it was declared that the Commissions appointed by the Holy Father declared that in their opinion it was safe to proceed to the canonization of Blessed Margaret Mary Alocoque and to declare the fact of the martyrdom of the Venerable Oliver Plunkett, Archbishop of Armagh. After the reading of the decrees, Mgr. Virili, postulator of the cause of Blessed Margaret Mary, and Mgr. Riordan, rector of the Irish College and postulator for the cause of the Venerable Oliver Plunkett, expressed their thanks to the Holy Father for his gracious favor in acceding to their requests. Pope Benedict XV followed them and spoke words of praise and encouragement, which have just now reached America. Among other things, he said:

The Decrees "De tuto"

> We are grateful to the Lord for having given us the opportunity of manifesting today a new proof of our good-will toward the French nation, on which Margaret Mary Alocoque casts resplendent glory and over which she will extend her loving protection. We thank Him for having given us this occasion for testifying our heartfelt gratitude to the Irish people who have always been the strenuous defenders of the Catholic Church. We extend our thanks to God in no less a degree for enabling us to make public profession of our high esteem for the religious institute in which lives without change, the spirit of St. Francis de Sales, and for the college of our own city of Rome, which was merited to inscribe on the fairest page of its history the formation of Oliver Plunkett, not merely to the sanctity of the priesthood and the episcopacy, but also to the heroism of martyrdom.

Speaking of the coming canonization of Blessed Margaret Mary, the Pontiff developed the reasons which should urge fervent souls to cooperate with renewed energy in the spread of the devotion to the Sacred Heart. He referred to the response made throughout the world to his recommendations made recently that families should be consecrated to the Heart of Christ:

> We experience great joy at being able to express publicly the satisfaction we have felt on learning that since that time there has been a remarkable development of the practice of consecrating families to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. Among the bitternesses which from the very beginning have marked our Pontificate and through which it seems it must take its course, the Lord has made us at all times feel His paternal hand.

Pope Benedict insisted that the approaching canonization should give added impulse to practical devotion to the Sacred Heart, and drew from the martyrdom of the Irish prelate cogent reasons for the practice of strong Christian life.

At the end of His discourse the Holy Father rose and pronounced a benediction which deserves to be enshrined forever in Catholic memory:

> May the blessing of God descend in fulness on France, the cradle of Blessed Margaret Mary, and bring it to pass that from the land, in which appeared the first tiny spark of the devotion to the Sacred Heart, there may also come forth an unfailing example of constancy and fervor in this devotion, such as will rejoice not only the cloisters of the Visitation, but the entire Christian world.
> May the blessing of God be the recompense of the heroic people of Ireland, at all times strong in defense of Catholic truth, and give them today, the day consecrated to the glory of its great apostle, Saint Patrick, a foretaste of the joy, to be theirs at no distant date, of being able to claim the intercession of another son of Ireland.
> May the blessing of God be extended, in fine, to all the children of the Catholic Church, and keep them from ever forgetting the harmony that exists between the two decrees, published today by the Holy See; for if one affirms the theory, the other teaches the practice. If Blessed Margaret Mary demands of all of us fervor in devotion to the Sacred Heart, the Venerable Plunkett stimulates us by his example not to let ourselves be conquered by the difficulties we may encounter in striving for that end.

The date of the official act of the Holy Father by which these two heroic souls will be ceremoniously raised to the altar has not been announced.

The Supremacy of Conscience

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

A WRITER in the Seattle Post-Intelligencer, filled with the spirit of true patriotism and carried away by flaming indignation against conscientious objectors, recently allowed himself to be betrayed into enunciating a proposition which, in its unequivocal and unrestricted form, must be pronounced unethical. He says: "In all matters of national preservation the individual conscience must submit to the national conscience." These words sound strange in the ears of a people pledged to secure liberty for themselves and their posterity and committed to the belief that freedom, no less than life and happiness, is one of the inalienable rights of man.

By what show of consistency can we profess to be ready, as the President has so clearly and so truly professed us to be, to spend every resource at our disposal to bring liberty to strangers abroad, if in the same breath we deny to our citizens at home the most precious of all freedom? It has been the glory of our country that it has known how to conciliate individual liberty with State authority; and its success in so doing has come very largely from the recognition in actual practice of the principle that civil power, from its essential limitation, cannot licitly invade the sanctuary of conscience. This sanctuary has hitherto been respected in the United States; and it would be a disastrous step, directly militating against national welfare, if its unquestionable inviolability were to be disregarded. Even two such extremes as rationalism and the Catholic Church are agreed on the incompetence of the State to interfere in the relations of the citizen with God.

It so happens that in the matter of the war the national conscience of the American people is correct and furnishes a safe guide for the individual conscience. Undoubtedly the preponderance of public opinion, being so overwhelming, should give pause to every objector and furnish him with irresistible motives for reconsidering his own personal erroneous views and rectifying them in the light of right reason. It is not too much, therefore, to say that in the present instance the individual conscience would do well to listen to argument and conform to the national conscience; but this is far from saying that it must submit to it. The word, "must," at once raises the question, "By what compulsion?" and to this question no satisfactory answer is forthcoming.

National conscience is a very vague, elusive thing, difficult at all times to crystalize and by no means to be identified with the editorial views of an only too frequently venal press. If national conscience is taken to mean only the united opinion of the great mass of the people, it has no supremacy whatever over the individual conscience, for all men are equal and held to be equal before the State. Moreover, the mere fact that many men are agreed on a point of morals gives them no right to override the conscientious scruples of others. In all such matters the individual has a right to lay himself open to persuasion. He has also the right not to be forced.

The views of the majority are not endowed with infallibility as the writer of the article in the Post-Intelligencer seems to assume, an assumption certainly not warranted by the facts of history, and the less likely to have even a semblance of truth in a country where the right of private judgment is vindicated for every irresponsible thinker, and where it is becoming the fashion to rule God and His rights out of court, thus undermining the ultimate basis of responsibility, without which conscience is meaningless. Nor has national conscience, understood as the official expression of civil authority, full power to contravene the practical dictates of conscience.

The State can licitly restrain a man from performing actions which are clearly against the common good, as, for instance, the practice of polygamy or the driving of motor cars at excessive speed in crowded cities, but it cannot lawfully compel a man to do things which he conscientiously believes are forbidden by God. The consistency of the Menonites, who have shown themselves ready to perform every difficult and menial service in Fort Taylor, Louisville, shows their sincerity and entitles them to toleration of their religious reluctance to bear arms. They are in error concerning the question of right and wrong, but they are acting on the same principle as St. Agnes did when she braved both fire and sword rather than abjure her Christian faith, namely, that when conscience declares that the ordinances of God and the State conflict, God rather than man, must be obeyed.

In the scale of supremacy the State is superior to the individual but is inferior to God. As a consequence State rights, although they take precedence of individual rights, yield to those of God. Precisely, therefore, as the individual must bow before the law of the State, so must the State bow before the law of God. Once the mandate of the State has been promulgated, the citizen is bound to respect it; similarly once the mandate of God has been promulgated the State is obliged to respect it. From this appears the supremacy of conscience. Conscience promulgates to the individual in the concrete case the mandate of God, and bears the stamp of Divine authority. Consequently civil authority must respect it. For the State has no authority, except what it has received from God, and it is inconceivable that God should give the State authority to command what He Himself forbids.

In the abstract discussion of right and wrong, conscience is not the court of last appeal, nor indeed is unaided reason, as rationalists claim; the supreme arbiter of questions of morality is the Divinely-appointed, Divinely-enlightened Church, the guardian and interpreter of Revelation, which pronounces infallibly on questions, not merely of Faith, but of morals. Incalculable harm to the formation of correct views on right and wrong has been done to humanity by the repudiation on the part of the reformers of the supernatural guidance of the Church.

The Catholic can always appeal to the Church's higher wisdom when he has need to form his conscience; in many cases reason alone catches only broken lights of truth, but reason, enlighted by Faith, sees clearly and surely. Non-Catholics unfortunately have deprived themselves of the Church's direction; but for them, no less than for her own children, the Church vindicates the supremacy of conscience in concrete cases where the individual is face to face with the necessity of acting or abstaining from action. Her teaching, based upon the foundations of sound philosophy and Divine Revelation, maintains that if a man, having taken reasonable care to form his conscience on the morality of any action arrives at the prudent decision that he personally is bound, by what he understands to be God's will in the matter, to perform or omit the action, he has the right of following this practical dictate of his conscience without let or hindrance from outside influences, provided the performance or omission of the action in question does not violate the rights of others or involve serious injury to the community. The reason for this teaching is that the action, no matter what may be its objective morality, takes on its subjective moral complexion in the concrete case from the reasoned judgment of the individual conscience, and it goes without saying that a man may not do, nor be compelled to do, what he, here and now, thinks —it may be erroneously—involves sin; for the malice of sin is in the will which is ready to do what the intellect judges to involve an offense against God.

The philosophical basis of this statement is not hard to grasp. Man has the strict obligation, arising from his relation of creature to the Creator, of rendering to God homage and service and glory, an obligation from which he cannot be emancipated even by the Supreme Being, much less by any inferior power. This he does by observing the moral law. This moral law is manifested to him in the concrete case by the practical dictate of his conscience. He has therefore the obligation of following the dictates of his conscience, not indeed a doubtful conscience or an erroneous conscience which he has not taken reasonable care to form correctly, but a certain, prudential, or even an inculpably erroneous, conscience. Now every obligation implies a corresponding right. It follows therefore that the obligation of obeying one's conscience carries with it the right to do so.

Freedom from compulsion in following outwardly the dictates of conscience is necessary for the moral well-being and the moral dignity of every person, and for the attainment of the end for which he was created. It flows from the very nature of man, and hence cannot be abdicated; it comes from the very essence of the intelligent being by the very fact of his creation and destiny; it is an unassailable gift of God, not a concession of the State nor the result of a convention entered into by the citizens; and hence it is independent of the State and superior to any merely human legislative power. Liberty of conscience, therefore, in its proper sense, and not of course in any of the broad meanings of the word which are practically synonymous with license, is a right of which a man may not licitly be deprived. It is just such well-meant but false, or at least ambiguous, statements as that made by the writer of the article under discussion that tend to break down the morals of the country and to pave the way for anarchy and despotism. No democracy is safe that does not respect the supremacy of conscience.

Feminism and Gargoyles

GEORGE D. BULL, S. J.

TO the average feminist the most absorbing part of a Gothic cathedral would be, we imagine, not the arches nor the angels, but the gargoyles, for feminism seems to have a predilection for distortion.

If we are to believe the movement, woman's real history is something very like this: Ages ago when the race was young man secured the advantage over woman during the physical helplessness of confinement. This position he improved with such zeal and skill that, as generations went on, woman receded further and further from her primeval plane of equality, more and more learned or was forced to learn dependence on man, until beneath his inexorable tyranny, not only her mind and qualities of soul, but even her very physique gradually changed and the "weaker sex" was introduced to the world. No occupation which required more than a modicum of assertiveness was allowed her, no relaxation which would take her from the home was countenanced, until the tradition grew that "woman's place was the home." From a being as free, as assertive as man, as strong physically, as keen mentally, she became a creature blunted in intellect, stunted in body, with but one sphere, the home; with but one occupation, to mend and patch what man had broken and torn; with but one human function, to bear his children and aid his race to inherit the earth. If woman protested, man was ever ready with a rod or a reason, or finally, we are told, with a creed, to keep her quiet. In some ages the rod predominated and woman was a slave; in others the reasons, the soft excuses that lured her from her birthright of equality, as in the Middle Ages, and set her apart to be worshiped and further softened, dressed in silks and jewels that her body might be the more desirable to him who owned it and held it in his sway.

Of this long history modern woman is the heir, and her status today, though veneered by many a soft layer of external difference, is still the same; she is a drudge or a doll, or both, but a human being free to develop her own personality she is not. Her subjection begins in the home, it is carried on in the school, where, by such things as feminine modesty, gentleness, and so on, she is prepared to accept her allotted place as an inferior, a "clinging vine about the sturdy oak—man." A thousand times a day is this inferiority, in various ways, kept before her eyes. The deference of men, the rising, the bowing, the very garments she is forced to wear, are badges of her subjection.

Now grotesque as this picture is—and surely to the non-feminist it can appear as nothing else—it fairly represents, I think, what is at least implicit in the writings of the most typical feminists. The distortion of woman's history, nature and present status are unquestionably evident, yet to attempt to pry what truth the picure may contain from the absurdity surely present would be about as useful as attempting to trace the lines of the normal human countenance in the weird features of a gargoyle. Who, for instance, could find in this feministic picture the hitherto accepted glory of woman's status in the Middle Ages? Woman was raised aloft, but only that her serene simple presence might be the star that would lead men to the noblest and best on earth; she was set apart, but only in the sense that as queen of life's tournament she was spared the blood and blare of the mêlée.

But it is feminism's view of the modern, rather than of the medieval woman, which best illustrates this inherent predilection for distortion. One example out of many possible must suffice. Feminism is fond of pointing to certain figures in modern society and of finding in society's attitude towards them strong justification for its own existence and for its sworn object to "emancipate woman." It points to the woman in the shop and cries "dependence," it singles out the woman in the home and shrieks "repression," and when it comes to the woman who has fallen, it rings the changes on a single word, "injustice." Woman, it will tell you, either marries, in modern society, or she does not. If she does, she surrenders perforce independence of personality even as she surrenders her name; if she does not, she is denied the open use of one of the most fundamental of human faculties, sex, and if caught in its surreptitious use, becomes an outcast from society, while her male partner may admit his guilt with a grin of impunity. Here, it will tell you, is the very essence of injustice. But here, we make bold to echo, is a striking example of the defect in feministic vision.

In the crime of the woman who surrenders honor, it sees nothing but the inequality of society's attitude between her and the man. It has focussed its attention on the penalty, not on the sin, and is not so much concerned as was the hero in the "Mikado," that the "punishment fit the crime," as that one criminal should have no advantage in sinning not conceded to another. This is a situation so fundamentally awry, so curiously distorted that it almost defies delineation. It is as though Bill Sikes or Fagin came before society and complained that he had neither the opportunity for plying his trade nor, when apprehended, caused the same stir as his more genteel counterpart, Raffles. Or again it is as though De Quincey's artistic murderer, Williams, should cry "injustice" at receiving no better treatment than a common bungling throat-cutter. The complaint would be no more naive, the cry "injustice" no more grotesque than the feministic attitude on the double standard. In both cases the viewpoint is the same—a vision focussed not on the proportion between the penalty and the wrong done, but upon the personality of the wrongdoers; a curious parade in the limelight of people usually glad to shun even daylight; above all, a mentality so impervious to incongruity that it can actually see injustice, even in inequality to sin. So strange is the situation, so at variance with the normal, that it would be ludicrous were it not for what it implies as to the state of the public conscience. Certainly no more unswerving index of defective moral vision can be found than this: That a movement can arise, exist, and even prosper, which, in the dreadful position of the "woman living outside the law," can find nothing to mention—not the crime against society, not the perversion of a faculty, not the degradation of the whole human nature, nothing except that she is a victim—the victim of "injustice."

These two instances, then, the history of woman as implicit in feministic writers, and the feministic attitude on the "double standard" will illustrate that quality of feministic writing which, for want of a better name, I have called "distortion." Though it has many forms, some more or less tangible, others defying expression, no one can go very far into the pages of Ellis or Key and be for long unconscious of its presence. It is an intellectual irritant, a kind of mental alkali dust, in the atmosphere of which the non-feministic reader simply writhes with the constant necessity of ever separating the true from the false and of rescuing the sane from the absurd.

It remains now to point out one inevitable conclusion from what has thus far been said. If feminism distorts what it looks upon, then much of its cry for "emancipation" is baseless; the enslaved woman whom feminism is seeking to free does not exist. She is for the most part a phantom. Feminism has simply misread the facts.

But here, obviously, it may be objected: "If feminism is concerned with a phantom, why object to the movement at all? If we have in feminism only another Don Quixote and the mill, why give it any serious attention?"

Bernard Shaw, a feminist of extraordinary frankness, has given the answer—a gem of truth flashing from as black a setting of falsehood as was ever penned. In "the womanly woman," he says, "a whole basketful of ideals of the most sacred character will be smashed by the achievement of equality for women and men." Here is the reason why we may not ignore feminism. For the movement may, after all, theorize, but it does not live and operate in a realm of imagination. It may find the reason for its existence in a phantom, but the subject matter of its efforts is real existing womanhood. Feminism, in practice, whatever it may be in theory, is not tilting with a mill; it is meddling with the most sacred relations of human life,—principally with the relation of one man and one woman bound irrevocably in the sacredness of the home. The world cannot allow these ideals to go because feminism is having a nightmare any more than it could allow an astygmatic barbarian to blow down a Reims because he saw only a gargoyle. There are abuses in the modern woman's status; all men do not live, with regard to woman, the ideals Christian civilization puts before them; there is work to do, and possibly feminism might help to do it; but only if it corrects its viewpoint, only if it looks not to the gargoyles, but with broader vision, aloft to the arches and the angels.

The Cardinal of Reims

Comtesse de Courson

AMONG the great Churchmen of France, who have earned the lasting regard of their countrymen, is a venerable Cardinal, who bravely keeps guard over his ruined cathedral under the fire of the enemy. His Eminence, Cardinal Luçon, Archbishop of Reims, is well over seventy, but, like his colleague and fellow-worker Dr. Lauglet, Mayor of Reims, his physical vigor seems equal to his moral endurance. These two old men are the moving spirits of the half-ruined city, many of whose inhabitants cling tenaciously to their homes and stoutly refuse to seek any other place of safety. Dr. Lauglet governs them with the quiet authority of former and happier times, and keeps up the old traditions of order and discipline, despite the German shells. As far as he can, he repairs day by day, the damage done to the houses and streets by the bombs. Owing to the dearth of able-bodied men and the menace constantly overshadowing Reims, he cannot attempt to rebuild the ruined buildings, but the streets are regularly cleared of the debris and every attempt is made to secure that sense of order, self-respect and cleanliness that goes far to make men's spirits better and brighter.

The Mayor watches over the material interests of his much-tried city, the Cardinal over its spiritual welfare. United by their common love of Reims and their fearless devotion to duty they remain at their respective posts faithful to a task, which in these days, has a tragic meaning.

Since the beginning of the war the Cardinal has only once been absent for a few weeks from his archiepiscopal city. This was at the end of August, 1914, when his duties as a member of the Sacred College called him to Rome for the election of the new Pope. There he heard of the invasion of France by the enemy and of the entrance of the Germans into Reims. On September 3, 1914, the election of Benedict XV took place and that same day, Cardinal Luçon had an audience with the Holy Father and begged permission to return to France immediately, without waiting for the new Pontiff's coronation. He explained that delay might prevent his reentering Reims. The permission was given, and he started homewards. He arrived in Paris on September 9, during the battle of the Marne, and reached his archiepiscopal residence two days after the enemy had withdrawn from the town.

In speaking of those days he often alludes to the intense anxiety which made him lean out of his motor, to catch a glimpse of his beloved Reims. When the twin towers of the cathedral appeared, a great wave of joy swept over him. On entering the town his joy turned to sorrow. The enemy's guns had begun their work. The streets already bore the marks of the shells, and a crowd of refugees were making their way to less dangerous zones. At the sight of their distress the Cardinal got out of his motor and surrounded by his people made his way to the cathedral. Blackened by fire and stricken by the bombs, it was still standing, a vision of tragic grandeur. The Cardinal had much to learn from his children of the events that had taken place during his absence. He was told that his coadjutor, Mgr. Neveny, was a hostage in the enemy's hands, that his priests, Mgr. Landrieux, the present Bishop of Dijon, at their head, had heroically saved the lives of the German prisoners who were sheltered in the cathedral. The enemy's shells had set fire to the great basilica. The wounded Germans were removed by the little band of priests, almost in spite of the protests of the inhabitants of Reims, infuriated at the shelling of their cathedral, over which floated the Red Cross flag.

Since then, the venerable Cardinal has remained at his post. In the space of one month his house was struck eleven times by the enemy's shells. He succeeded, however, in saving the episcopal archives. When the bombardment is more violent he takes shelter in the cellar. Every day he visits the cathedral. Generally accompanied by his coadjutor the old man makes his pilgrimage to the shrine so dear to him, counts the wounds of the noble edifice and, as far as lies in his power, has the damage repaired. The rest of his day is spent among the stricken people or the soldiers, who keep guard in and around Reims. Many of his friends or colleagues have been killed at his side. Seven of the city churches are hopelessly injured and all the churches of his diocese on the fighting front are in ruins. Nevertheless "My priests are at their post," adds the Cardinal with fatherly pride, "and are fulfilling their parochial duties as best they can, under tremendous difficulties." No wonder that the people of Reims cling to their Archbishop.

When some portion of the town has been more violently attacked by the German guns, he hastens to the spot where the people crowd around him: "Thank you for coming here," they say, "we want your encouragement." The Cardinal then visits the ruined houses, reassures the survivors and prays with them by the side of their dead. When some of the inhabitants decide to leave they find it difficult to say good-by to their Archbishop. After a terrible bombardment in April, 1917, the Mayor prevailed upon a certain number of families to leave Reims. Cardinal Luçon went to bid them farewell. "Come with us," they urged as they pressed around the venerable figure. "You know that I must remain," was the answer. "My duty is to stay at my post." "But you will be killed and we shall never see you again." "God is the Master, my children," and the Cardinal tore himself away from the departing exiles, who clung to his hands as if they could not bear to lose him. One of the strongest bonds between the Archbishop and his flock is their common love for their noble cathedral. "My people," he says, "are more distressed by the damage done to it than by their own personal loss."

The soldiers quartered in and around the city bring into the Archbishop's strenuous life a ray of joy and consolation. "During these terrible years I owe to them the greatest joys of my ministry," says the old man. In recognition of his services the military authorities made the Cardinal honorary chaplain of a certain regiment. The regiment has lately been honored by the distinction of la fourragère, a badge awarded only for exceptional services, and the Cardinal is now entitled to wear it on his red robe. He also wears the Cross of the Legion of Honor, presented to him on June 17, 1917, by President Poincaré. That same day a hail of shells deluged Reims and the ceremony took place in a cellar. There were no flowers, no music, no speeches, only a few whispered words from the President speaking in the name of France to the Cardinal, who so bravely upholds the honor of the Church by his fidelity to a supreme and dangerous duty.

The Archbishop makes it a rule never to leave his shattered city except to visit the soldiers quartered in the neighborhood, or the military hospitals situated within a short distance. In November, 1917, however, he visited Paris and was present at the annual meeting of the Catholic University. In his opening speech, Cardinal Amette, had a special greeting for his venerable visitor from Reims, "Who, for the last three years, has faced the bombs and shells, close to his mutilated cathedral and close to his people. Like the good pastor, he refuses to desert his flock when it is attacked by the enemy." Mgr. Baudrillart, in his report of the work done by the Catholic professors and pupils during the last year, also did homage to the venerable Cardinal. What adds considerably to the interest of Cardinal Luçon's personality is his extreme simplicity. "I did my duty only," was his answer to President Poincaré, when the latter congratulated him on his noble conduct during the last three years. He owned that when the Legion of Honor was pinned to his red robe, his thoughts went out to the priests, nuns and civilians of Reims, his fellow-sufferers, to whom he attributed a large share of the honor conferred upon him. As for the fourragère, bestowed upon him by the soldiers, the distinction gave him unqualified pleasure. "The men whom I have seen at work for the last three years, thereby made me their humble pastor, their equal and I am proud to be considered by them as a Cardinal and a soldier."

May the venerable Archbiship live long enough to hear a Te Deum of thanksgiving echo under the shattered roof of his cathedral. Such is the wish of all those who know what his presence meant at Reims in the days of its great sorrow and agony.

Catholics and Social Legislation

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S. J.

"IT'S coming yet, for a' that," Burns sang in a fine elation of triumphant optimism, "That man to man, the warld o'er, shall brothers be for a' that!" To make this possible, religion must doubtless be the prime influence in the lives of men. Without it there can never be any true brotherhood of man. But after religion itself, and prompted and directed by it, the most potent means at our command is social legislation.

Brotherhood is the thought uppermost in the minds of all today. It has never been fully realized in any epoch of modern history except among the early Christian communities and in certain periods of the Ages of Faith. We cannot hope to restore it again except by the reunion of all men in the one true Fold of Christ. So will all mankind be one in Him. But while our best efforts should be given to bringing about this happy consummation, we may not pause in our social labors while we are striving to attain that supreme end. The immediate remedy, ready at hand, is social legislation animated by the spirit of Christ and of His Church. For such legislation we shall find the entire world receptive.

No social legislation can ever be final. Economic conditions are in a constant state of fluctuation, and periods of tranquility are followed by renewed contests of conflicting interests. There have been centuries of comparative rest, when social adjustments had been satisfactorily established by law and the status of industry and commerce changed but slightly. On the other hand there have been critical periods when entire phases of economic life or the entire economic system of nations, or of the civilized world itself, imperatively called for a reconstruction. After a sudden and violent struggle and at the cost of a deluge of blood, or else peacefully and in the silent lapse of years, a new social order rose out of the old. Today the world is apparently entering into another great climacteric. A clear historic retrospect is needed if we would rightly face the possibilities of the future.

The hour of such a change had struck when at the dawn of modern history, at a time when centralized governments were unknown and industrial life had not yet begun in the renascent civilization, the early European farmers, unable to protect themselves against piratic invasions and in constant danger from marauders, sought shelter under the shadow of some powerful stronghold and rendered personal service in return for their safety. In the same manner their own lords found it necessary to give fealty to still mightier overlords, and thus an organized resistance against all foes and disturbers of the peace was made possible. So the feudal system arose with its undoubted benefits and its obvious evils, yet withal an economic necessity of those turbulent days.

But the time came when the evils of the system began to outweigh its benefits. The villeins fled into the rapidly growing cities and the gilds arose with their high ideals of a free Christian manhood. The hour of a second transformation had struck. Yet at first the complete change became effective in the cities alone. Often the freedom of the craft gilds was won only after periods of violence and bloodshed; in other instances, as in England, a quiet and peaceful development took place. A further crisis, however, was inevitable. It came with the peasants' war that followed hard upon the awful havoc of the Black Death, comparable only to this world-war itself, no less universal and no less terrible in its destruction of human life.

In all the preceding economic crises, which far outweighed in importance the political struggles of kings and nations, social legislation had been the one means, after religion itself, of securing peace and prosperity to all classes. The more perfectly this legislation was adapted to each changing economic period and the more perfectly it applied the unalterable Christian principles of justice and charity, the happier was the entire population.

A new and momentous crisis awaited the world at the very period of the Reformation. It was not in any way connected with the latter, but arose inevitably out of the economic circumstances of the time, the invention of machinery and the immense growth of the city population, not to mention other similar conditions that vitally affected the methods of production, and consequently called for the most sweeping changes in social legislation. The elements for a peaceful readjustment were not wanting and could be found in the existing gilds. But the Reformation rendered this readjustment impossible and delayed for almost four centuries the needed social legislation which might at once have obviated all the social misery and economic chaos that was to follow. Nothing indeed could have been more foreign to the gild principles than "The concentration of so many branches of trade in the hands of a few individuals," as Pope Leo XIII. described the economic situation which resulted, "so that a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the masses of the poor a yoke little better than slavery itself."

This four-century-long retardation and retrogression of social legislation, this casting-back of the masses into a new state of industrial serfdom far worse than the old from which they had been freed, this degradation of labor from the exalted dignity to which it had attained in the ages of Catholic Faith, was due to the false individualism which came as a consequence of the Reformation. Directly it was brought about by the paralysis inflicted upon the gilds.

Robbed by the "reformed" autocracies of the time, that found in Protestantism a most advantageous economic ally, the gilds were not merely deprived of those immense possessions, which, though consecrated to religion, had been in great part devoted to charity, but they were above all things debarred from the religious influences that had been the mainspring of their enlightened social legislation. Thus, in England, they became little more than convenient spoils for king, queen, or court favorites. Highly approved methods were invented of turning their revenues into sources of private emolument for these exalted patrons. Hence the impossibility of meeting the new social conditions by fitting social legislation and adapting to new economic developments the old principles of religion, brotherhood and co-operation. The powers of economic legislation were retained exclusively in the hands of the rich, who used them for their own purposes of exploitation.

The fact is that today we are taking up the thread of social legislation precisely where it was broken off at the Reformation. We are seeking to apply to the changed conditions of our time the principles of brotherhood and co-operation which the Church applied in her gilds 400 years ago, and which have been ignored during the intervening period in our dominant economic system of industry and commerce. But how shall this be done without the aid of the Church?

The danger of radicalism, never greater than in periods like the present, can be met in no other way than by constructive legislative action. It is a folly to imagine that it can be destroyed by legal repression. Remove the crime of profiteering and the edge is taken from anarchism. The cure must begin with attacking the source of the evil. In the same way Socialism cannot be fought intelligently by directly assailing its principles and ignoring the corresponding ethical unsoundness of the capitalistic system. Both extremes are equally reprehensible and perilous. Both are equally opposed to all true rights of property and individual liberty. In adhering rigidly to our Catholic principles, in preventing by sound legislation the future concentration of wealth in the hands of a few, in promoting anew our ideals of co-operation and of the widest possible diffusion of ownership among the many, we shall not merely follow our Catholic pre-Reformation traditions, but we shall find ourselves in agreement with the ablest minds of our day. More than all this, we shall be in advance of our own age, the heralds of a new era of social justice through Christian legislation.

History has taught us her lesson. If the world is indeed entering into a period of great economic changes, as all admit, it is important that we ourselves direct these changes along peaceful lines and towards Christian ideals. It is not an optional task, but a duty which confronts the Church. Thus shall we be able to preserve the world from the bloody cataclysms of the past which have so frequently preceded the epochs of economic transitions.

No mere surface legislation will suffice today. We must boldly strike at the very root of economic evils. Why attempt merely to strike off the hydra-heads of innumerable secondary evils instead of reaching the very heart of the social injustice? We do not want a multiplicity of laws that defeat their own purpose, but measures of such far-reaching and vital importance as the legal minimum wage. Similar fundamental legislation will apply to shares and the direction of industries, to taxation of incomes and profits, to the unearned increment and other primary questions. In all these problems the clear teaching of the Church is imperatively needed at the present moment, and nothing in the whole range of social science will prove so thoroughly satisfactory as that teaching itself, even to the most genuinely progressive men and women of our time. It would be a fatality as well as a folly for Catholics to overlook their immense possibilities at this critical period of world history, when civilization is being shaped anew. Shall it be formed on the anvil of Marx or shall we provide that it may be wisely fashioned by the loving hands of Christ?

On the Road to Rome

JOSEPH F. WICKHAM

AS you come up from Naples toward the Empire City on the Tiber, a strange silence steals over you; not the silence of weariness, but the stillness of thoughtful mien in the realization that in a few brief hours you are to appear in the presence of majestic Rome. And as you roll along over the fertile plains, past harvests that will ripen again before the twelve-month counts itself a year, you have but a divided gazing for the cities and hamlets and all the towers and busy haunts of men. The smoke-wreathed cone of the ancient hill of Vesuvius is behind you, and you look back no more. All the smiles of the sunny southland are receding into memory's unladen recesses, and all the laughing voices of idyllic days are sounding their gayety in spirit-halls that are moving farther and farther from the living hour. Not forgotten for a moment are the gladness and the laughing and the song, but yielding their places to other guests. For Rome is in your heart, Rome and Cæsar. Rome and Cæsar, conquest and triumph, majesty and power, warring hosts and victorious eagles, empire of land and submission of seas, the world. This is the burden of your silent thought. And you are picturing the Colosseum and the Forum when Caserta and old Capua are flashing by you, and it is the river of the Eternal City you seem to see when the Volturno falls into view, dragging its dark-grey waters toward the Tuscan sea, past orchards and vineyards unsurpassed on the soil of Europe. The spell of thought is broken, perhaps, when you behold green mountains, sun-kissed and shadow-laden, rearing themselves loftily, and grouping their fantastic earthworks in chains of billowy hills. For on the breast of one stands the watcher of fourteen centuries. St. Benedict's monastery of Monte Cassino, the far-famed temple of devotion and learning whose light has never paled. And Aquino wakes the train of remembrance, and the Angelic Doctor is speaking once again the truths of philosophy in the tones of old that make things heard full as mighty as things seen. So you will go, through many a lovely valley, and through ancient cities nestling happily in the hills, Ferentino and Segni and Palestrina that used to call itself Praeneste, and a host more; and they are worth an undistracted watching. But all the time you are sharing your heart with Rome. And then the Via Appia in the grey distance. The city at last. Salve, Roma!

The Via Appia first, and it is not unjust that the Eternal City should offer her old majestic road as the primal gift of her heart. For your mind is with hosts unconquered and triumphs of fallen emperors and pageants of days of fighting men and man-made gods. And so the Via Appia gives them to you. Even through the hazy distance you seem to hear the measured tramping of uncounted thousands of shield-slung warriors and the clanking of iron sabers, and in imagination you see the sun flashing on burnished breast-plates, and the silver eagles carried aloft proclaiming a Roman victory, victory, nothing but victory. A thousand thousand Romans, men and women and youths and maidens gay, are crying their aves to brother and lover and husband, as the well-trained troops of the Empire swing by in procession with the sweep and dash and irresistible vigor and firmness that have won themselves the spoil of a hundred cities, and made their leader the greatest man in the world. Back they are marching from Spain or Africa or Asia, back they are coming victors, always victors. Golden treasure for Roman coffers, golden jewels for Roman matrons, golden empire for Roman glory, golden coronets for Roman Cæsar. For where Cæsar was, there was victory, and where conquest was, there was Cæsar, this was empire's meaning. Marius had marched down that road, and the vengeful Sulla, and the famous Pompey, but Cæsar was the greatest, and the greatest brought empire and world-sway and the fulness of glory. For seven-hundred years Rome had fought for it all, and now it was hers. And her champion refused the proffered crown and won death. For so are men ever unjust.

But this is only one tiny picture in all the wonderful romance of Rome, and it is but your day-dream as you faintly catch the outline of the Appian Way. But this afternoon when you are hiding from the sirocco weather in your hotel overlooking the giardino of Queen Margherita upon the Pincian hill, you will begin somewhere near the beginning of the story, and every day, perhaps, come a bit closer to patching together the warp and woof of Roman days and Roman ambitions and the toiling and the moiling of a sturdy people to achieve a greatness that was never thrust upon them; a greatness that measured the span of seven centuries to attain; a greatness that was born amid the sand-swept heat of African tropics, that was wrung from shivering bivouacs under the cold stars of Gaul, that was won amid sinking galleys when the tumult of half-mad sailors rose above the desolate moaning of a pitiless sea; a greatness that they battled for and wept for and prayed for, men and women, old and young, and that finally, when they had spent their souls and wearied their social sinews, when the worm of decay was creeping into their hearts and the game was well-nigh played out, they attained.

Prohibition and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As the Hon. Dudley Wooten, a lawyer of many years of honorable service at the bar, has pointed out in AMERICA, the contention of S. L. B. to the effect that the Constitution of the United States is "an instrument of grants and not of limitations" is a conclusion "not debated by competent lawyers and publicists." Nor does this conclusion show any undue sympathy with the late "Jeff Davis," lamented or deplored, according to sympathy or birth-place. For the Tenth Amendment says clearly:

> The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

I am therefore at a loss to understand how Father Kenny in his excellent article, "Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass," can accuse S. L. B. of giving utterance to "recrudescences of the ante-secession period." Equally groundless, so it seems to me, is his characterization of Father Blakely's contention that "as far as the Constitution of the United States is concerned, the States are free to establish any or prohibit any religion." The contention may not be correct, but as it is upheld by so respectable an authority as Zollmann in his recent "American Church Law," as well as by older authors, it can hardly be termed "fantastic." Furthermore, it is clear that the First Amendment lays an inhibition upon Congress only.

In this precise respect, I think, Father Kenny hardly does justice to the arguments advanced by S. L. B., and others. With a wealth of historical learning, he proves conclusively that Congress has always favored the free exercise of religion, for without a single exception, his citations refer to acts by Congress, not by the States. But S. L. B., Mr. Wooten, Mr. Elder, and others who have written on this subject in AMERICA, never dreamed of saying that Congress was in the habit of passing acts in restraint of freedom in religious belief, or of practices consistent with public order. They read the inability of Congress to do this very thing, in the First Amendment.

"Slopping Over"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the closing paragraph of J. E.'s "Slopping Over" communication in AMERICA for March 9, commenting on the recording of Catholic activities in war-work, he advises: "Let us make the sacrifice demanded of us willingly, wholeheartedly, uncomplainingly. But let us quit 'slopping over.'" Needless to say this advice is superfluous. The numbers in which our Catholic men are going to the front prove a willingness and a wholeheartedness that needs no urging, and as to "complaining," I fail to see where it comes in. What he calls "slopping over," I call "rubbing it in." The angle from which one views the matter has much to do with the name you call it. Bigotry or ignorance has long been doing the "slop-over" act, by persistent misrepresentation of Catholic standards, especially our attitude towards patriotism, and now that the occasion has arisen to prove our position, now that our Catholic young men are eagerly and cheerfully pressing to the front in numbers far surpassing their proportion to the population, I see no reason why such a fact should not be emphasized, not only with a like persistence but, for a good reason, with double insistence. "Rub it in." Good oil and wine should not be lost in these Hooverizing days, on the gangrenous wounds caused by disappointment in the vitriolic minds of muck-rakers and mud-slingers. Shout to them rather from the housetop, reminding them of their misrepresentations. By all means "rub it in."

Ireland's Fate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have often wondered why I cannot see the objects of the war as others seem to see them; and your editorial, "England, Ireland and America," has set me wondering again.

I wonder why I cannot see as you do that "The war is ours for freedom's sake, that small nations as well as large may enjoy the right of self-determination, and thus work out their destiny according to high purposes." And also why I cannot see that we are fighting to obtain for Ireland the right to determine for herself whether she shall remain within or without England's empire; that we are fighting that Irishmen may enjoy, even within the empire, the measure of freedom necessary for national prosperity.

I doubt that our Government is willingly going to interfere between England and Ireland in any way whatever. That is my belief, and it is founded on authority and reason. My authority is our President. In his message of January 8, there is no general statement about the right of self-determination, such as was in his previous messages. In that message he says all Russian territory must be evacuated; Belgium must be evacuated; all French territory must be freed, and the wrong done to France in the matter of Alsace-Lorraine must be righted. Italy is to get Austrian territory, and the peoples that go to make the Austrian empire are to be given the freest opportunity of autonomous development. Rumania, Servia and Montenegro must be evacuated. Nationalities, other than Turkish, now under control of the Turk, must be accorded autonomous development. Poland must be freed and made independent. "What about Ireland?" Nothing, not a word. In the message of January 8 we have specification, not, as in previous messages, general statements. It is true generality again appears in the message of February 11, in the statements:

> That peoples and provinces are not to be bartered about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were mere chattels and pawns in a game, even the great game, now forever discredited, of the balance of power; but . . . . . every territorial settlement involved in this war must be made in the interest and for the benefit of the populations concerned, and not as part of any mere adjustment or compromise of claims amongst rival states; and . . . . . all well defined national aspirations shall be accorded the utmost satisfaction that can be accorded them without introducing new or perpetuating old elements of discord and antagonism that would be likely in time to break the peace of Europe and consequently of the world.

But in the forepart of this message, February 11, he speaks only of the peoples, provinces and territory the Central Powers and their allies control, and, inferentially, these are the only peoples, provinces and territory that are not to be bartered, and whose national aspirations are to be accorded the utmost satisfaction. Evidently he means by "every territorial settlement involved in this war," what the Evening Post calls territory "dislocated" by the war. Ireland, therefore, by intentional omission is eliminated.

England will never consent to Ireland's independence; nor will she consent to all Ireland home rule so long as the Carsons continue their opposition. It is inconceivable that England appealed to our Government for aid without assurance that such help would not mean even official suggestion, "frankly and in the public view," that Ireland be accorded the right of self-determination. It is almost preposterous to think England would hail our deciding participation in the war, if there were no understanding there would be no interference in what Ian Hay euphemistically calls England's domestic trouble.

It may be that indirectly through our participation in the war Irishmen in Ireland will be given the right to determine the political future of their country; but, if so, it will be the result of the efforts of the Irish race in America, and I am wondering if the English tradition with respect to the Irish will permit of those efforts being efficacious. What is that tradition? Why, pick up almost any book written by an Englishman, and many Americans, for that matter, that touches on Ireland and you will find the tradition. It is that the Irishman is warm-hearted, hospitable, and witty; slothfully indolent, thriftless, a lover of inebriety and quarrels; impatient and unhappy under restraint of law and order; temperamentally and religiously unfitted for self-government; mentally superficial; intellectually brilliant, but unstable and an impracticable visionary. The last places I found this English Irishman were in the "Oppressed English," and "The Soul of Ulster." W. F. Monypenny has this Irishman in "The Two Irish Nations"; he is utterly opposed to home rule, but tries to be fair, and says:

> There are, indeed, many defects in the character of Irishmen, and not confined to those who live south of the Boyne; but of all such defects history, and that too, comparatively recent history, supplies the sufficient explanation. To fix our eyes for the moment on the larger Irish nation, if the people of that nation are prone to violence and deficient in respect for law, it is because for a long period law was for them constituted injustice and violence their only resource; if they are idle, it is because they were denied the fruits of their industry; if in politics they are wanting in the practical spirit, it is because they were so long shut off from the realities of government; if they surrender themselves too readily to demagogues and agitators, it is because they were deprived of the guidance of their natural leaders; if their patriotism takes other forms than allegiance to the kingdom or empire in which they live, it is because they were long taught to feel as aliens within them. "Tout comprendre c'est tout pardonner," and the student of Irish history will be able to extend some tolerance even to their crimes.

Now this English picture of the Irishman has been drawn times innumerable for centuries; and, although it is untrue, the English and Scotch and many Americans believe it, and so do many Irish. No Irishman need accept this picture of his countrymen on the say so of anyone, least of all those who condemn Ireland and all things Irish, yet many do. The writer left Scotland, after living the first fourteen years of his life there, with this picture thoroughly impressed on his immature mind. The number of full grown Irishmen he has met since Easter Week, 1916, who are permeated with this tradition is—well, irritating; and their permeation is exposed by their depreciation of an independent Ireland, then shrinking with dread at the thought of Irishmen in Ireland governing their native land. Unthinking men may believe anything; and it would seem that from the English traditional Irishman not all thinking men of the Irish race escape. For have we not Dr. Walsh telling us his race are prone to violence and deficient in respect for law, by saying that if there had been Irish-Americans present at a meeting in Buffalo they would have disregarded law and order and by unlawful mob violence assaulted a speaker!

Some men of the Irish race imbibe this tradition through association with Englishmen who condescendingly tolerate them; and those who are infected this way couple with a deprecatory opinion of the Irish an adulatory estimation of the English. I am sure one of these is a New York lawyer. Listen to him as he speaks of the leaders of the Easter rising: "Those leaders, full of enthusiasm about a something quite indefinable which they called 'the Irish republic,' made their appeal to the Irish enthusiasm for the ideal and the beautiful."

A school boy can tell what a republic is; but an "Irish" republic, ah, that soars in the realm of the indefinite far above the comprehensive powers of a man learned in the law. The ideal is usually sought by an idealist; and an idealist is most always considered an impracticabilist, if I may be permitted to coin that word. An Irish republic is indefinable, therefore impracticable. A great many Irish believe an Irish republic possible, therefore they are impracticable. Now let us see what he says of the English. He quotes an Englishman on the Irish question, but does not name him, and says: "He approaches the subject with an open and disinterested mind and with a candor and honesty that I like to think are characteristic of the liberty-loving English people." He also says:

> The English do not hate the Irish. As a rule the English admire the Irish tremendously, though at times their admiration is mixed with apprehension or misgiving, not merely of the Irishman's intellect and brilliancy, but of his keen common sense and practical wisdom and the dramatic expression of Irish temperament.

I do not think the Irish hate the English; but they have an irrepressible desire to have their country and themselves let alone by the English. And it is the dramatic expression they give to this desire that causes the English apprehension. And I am certain the English do not hate the Irish; for English contempt of the Irish is too great ever to reach the dignity of hate. He admits that part of the tradition which concedes intellectual brilliancy to the Irishman; and he may be safely challenged to name an Englishman who attributes common sense, keen or otherwise, and practical wisdom to the Irish. It is hard to refrain from asking whose liberty the English love; certainly not the Irishman's.

Among others who believe in the English-Irishman are many powerful Americans whose love of England is greater than their respect for America, and who are opposed to self-determination for Ireland other than that which England may determine; and it was certainly not their intention that our participation in the war should mean interference in England's "domestic trouble." These men are brutally frank, and declare Ireland must remain within the empire, a naval base for England's safety. It is not strange that among the best known, if not the most powerful of these men, the Choates, Becks, Putnams, etc., are some of the gallant thirty-nine who signed the declaration characterizing all those who resented Mitchel's treatment of our charitable institutions as deserving of "emphatic condemnation."

This letter is longer than intended, and I shall end it by repeating that if our participation in the war is to give to Ireland the right of "self-determination," it will be through the efforts of those of the Irish race in America who believe Irish men and women are no worse than those of any other race, and a great deal better than most others.

What is an American?

A LIST of "casualties in France," recently published by the War Department, opens with the names of O'Connor, Redmond and Loehr, dead on the field of honor, and of Spiegel, severely wounded. Other names, taken down at random, with no thought whatever of proving a preconceived thesis, are Douglass, Hahn, Murphy, Brown and Thill, "died in hospital," and Wilson, Kunz, Bedernicek, Cavazza, Ferde and Rutledge, slightly wounded. A study of this roll of honor may give some answer to the question, "What is an American?"

Of these fifteen names, three, O'Connor, Redmond and Murphy, are unmistakably of Irish origin. Brown and Wilson may furnish some grounds for controversy, since they might be either English, Irish, Welsh or Scotch. Here they are classified, along with Rutledge, as probably English, thus bringing the Anglo-Saxon total to a precarious three. Douglass is as Scotch as heather, Cavazza is plainly Italian, and Bedernicek is a representative of the Slavic races. The calculation thus accounts for three Irish and three English names, and three names traceable to Scotland, Italy and Eastern Europe. But the palm of honor, it would seem, must go to the men whose ancestors sought these shores from Germany, for six names—Loehr, Spiegel, Hahn, Thill, Kunz and Ferde—can be assigned to none but a Teutonic root.

What, then, is an American? Is he one who was born within the boundaries of the United States? Is he a man who prates of patriotism and spends the rest of his time in planning schemes to evade the income tax? Must he be a member of the Mayflower Society, or a Son of the Revolution? It is not easy to state with precision what qualities are necessary to the making of an American, but a man who is willing to lay down his life for this country would seem to merit the name. One thing, however, is certain. He need not be an Anglo-Saxon. He may even be a naturalized German.

In these days of hysteria, which have already brought us the disgrace and humiliation of mob-violence, that is a truth which should not be forgotten.

The Index in New York

IT is with a surprise fully equivalent to a shock that the antiquated, retrograde, narrow-minded Papist reads of a "campaign" which counts many devoted followers in New York. He feels that his thunder has been stolen. Ideas which he thought copyrighted are being freely appropriated by men and women who have no connection whatever with the old religion. Plans which, for these many years, he has contentedly accepted as "medieval," are being refurbished for the purposes of this campaign which is determined to remove, peacefully if possible, by force of law, if necessary, certain books now reposing on the shelves of the New York Public Library.

All this commotion merely means that in twentieth-century Manhattan, the once-despised principle of the Index of Forbidden Books has been placed upon a pedestal of honor. For the volumes in dispute are unquestionably of a character not calculated to cheer the spirits, or further the aims of the American people. Their intention, according to the New York Tribune, is "to deify the German war-lords and to praise the German achievements and aim." Consequently, they are not fit reading for the indiscriminate crowds who patronize our public libraries. Books which "deify" vice may safely be put into their hands, but books which "deify the German war-lords" are intolerable. "Therefore," concludes the New York Tribune, editorially, "these books ought to be withdrawn from general circulation."

This advice implies a change of policy, for which the Catholic has surely not been prepared by the current of public opinion dominant during recent years. The principle that certain books and writings have no right whatever even to exist, much less to be circulated, he has always accepted. But if one thing has been dinned into his ears by magazine and newspaper advocates of "near-thought," it is this: that every cause has its right to a day in court, and that to close one's mind to the statements of any propaganda, however discredited by decent folk, is to write one's self down as intellectually unfair and dishonest. In consequence of this theory, every agency, capable of influencing public opinion has been freely used in this country, for the exploitation of such uplifting organizations as the anarchists and the I. W. W., and for the promotion of causes so valuable to the individual and to society as divorce, legalized polygamy, feminism, and birth-control. Nothing was to be considered sacred, nothing immune from attack, not even Almighty God Himself. When the Catholic timidly ventured to assert that certain topics should not be discussed in public by untrained minds, and that books denying the ultimate sanction of all law and order were fit only for the public hangman, he was told with an air of finality that the "truth" could never be discovered if "complete and free discussion" on any subject whatever were not always fully open to all. The troubled times have forced some return to common-sense. An easy-going Government has brought home with some force its constitutional right not only to control the overt acts of the citizen, but even to limit the circumstances under which he may express his thoughts and opinions.

Books in defense of the maxim that might makes right, or of the principle that the end justifies the means, break down, as far as they can, the sanction of all law. Rightly, therefore, will they be proscribed by the New York Public Library. The New York campaign to remove books which belittle American ideals by "praising German achievements and aims" is easily justified, for the principle upon which it rests is undoubtedly valid. But the leaders of the campaign, afraid of logic, shrink from the ultimate conclusion. What do they propose to do with publications which, under the guise of "art," corrupt the morals of young and callow readers? Rightly excluding the arrogant glorification of German militarism, will they permit the circulation of those books which, by making every man a law unto himself, attack the supreme dominion of Almighty God? If we are to have an index, it ought to contain other titles besides those listed under the heading "Germany."

The One Foundation

THERE was a time when the most "orthodox" among the American Protestant denominations held fast to one dogma. They did not prefer to call it a dogma, but dogma it was, declaring the Divinity of Jesus Christ. These sects took the position that only if Jesus Christ were God could He be accepted as the Founder of Christianity. If He was not God, they thought, He was, at best, nothing more than an "interesting personality," but if He were God, He could deliver a message to mankind, and rightly insist that it be accepted by every rational creature. The "Church" was an institution which assumed the duty of perpetuating God's revelation through Jesus Christ. If it delivered that revelation, complete, unimpaired, it had fulfilled its duty. Withholding any part of Divine revelation, it failed utterly in its purpose, even though its clergymen preached in crowded temples.

The older American Protestantism acknowledged principles which had been rudely attacked in the religious revolt of the sixteenth century, and in that acknowledgment, illogical as it was in Protestantism, lay its strength. Incomplete in foundation, and utterly at variance with revelation in many necessary doctrines, "old-fashioned Protestanism," at least as it existed in this country, could always boast one prime virtue. It did not deny the Divinity of the Son of God. If it could not preach all the truth, it could, and did, teach some of the truth. Hence it is with feelings touched with anything but exultation, that the Catholic views the practical disappearance of this one dogma from present-day Protestantism. Rationalism, the legitimate outcome of private judgment, has had its natural effect. Today a Protestant may regard Jesus Christ as a fallible member of a fallible race, like to us in all things without exception, and suffer no loss of standing. More than this, he may even be permitted to promulgate his blasphemy as head of a theological school, or, a fairly common occurrence in England, he may be advanced to the Episcopal Bench.

In answering the question, "Has Christianity failed?" a prominent Protestant clergyman recently observed that, in any case, a great deal of Protestanism masquerading as Christianity had certainly been rejected by the world as useless. Modern thinkers had tried it, only to find it illogical in theory and unworkable in practical life. No other result could have been looked for. When the only safe foundation has been rejected, the whole building must soon tumble into ruins. "But now as ever," continued the clergyman, "it is the spire of the Catholic Church, pointing to Heaven, which bears witness to an institution insisting on the Divinity of Jesus Christ. There is where we must stand if we would survive." But who shall lead Protestantism back to Christ? If, searching the Scriptures and appealing to reason, the Protestant concludes that the new religion which knows nothing of Christ and dogma, is better, he can rationally take his stand on a right furnished by Protestantism itself, the right of private judgment.

The First Service Flag

THE first service flag, as it has well been said, was raised on Calvary. There the first great sacrifice was consummated, the world's supreme service was rendered to mankind. Ever since has that Cross of Christ, the first service flag of Christianity, been sacred to the Church. It was honored in the days when the Apostles went forth to preach Jesus Christ, and Him crucified; and it is glorified today in its position over a million altars. Once drenched with the blood of the Divine Victim, it now shines radiant in the light of the Resurrection morn.

With reverent hands it is hung upon the walls of every Christian home. We find it where the woes of the world bow down the head of the Vicar of Christ, and in the humblest chamber where a loving heart is beating in union with the Crucified. Far more than a mere symbol is that first Christian service flag. It is an inspiration to Christian deeds, an incentive to heroic sacrifice, a motive of supreme devotion in the service of God, of country and of our fellow-men.

Wherever that banner hangs it recalls the story of that love of Christ, greater than which no man hath, whereby He laid down His life for us. Hence that readiness for sacrifice which is bred in every truly Catholic heart: sacrifice for the Church, sacrifice for the Christian upbringing of children, sacrifice for institutions of charity and zeal, sacrifice for home, for country and for God. History bears on every page the testimony to this spirit. Without it no one can be a true Christian. It implies the renunciation of the world's flattery and favors, for we cannot doubt the Divine assurance that if the world hated the Master and persecuted Him, it will deal no better with His faithful servants. Nor should we wish to be more tenderly treated. Indeed the love of the world for us would be the surest sign that we ourselves have proved renegade to that service flag of Christ.

Yet in the school of war the world has been taught one lesson. If it once tore down the crucifixes from our churches in the Reformation, if it banished them from our schools under the rule of a French atheistic Government, if it vainly tempted the Christian martyr to trample upon it in token of apostacy, if it denounced as idolatrous the very reverence shown to that service flag of Christ, it has now been made to confess, in its own practice, the beauty and truth of our devotion. What human emblem can be more sacred in the eyes of all the world than that modest service flag we see hung from the window of some humble home? It tells of the brave youths who have gone forth in their prime of life to offer for their country all that earth holds dear. It speaks of the young wife's anxious fears, and tender hopes, and loving tears; of the mother's heart that bleeds and the mother's hair that daily grows more silvery underneath the silent burden of grief, even though the sorrow be borne heroically. Who indeed might hope to put into words all the voiceless eloquence of that tiny emblem, that mere span of cloth which every breeze can lift and every gust of wind can toss about, but which is sacred to us all with a world of tender thoughts and fond affections woven in with every fiber of its texture? Yet what is the greatest glory that is cast about it but a reflection from the Cross of Calvary, and what are the highest hopes that can rest upon it but the light of the Resurrection morn?

Sectarian Jugglery

THERE is a Methodist paper in Chicago called the Northwestern Christian Advocate. Its standard can be gaged from the fact that not long since its editor was guilty of a gross perversion of truth and professional ethics, by pretending to quote verbatim from AMERICA an article into which the editor of the Methodist paper had deftly inserted his own words. This infamy accomplished, he calmly proceeded to use the illegitimate product of his perverted soul as one basis of an attack on the benighted Papists. Later he adorned his pages with this delicious bit of news about our soldiers, from the pen of no less a person than a Methodist bishop:

> The Catholics gather in the Young Men's Christian Association buildings, receive the khaki-bound copy of the New Testament, and rejoice for the first time in the possession of a portion of the Word of God. They are hearing for the first time, many of them, the preaching of the Gospel, and are deeply interested in the strange, new preaching which insists that there must be a vital relation between creed and conduct. They are learning the inconsistency of coming away from Mass, where their knees knelt before the sacred symbol, and at once returning to their gambling and their profanity.

Such men and such papers are, of course, quite hopeless; as a consequence, it is not a matter of surprise that, at this critical period, the Northwestern Christian Advocate should manifest its dark heart once again by attributing to Catholics, by presumption and statement, dishonesty and evil motives in regard to statements about the number of Catholic soldiers. The paper attempts to refute claims made about the quota furnished by Catholics to the army, a perfectly legitimate act. But why argument, if such there be in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, should be interspersed with attribution of dishonesty and accusation of evil motives can be explained best by editors who mutilate a document to score a point, as did the editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

The method in his present bit of apology is quite in keeping with his former achievements. In almost every instance he chooses comparatively small camps situated in distinctly Protestant regions, and recruited, in great part, from similar regions. Moreover, if words mean anything, his words will convey the impression that he exhausted all available statistics in his effort to arrive at the truth. But in point of fact such is not the case. Other figures which tell heavily in favor of Catholic majorities were easy to get; in fact such statistics were published long since. Thus Camp Gordon reported 14,159 Catholics, or 41.7 per cent, and Camp Gordon was omitted from the Methodist list. Why? Camp Hancock reported 40 per cent Catholic and Camp Hancock was omitted from the Methodist list. Why? Omitted too were Camp Greene which was about 40 per cent Catholic, Camp Upton, about 50 per cent Catholic, Camp McClellan, about 45 per cent Catholic, Camp Devens, over 60 per cent Catholic. Why were all these omitted? A chaplain at Camp Devens declared that the 301st Infantry is 91 per cent Catholic, the 304th 90 per cent Catholic, and he proceeds to say that no regiment at Devens was less than 50 per cent Catholic. This was all omitted from the Methodist list. Why? And the Methodist editor might have investigated the number of Catholic volunteers, the best of all soldiers. He would have found the figures far higher than the number of Catholics in the country warranted. Instead of doing this he rails at a distinguished prelate who has never forged a document, for not taking "greater pains to gather statistics" and for not including more camps in his calculations!

The Northwestern Christian Advocate's task done, that dear, frowzy little girl who smells strongly of Ceylon tea and pink lemonade, the Christian Advocate, takes up the same popgun and shoots hard this way:

> These returns also give point to an inquiry why the complete figures are unobtainable. On the showing made above, it would seem that the Catholics would demand the publication of the census in full, for the incomplete returns leave the Catholic authorities in the position of having solicited contributions from the general public and demanded chaplaincies from the War Department upon grounds which were not warranted by the facts.

How sweetly Methodistic the accusations are! But it is "the way with them" from bishop to editor. And talk about boasting; in the face of figures what can equal this?

"I was born in the Methodist Church," said the Secretary (Daniels). "They have sent more men into the army, more nurses to the front and more prayers to Heaven than any others."—N. Y. Tribune, April 6, 1918.

Why, years ago, those words were attributed to Lincoln in reference to the Civil War! But perhaps the reporter forgot to say that Secretary Daniels announced this fact, or the Secretary may have been indulging in the figure of prolepsis, or perhaps during the passion of eloquence he may have held both hands on high and "crooked" two figures of each hand in the form of quotation marks.

Literature

ON THE FARM WITH VERGIL

"ARM OR FARM." That double call has gone forth to the whole country, the call of the ploughshare and the sword. The latter, though too often heard in history, sometimes dies away over the peaceful fields. The former ever rises from the soil, compelling and masterful: to those who catch its music, as alluring as the voice of the great mother; in crises like the present, with a menace almost in its appeal, should it be unheeded. Back to the soil! That is the counter-echo to that other watchword of the hour: To the trenches, the gun-deck and the firing line!

History repeats itself. About 2,000 years ago, after the civil wars in which Roman had been arrayed against Roman, and the exhausted world was trying to renew its energies, a far-seeing statesman saw that nature supplied a remedy for the existing evils. In his mind, Mother Earth herself was to become the nurse and the healer of a weakened race. The veterans of Brutus and Cassius, the men who had fought with Agrippa at Actium, with Caesar, under the snows of the north, or with Antony, under the shafts of a Syrian sun, were to be lured back to the farms of the reedy Mincius, to the vine-slopes and corn-lands of the Sabine hills, and to the orchards, cool and moist, along the Tiber's "golden wave." The statesman was Caius Cilnius Maecenas, whose name seems to be identical with that of patron of letters and friend of art. He saw that the sword had to be beaten into the ploughshare, that, if Italy were to be saved, agriculture had to be revived. But a program had to be framed and a plea written to allure the veterans of so many fights from the camp to the sheepfold and the farm. Though the agrarian question was ever a burning one at Rome, there was no Department of Agriculture under Augustus, to distribute seeds to the public or to enlighten it with pamphlets, published at the expense of the Treasury, on the best methods for the cultivation of alfalfa and vetch. But Maecenas was, perhaps, better inspired. He asked the Vergil of the "Eclogues" to write a poem on agriculture. The answer was given in a manner worthy of the subject, the patron and the poet. The bard who had sung of Tityrus and Menalcas, now wrote his masterpiece, the "Georgics."

This great work forms a splendid apology of labor. It is a hymn to the great mother, a song of the soil. In these four short books, Vergil joins to the imagination and the fancy of the poet, the practical knowledge of the genuine farmer, the enthusiasm of the patriot and the far-seeing gaze of the economist and the statesman. It was a theme for which his genius was eminently fitted. In the "Eclogues," he had shown how keenly he was alive to the charms of nature. But, beautiful as they are, they are rather indefinite in their tints and vague in their outlines. They are rather artificial copies of a great original, Theocritus. Damoetas and Mopsus remind the reader of the prim and besatined shepherds and shepherdesses of Watteau. The bloom and the pose do not seem to be natural. Not so with the "Georgics." Though Vergil was not afraid to follow in the footsteps of others, the poem is thoroughly original. If there are echoes here and there of "The Works and Days" of Hesiod, of the "Phaenomena" and "Diosemeia" of Aratus, of the "Georgics" of Nicander, the "De Re Rustica" of Varro, and if the influence of the "De Rerum Natura" of Lucretius is felt in the general atmosphere, the "Georgics" have a stamp absolutely individual. It is no longer Arcadian and Sicilian shepherds whom the poet sings. Italy, the Italian yeomen now rise fair and virile on his canvas. The Watteau graces have given way to the truth, the vigor and the fidelity to life which we see in the "Gleaners" of Millet. Here Vergil is a genuine realist. The life of the Italian farmer, his daily and annual round of duties, with his fields, his stock, his vines and his bees are brought home to us with all the truth of one who loves the beauties of nature, who has felt the repose, the calm, the worth and the dignity of a country life, and who contrasts the peace, the security and the inward nobility of such a life with the unrest, the rivalries, disappointments and treacheries of the bustling world. If the "Georgics" are a didactic poem, they are not the lifeless thing we usually associate with the name. The breath of the wide-aisled forests is upon them, the shadows of beech and oak and yew fall across their pages. They are a deep and solemn symphony vibrating with the mystic voices of stream and hill, tingling with the strains of the ceaseless anthem of earth.

In the four books of this immortal poem, the most perfect in form and rhythm that Vergil ever wrote, he sings of agriculture proper, or the tilling of the fields, of arboriculture and especially of the growing of the olive and the vine, of the rearing of the cattle and the horse, and of the labors, the battles and the polity of the bee. Nothing seemed to be more commonplace. But the commonplace has been viewed with the eye and the heart of the artist. The instinct of the born farmer and yeoman ever lingered in Vergil from the days of his boyhood, with his father on the little farm near Mantua. That instinct inspired him to tells us that ploughing should begin in early spring and that the land produces the best crops when ploughed twice in summer and twice in winter, that the husbandman must study the quality of the land, that he must pray for a wet summer and a dry winter; that the olive thrives best in a gravelly soil, but that the vine gives its finest clusters in a rich and rather moist ground rising to the south, that if he wants a fine crop of corn, the farmer must sow it in black crumbling soil or ground reclaimed from the forest. Vergil knows the points of a good horse: "He has a high-arched neck, a clean-cut head, a short barrel, a broad back, and his noble chest is a mass of muscle." He knows how sheep and goats should be housed, he analyzes the diseases which attack the stock. It is evident, even when his conclusions do not coincide with those of Huber or with the minute investigations of Henri Fabre, that he has made a close and loving study of the life, the polity and the habits of the bee. But far above all this technical knowledge, for the most part accurate, he has the poet's eye, the poet's insight into the secret of nature and her hidden beauties. In the bee, he sees the individual short-lived, but the race enduring, and notes the marvels of the hive's little commonwealth.

Who but a poet and one so tender as Vergil, could give us the pathetic picture of the ox smitten with the plague, of the ploughboy unyoking the bullock, that in its dumb way mourns for the death of its team-mate, and leaving the plough standing idle in the unfinished furrow, a scene that Landseer would have loved to paint? Was ever the call of stream and wood more bewitching than when Vergil hails the gleaming waters of Spercheus, as

> Those deep Laconian shades
> Made vocal by the songs of Spartan maids,
> The glens of Haemus and the waving bough
> To fan my aching limbs, my fevered brow.

With what skill he relieves the details of the farmer's toil with those splendid episodes, the praises of labor and the country, the account of the prodigies which followed Cæsar's death, that marvelous story of Eurydice and Orpheus, which last, may, it is true, break the unity of the poem, but which in spite of that defect, is one of the gems of Latin literature. The panegyric of Italy, in the second book, would alone suffice to raise the work to the dignity of a national monument.

> "Salve, magna parens frugum, Saturnia tellus, > Magna virum."

With what love he celebrates that "Saturnian" land, the fertile mother of nature's richest fruits, the nobler mother of a hardy stock of heroes and great men. No other land is like Mother Italy,

> "Nor any foreign earth of greater name
> Can with sweet Italy contend in fame!"

No dragon's teeth were sown in its valleys. Its plains never bristled with helmets and warriors' thronging spears, but the olive and the vine gladden its fields. He lovingly numbers its monuments, its cities piled by the busy hands of man on beetling rocks; its rivers, gliding under ancient ramparts. How fair its streams and lakes, Clitumnus, Larius and Benacus, which in a single word the poet has immortalized. Above all, it is the land of heroes. Thence came the Sabine chivalry and the pikemen of the Volscian hills.

The poem is thoroughly Roman with its reverence for the Deity, its love of the fields, of country and home; its admiration for the simplicity and the manly virtues of the good old times. It is so virile, so true, the work of a great "landscape-lover" and "lord of language" unsurpassed when he sings "in the stateliest measure ever molded by the lips of man" of > Wheat and woodland, tilth and vineyard, hive and horse and herd;

> All the charm of all the Muses often flowering in a lonely word.

The lessons of the "Georgics" are as needed today as when Augustus was endeavoring to bring back peace, prosperity and plenty to a disordered world.

THE WAYSIDE SHRINE

It fronts the beaten courses
  Where weary feet go down
To join the flowing forces
  Beyond the stricken town.
And they who pass in blindness
  Nor mark thy loving face—
O Mary, in thy kindness,
  Be thou their strength and grace!

The pointed roof is broken,
  The empty vase is dry,
The statue all unspoken
  Of thousands marching by.
The drooping wreath long faded;—
  O Mary, make them thine,
Who pass so spent and jaded
  Thy lonely wayside shrine!

REVIEWS

Hugo Grotius, the Father of the Modern Science of International Law. By HAMILTON VREELAND, JR. New York: Oxford University Press. $2.00.

Mr. Vreeland should never have written this book. Grotius was far too great a man to have his biography undertaken by anyone so little conversant as is the author with the true history of Grotius's times. A mere text-book knowledge of the leading events of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries is utterly insufficient for such a task. Moreover the slurs which Mr. Vreeland goes out of his way to cast upon the Popes and upon the Church prove in almost every instance to be mere adaptations of statements taken over from the works of Andrew D. White, undoubtedly the most notorious manipulator of history we have had since H. C. Lea.

For of all ascertained facts pertaining to the actual events of Grotius's career none stands out more dominantly than the life-long persecution he was made to suffer at the hands of Protestants on account of his leanings towards the Church and towards Catholic doctrines. When his work on Antichrist appeared in which he proved that the Popes were being slanderously accused by the Protestants his two most intimate friends among the latter, Salmasius and Vossius, turned against him. Furthermore his poem to the Blessed Virgin written in Latin, contains a fine eulogium of Urban VIII. The Reformation on the other hand was in his opinion a grave mistake nor could he see how unity and peace among Christians was to be re-established and maintained unless the Primacy of Peter were again acknowledged by all. The truest and most devoted friends he had were Catholics and with none was he on more intimate terms than with the Jesuit, Dionysius Petavius, one of the most eminent of the many noted Catholic theologians of his day.

It may be worth noting that, with a few possible exceptions only, there is not an accusation brought against the Popes by Mr. Vreeland that cannot be refuted from the works of Grotius himself. To give but an instance or two. Andrew D. White, in a highly ignorant account of the arbitral decision given by Alexander VI in 1493, a decision which concerned none but Spain and Portugal, misrepresents the facts. Mr. Vreeland in a passage in which he treats of Grotius's work "De Mari Libero" improves on this by maintaining that the lands discovered west and east of the line of demarcation were given respectively by the Pope to the two nations concerned. Grotius on the other hand in this very same treatise "De Mari Libero" shows most clearly that the Pope never did anything of the kind. At the very least therefore Mr. Vreeland might have consulted the wording of the Bull itself in which the decision was given. Again Mr. Vreeland asserts that the Popes almost forced Francis I to break his oath, whereas Grotius in the "De Jure Belli ac Pacis" points out the fact that the oath taken by the French King was null and void, which is no less than what the Pope himself maintained .

It is quite true that the "De Jure Belli ac Pacis." was put on the Index but only donec corrigatur and if Mr. Vreeland, instead of trusting to the prevarications of Andrew D. White, had only taken the trouble to find out the real reason why, he might have gained some valuable information both as regards the history and the principles of international law. No less an authority than Mr. Albert de Lapradelle vouches for the fact that "Grotius had written the international law of absolutism" and that he "was led astray by his knowledge and worship of ancient authors." Many of the principles which he advocated are far and away behind those of the schoolmen who before his time had already treated the problem of international law, while his ambiguous enunciation of the natural law became the fountain-head of many of the errors we are now atoning for in the present war. The very fact that Gustavus Adolphus should have prized the work as he did is in itself a sufficient comment, since whatever the ground might be on which he would naturally approve of it the same would certainly come very near justifying the rulers of Prussia today both in their policies and in their methods of warfare.

In conclusion the reviewer challenges Mr. Vreeland to substantiate his assertion that the Popes stated that "No faith is to be kept with heretics." Should the author be able to trace this back to anything more reliable than the inventive brain of Andrew D. White the reviewer would be very grateful for the information, for he has long been looking for the latter's reference. Meanwhile both master and disciple could do nothing better than ponder for a quiet moment over the following words from Grotius: "Those who wish for an everlasting schism and who tremble at the very name of unity or of union in the Church are bound to represent the Pope as Antichrist. For once the schism were removed many would be left without a livelihood." M. I. X. M.

Cavalry of the Clouds. By CONTACT (CAPT. ALAN BOTT, M.C.), Garden City, New York: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.40.

Over There and Back in Three Uniforms. By LIEUT. JOSEPH S. SMITH. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $1.50.

The first of these volumes is a book that takes us out of the trenches and up into the air, where we are enabled to see how the western front of the war-field looks from above. We are invited to be passengers on some daring flights over the enemy's lines, are attacked by German machines, have several hair-breadth escapes from death, see a number of our comrades fall headlong to destruction, and feel "the frozen hand of the atmosphere slap our face" at the icy altitude of 10,000 feet. We learn what the German anti-aircraft guns are like and become acquainted, at somewhat too intimate proximity, with the various branches of their family tree. "The family ghost," for example, appears without warning in the form of a pillar of white smoke, stretching to a height of several thousand feet. "It looks rigid as far as the top, where it sprays around into a knob. Altogether, it suggests a giant piece of asparagus; and fades away as suddenly as it arrived, after the manner of ghosts." The volume is a little vulgar and blasphemous at times, but, apart from these blemishes, is worth reading as a beginning of the "great tradition and noble chivalry" of the air.

"Over There and Back" is a book of memories of the war, some sad, some happy, but all portrayed with the vividness and keenness of actual participation. The writer is an American, born in Philadelphia, but who was a cowboy on a ranch in British Columbia when the war broke out. He enlisted in the Twenty-ninth Vancouver Battalion in Canada, and served under the British flag until August, 1917, when he resigned to put on the uniform of his own country. His account of the adventures he had is different from most of the war-books, and furnishes graphic pen-pictures that will grip the heart of all who have friends or relatives overseas. He writes as follows, for instance, about one of the regiment's first casualties: "What more could a real mother ask than to be the mother of a real man? She had told him when she said good-by: 'You are all my heart, Johnny. If you come back, I will be proud and happy. If you don't come back, well—I will be proud.' Thus did this mother of Canada give her son to the Empire." F. J. D.

Chronicles of St. Tid. By EDEN PHILLPOTTS. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.50.

Simba. By STEWART EDWARD WHITE. Garden City, N. Y.: Doubleday, Page & Co. $1.50.

The sixteen short stories in Mr. Phillpotts's latest book are marked by a high quality of literary workmanship. The scenes of the tales are Devon and the West Country which the author knows so well, and the characters that figure in the book are the folk of the slate mines. Every tale is so artistically narrated that the reader's interest seldom flags, a genial humor pervades the book, the men and women he describes are made of real flesh and blood, and the touches of dialect and the odd turns of expression heard in the parish of St. Tid's have been cleverly caught. "'The Green Man' and 'The Tiger,'" is a story that tells just why Widow Nute did not marry Matt Polwarn but Bart Keat instead; "The House in Two Parishes" tells how Parson White unwittingly kept Grandfather Jago from being buried alive; "The Rare Poppy" relates how two queer young people made a match; "The Reed Rond" tells how poor old Charity Bickford was driven to suicide; "The Saint and the Lovers" relates how a Popish saint furthered the "tokening" of Cherry and Sam, and the other stories in the book are almost as interesting as those named above.

"Simba," an African word for lion, is the name of a negro crown-prince who becomes the trusted gun-bearer of "Kingozi" an English elephant-hunter, and throughout the nine somewhat disconnected chapters in Mr. White's interesting book the young savage appears here and there. But the central figures in these tales of adventure are Kingozi, the old campaigner, Trelawney, the youthful governor, Lord Kilgour, the would-be sportsman, Captain Lewis, who opened hostilities on Captain Heine as soon as the news of the present war's outbreak reached the interior of Africa, and Seton and "Charley" Braxton, who made such a disastrous deal in cow ivory. A Social History of the American Family. By ARTHUR W. CALHOUN, Ph.D. Vol. II. Cleveland: The Arthur H. Clark Co. $5.00.

The second volume of Dr. Calhoun's work, which embraces the period from the end of the American Revolution to the close of the Civil War, exhibits the same defects and excellencies which characterized the first. It is only fair to say, that the two volumes give every evidence of industry and, in general, of an intelligent open-mindedness on the part of the author. These are excellent qualities; nevertheless, it is impossible to escape the impression that, from isolated instances Dr. Calhoun frequently draws conclusions which are far too sweeping. It is easy to find in the court records of a century ago or of today, a collection of cases which exhibit shocking violations of the natural and of the moral law. Clearly, however, it would be both illogical and unjust to conclude, forthwith, that the community in which these violations occurred was altogether corrupt. All such collections call for careful analysis and interpretation, if they are to have any social or historical significance. Thus, ten murders in one year might constitute an appalling criminal record for a small village, while in New York, so small a number would mark an improvement almost miraculous. This surely is an easy canon of sociological criticism; yet Dr. Calhoun does not appear to have taken it sufficiently into account in drawing up his black indictment of the social conditions which, as he claims, existed in many pioneer American communities. He fails to point out clearly the relative proportion of vice and virtue in the localities under investigation, and in this failure lies the chief defect of the work.

Incidentally, it may be noted that the author is often exceedingly inaccurate in his presentation of points of Catholic doctrine. Thus in the brief compass of two or three lines, he manages to present what is nothing short of a burlesque upon the Church's position in regard to matrimony, and on birth-restriction. After so many centuries of controversy, it should be fairly clear, that the Church neither forbids nor forces any one to marry. Marriage is free, or it is not marriage. Furthermore, her condemnation of conscious birth-restriction affects only those forms of restriction which postulate a violation of the natural or of the Divine law. Restriction by mutual and free consent to abstention, she not only allows, when all due moral safeguards are employed, but, in some cases, even counsels.

Sea Dogs and Men at Arms. A Canadian Book of Songs. With Frontispiece in Colors. By JESSE EDGAR MIDDLETON. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $1.50.

The author of these poems has learned how to blend war and poetry melodiously. There is a genuine briny tang about his sea-songs and a fine martial swing to his soldier-lyrics as can be seen from the following stanzas from "Missing at Lloyd's" and "Dismounted":

Night, and a driving hissing snow
  Dulling the lamps aport.
Night, and a million mocking waves,
  Wild in their demon sport.
Spindrift whirling above the bridge,
  Ice on the plates below.
We are strong, and the bunkers full,
  Winds of the world may blow.

Our cavalry spurs are red with rust
  And our bridle arm is stale.
We can but dream of the cut and thrust,
Of the flying charge or the saber lust,
And never a cavalry trumpet-gust
  Goes shrilling upon the gale.

The author's attachment to the British Empire is musically expressed in such poems as "The Canadian" and "The Brotherhood"; the hidden heroism of naval engineers and submarine mechanicians is sung in "The Engineer" and "The Nereid": "Only Three" strikingly shows how cheap human life has now become: "The Mother" chants a tearful Magnificat because her boy lies slain in Flanders, and this poem is "Irony" indeed:

Out of the hill's eternal store
  We brought the gift of God.
The orange drifts of iron ore
  Long hid beneath the sod.
From rocks as old as night and hell
  Green-crusted copper came.
We forged the gun, the mine, the shell
  And praised the Maker's name!

W. D.

A Russian Gentleman. By SERGE AKSAKOFF. Translated from the Russian by J. D. DUFF, Fellow of Trinity College, New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.25.

Those who read with interest this author's book about "A Russian Schoolboy" (Longmans), which was favorably noticed in our issue of last February 9, will find more entertaining still the volume under review. Mr. Aksakoff now tells all about his grandfather, Stepan Mihailovitch Bagroff, and the courtship and marriage of his own parents, as he had the story from them by word of mouth. Old Stepan Mihailovitch seems to have been a pretty difficult man to get on with, for he ruled his family like a savage Tartar, dragging his wife around by the hair when she ventured to protect their child who had angered him. The author's grandmother, he records, received more than one beating from her husband because she absolutely refused to supply him with anything but the coarsest linen. Even when "he took an axe and chopped up all his objectionable shirts," his wife "howled at the sight and implored him to beat her rather than spoil his good clothes." When the old Russian nobleman's rage had subsided, however, he was quite gracious, would let the family kiss his hand, and would even deign to ask his wife how she had slept. "This question was a signal mark of favor," attests the author, "and my grandmother replied at once that, when Stepan Mihailovitch had a good night, she of course had one too."

Particularly interesting are the chapters describing the progress of the love affair that Alexyéi Stepanitch, the only son of the house of Bagroff, carried on with Sofya Nikolayevna Zubin, a fair maiden of Ufa, his inferior in birth, but his better by far in breeding and education. Alexyéi's feminine kin did their best to break off the match, and he secured his domineering father's consent to marry Sofya only by threatening to commit suicide. The interval between the young couple's engagement day and the morning of the wedding was by no means free from difficulties and complications. But at last they were permanently married and on their honeymoon, paid, though with grave misgivings, a ceremonious visit to Bagrovo, where the groom's truculent father lived. The bride won the old barbarian's heart at once, however, and completed the conquest by getting up and joining him on the stoop where he was accustomed daily to watch the sun rise. So he took Sofya's part against all his intriguing womankind and gave her besides some good advice about how to keep her husband's respect and love.

Very entertaining too are the pages describing the bridal party's visit to Alexandra Karatayeff's, where the newcomers were almost devoured by night-prowling rats; the pages telling how Sofya adroitly continued her stupid husband's education, and those which relate what tyrannic power servants sometimes exercised in an eighteenth-century Russian household, and how brutally the serfs were often treated. The first baby born to Sofya and Alexyéi, an unwelcome girl, died in infancy, but subsequently a little heir came to the house of Bagroff, and when the joyful news was brought Stepan Mihailovitch, the old man first crossed himself, then "sprang out of bed, went barefoot to his desk, snatched from it the family tree, took the pen from the ink-bottle, drew a line from the circle containing the name Alexyéi, traced a fresh circle at the end of the line, and wrote in the center of the circle, Serghei," the name of the boy, who lived to be the author of this excellent book.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

For those who are planning a service-flag celebration, the Rev. Francis P. Donnelly, S.J., has published a song to the music of "The Top of the Morning." Copies of the words and music are for sale on application to Holy Cross College, Worcester.——During the Christmas time, Fischer & Bro. published "Gesu Bambino," a sacred song by Pietro Yon. The anthem is built upon a phrase of the "Adeste Fidelis," and this, together with its general composition, makes it redolent of Yuletide. It can be effectively used by a solo voice, as also by boys' voices in unison.——The B. Herder Book Co. have published in a convenient form and at the price of $2.00 an organ accompaniment prepared by Victor Winter, S.J., for the "Students' Mass Book and Hymnal," compiled by Rev. W. B. Sommerhauser.

"Tales from a Famished Land" (Doubleday, $1.25), by Edward Eyre Hunt, "Miss Pim's Camouflage" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50), by Lady Stanley, "Conscript—2989" (Dodd, Mead, $1.00), and "Blown in by the Draft" (Doubleday, $1.25), by Frazier Hunt, are four recent books bearing on the war. The first is made up of fourteen stories told by an American who served on the Commission of Relief in Belgium. He says they "are not strictly truth," and "not fiction," but "both." The mixture is not very satisfactory, but the background of the stories gives a good picture of war-riven Belgium. Miss Pim, a middle-aged English woman, has the gift of making herself invisible, so the military authorities send her to spy on the Germans. It is not much of a story. The other two volumes describe the making of our new American soldiers. "Conscript—2989," which H. B. Martin illustrates, is the amusing diary of a "rookey" from the day of his reaching camp till he goes south. "Blown in by the Draft" is an entertaining collection of "camp yarns," illustrating how civilians turn into soldiers.

The late Donald Hankey's purpose in writing "Religion and Common Sense" (Dutton, $0.60), was perhaps as orthodox as that which set the Angelic Doctor to writing the "Summa contra Gentiles." He had read rationalistic books and saw how the whole fabric of Christianity and the supernatural was being torn and hacked by the "higher" critics. He must answer the rationalist and win the day for Christ. His method would be ludicrous were there not a certain pathos which attaches to the posthumous utterances of a man in such evident good faith. He answers all the rationalistic vaporings about comparative mythology, the absurdity of the Resurrection, the impossibility of the Virgin Birth and miracles by declaring that all such discussions are simple beside the point. According to the author, we approach the Gospels not to study Jesus as we find Him in historical books, but to find a character which sums up certain feelings of the common conscience of mankind. This sounds very much like the Modernistic definition of the Church. All will go well, if only we believe. Just what we are to believe seems to be of secondary importance. Of course, faith with him is fiducial. The book is only another striking proof that modern Protestantism is tantamount to a Christless Christianity.

It will be hard even for the most callous reader to go through the "Impressions de Guerre de Prêtres Soldats" (Paris: Plon-Nourrit.) collected and edited in two volumes by Léonce de Grandmaison without a growing admiration for the splendid sacrifices and the chivalrous devotion manifested at every stage of the thrilling and martial episodes which they record. The soldier-priests from whose notes and letters the various incidents which make up the volume are taken were in the closest contact in the trenches, in the hospitals, in the charge and the attack with the soldiers whose deeds and heroism and glorious deaths are here described. From every source available the editor has given us a pen-picture unsurpassed in reality and picturesqueness of the French fighting man, and his splendid officers and chiefs. The soldier-priests depict for us in these pages, all written with a rare distinction and refinement of thought and style, the soul of the French armies. Everywhere in their gallant regiments there is evidence of a wonderful revival of faith and piety. That is undoubtedly one of the reasons of the heroism and the devotion displayed by the men of Verdun and their companions in arms. Unconsciously also the soldier-priests who record their impressions in these pages have painted their own souls and their own spirit. The whole world knows at the present moment that these are in every respect worthy of their own high calling and of the heroic men by whose side they have fought and prayed.

The following poem, entitled "The Wayfarer," was written by Padraic H. Pearse while he was imprisoned in Kilmainham Jail, May, 1916, awaiting execution for his part in the Easter week uprising. The lines are taken from the "Collected Works of Padraic H. Pearse." (Stokes, $3.00).

The beauty of the world hath made me sad,
This beauty that will pass;
Sometimes my heart hath shaken with great joy
To see a leaping squirrel in a tree,
Or a red lady-bird upon a stalk,
Or little rabbits in a field at evening,
Lit by a slanting sun,
Or some green hill where shadows drifted by,
Some quiet hill where mountainy man hath sown
And soon would reap; near to the gate of Heaven:
Or children with bare feet upon the sands
Of some ebbed sea, or playing on the streets
Of little towns in Connacht,
Things young and happy.
And then my heart hath told me;
These will pass,
Will pass and change, will die and be no more,
Things bright and green, things young and happy;
And I have gone upon my way
Sorrowful.

The verses in Cale Young Rice's "Wraiths and Realities" ($1.25), or in Alice Duer Miller's "Wings in the Night," two books recently published by the Century Co., contain little that is of permanent value. Mr. Rice relates in verse two short stories which would have been better in prose and there is an unpleasant note of skepticism in many of his lyrics. "Chansons of the Bells of Osenèy," much of which has already been quoted in AMERICA, is the finest poem in the volume. The best things in Miss Miller's book are her stanzas on "The Stars" and the following tribute of "An American to France":

O France, with what a shamed and sorry smile,
We now recall that in a bygone day
We sought of you art, wit, perfection, style,
You were to us a playground and a play.
Paris was ours—its sudden green edged spaces,
And sweeping vistas to the coming night,
Brocades and jewels, porcelains and laces—
All these we took for leisure and delight.
And all the time we should have drunk our fill
Of wisdom known to you and you alone,
Clear-eyed self-knowledge, silent courage, will;
And now too late, we see these things are one:
That art is sacrifice and self-control,
And who loves beauty must be stern of soul.

Though Mother St. Paul's "Passio Christi, Meditations for Lent" (Longmans, $1.40) reached this country too late to be seasonable, it is a good book to keep in mind for next year. Ignatian meditations on the sacred Passion, with preludes, two or three points, "colloquy," "resolution" and "spiritual bouquet" are set for each day of Lent, and Father Joseph Rickaby, S.J., furnishes the volume with a preface.——"Au Coeur de Jésus Agonisant" (Téqui, 2 fr.), by J. Darguad is a collection of twelve meditations on the Holy Hour in which the author conforms to the more exact interpretation of an "hour of prayer in union with the prayer of the Saviour in the Garden of Olives on Maunday Thursday night." The meditations are colloquial in form, and full of unction and devotion, the intention being that the one praying should be immediately united in spirit with the Sacred Heart of Jesus. The book has become the vademecum of the members of the Archconfraternity of the Holy Hour in the church of the Monastery of the Visitation at Paray-le-Monial, the convent-home of Blessed Margaret Mary Alacoque.

The following stanzas on "The Connaught Rangers" are contributed by Miss W. M. Letts to the current Yale Review:

I saw the Connaught Rangers when they were passing by,
On a spring day, a good day, with gold rifts in the sky.
Themselves were marching steadily along the Liffey quay
An' I see the young proud look of them as if it was today!
The bright lads, the right lads, I have them in my mind,
With the green flags on their bayonets all fluttering in the wind!

A last look at old Ireland, a last good-bye maybe,
Then the gray sea, the wide sea, my grief upon the sea!
And when will they come home, says I, when will they see once more
The dear blue hills of Wicklow and Wexford's dim gray shore?
The brave lads of Ireland, no better lads you'll find,
With the green flags on their bayonets all fluttering in the wind!

Three years have passed since that spring day, sad years for them and me.
Green graves there are in Serbia and in Gallipoli.
And many who went by that day along the muddy street
Will never hear the roadway ring to their triumphant feet.
But when they march before Him, God's welcome will be kind,
And the green flags on their bayonets will flutter in the wind.

EDUCATION

Notes on Oral English

AN essential condition for a correct use of the mother-tongue is a ready knowledge of grammar. Some schools really teach grammar while others have the reputation of teaching it, whereas they hardly teach it at all. The excellence which the pupils display is due to home-training. Furthermore, some schools which are really making an intensive effort to impart a good training in this important subject are often accused of negligence, because their work is impaired by home conditions and by the general surroundings of the pupils. It may be worth while to examine these phenomena. They explain, at least in part, the contradictory opinions so often expressed, as to the value of formal grammar in the teaching of composition, whether written or oral.

Why Formal Grammar?

WHERE formal grammar has been industriously pursued without a seemingly adequate return, there is a strong temptation to turn to the language-lesson, or to something which seems to promise better practical results. Where formal grammar has been skimped, there is a lack of exactitude and certainty, even where there is, in general, correctness in expression. This inexactitude and uncertainty manifest themselves especially in high school and college, wherever there is question of acquiring a foreign language. The result of this manifestation is a clamor for more formal grammar.

Here as in everything else we must cleave to the golden mean. We should give a considerable amount of formal grammar, and we should make formal grammar fruitful of good by a very considerable amount of practical application. In etymology, for instance, we ought to drill, I insist on the word drill, classes in the verb. We should drill them in the different voices, the different tenses, the different forms of the same tense. I know that many exponents of modern pedagogy object to drill, on the score that it is work, and that school should be play. I have no patience with these innovators. School is a preparation for life, and life is work. This does not mean that I would advocate grammar for grammar's sake. I would advocate grammar for composition's sake. With this end in view I would eliminate everything but the essentials. Nice questions of purely technical value I would relegate to specialists.

Writing and Speaking

THE principle which should guide us in the selection of matter from theoretical grammar should be non multa, sed multum, "not much, but muchly," if I may use the term. The "muchly" I would understand as constant insistence on a few essential principles. You have the parts of the verbs. Insist that they be used correctly. "I have saw," "I seen," "I have did," "I done," and the like mistakes in etymology which daily jar on our ears must be corrected, constantly, relentlessly, till the very look cast at an offender will notify him of his fault. You have taught the rules of syntax. Then, and even before, begin the war on "It ain't done," "you was," "them fellows." You have taught the analysis of sentences, the theory, and the practice. Reverse the process, and make it fruitful in the line of composition by teaching sentence-synthesis. The final purpose of all the English precepts of the primary school should, I think, be the power to write and to speak a grammatical sentence.

It is not likely that, ordinarily, there will be much facility in the speaking of a sentence without considerable practice in writing. There should be a daily theme in sentence-structure. It may be the amplification of a sentence by the addition of words, of phrases or of clauses; it may be the synthesis of several sentences into one; it may be the expansion of an assigned topic into a sentence of an indicated form. The determination of these details of the theme may be left to the inclination and discretion of the teacher. The theme should, however, be adapted to the grades of the pupils, and even in the same grade be so graduated as to be a progressive exercise.

English in Every Class

IT must not be imagined that, because pupils can write a sentence, they can speak one trippingly on the tongue. Writing is a preparation and a help to speech, but it is not speech. There must be exercise, and a great deal of it, in oral composition. Nor is this exercise to be confined to the English hour. It must be extended to other classes; in all classes, attention must be paid to expression. But we must be reasonable in what we expect in classes other than English. A teacher cannot halt a class in history or arithmetic to give a lesson in English. All that can be done is to correct a mistake, or to straighten out a construction, and this, with the least possible interruption to the subject in hand. But while we put these limitations on this matter of English instruction, we do not mean to limit instruction to class-hours and class-times. Here, as in pronunciation, the teacher may with profit teach even on the playground or in the recreation-hall. The help given to expression outside of the English hour, will probably be especially notable in the matter of vocabulary. Speech, even merely correct speech, is impossible without a fitting supply of words. How to equip the child with a suitable vocabulary is, by reason of conditions in American life, often a problem which is left altogether to the teacher to solve.

Getting a Vocabulary

THE children who attend our schools may come from homes where the standard of information and conversation is such that they become possessed of a vocabulary without any conscious effort. In the majority of cases, however, our children come from homes where they can never gather a vocabulary, either because in these homes there is no English at all, or because the English spoken is deficient in quality. This lack of vocabulary these children usually piece out with slang. There is no gainsaying that much of American slang is picturesque; neither can it be denied that it is often a very effective method of expression. In saying this, I am merely quoting the opinion of a distinguished Englishman, who some years back paid a prolonged visit to the States. Unhappily, the efficiency of American slang is shortlived. The slang term, which covers a multitude of ideas today, tomorrow is expressive of nothing. A slang term is usually not a permanent addition to vocabulary. Its efficiency is frequently due to its blanket quality, which does not contribute to that precision of expression which is essential in correctness of speech.

Slang must be tabooed. An English vocabulary must be substituted. What can be done by the parish school in this direction? In a high school you can assign reading to be covered outside of class, and you can, by demanding word-lists, and by set tests, compel pupils to investigate the meaning of new words, and to add them to their vocabulary. Work of the same kind may be done in the higher grades of the parish school, but it does not seem to me to be very practicable in the lower grades. In these lower grades, I think the gathering of a vocabulary will have to be largely, if not altogether, a matter of class-work. The teacher will insist on the meaning of words and must be prepared to explain the simplest terms, because the vocabulary of the ordinary child is extremely limited. Words once learned may be worked into sentences, either written or oral, and the endeavor, both in written and oral composition, must be toward making new words a part of the child's living vocabulary. Here, too, as in other efforts toward correct speech, there must be insistence on the purpose intended in every place and at every turn. What degree of precision in vocabulary is attainable, cannot be determined with mathematical precision. Common-sense would seem to indicate that in this the grammar or parish school can make only a beginning. Precision in expression is a life-work.

An Encouraging Outlook

FOR whatever they may accomplish in this line, however, we should be grateful to the teachers in our parish schools. A little thankfulness may be some compensation for the failure which frequently seems to be the reward of their labors. It has been remarked by some directors of parish schools that the efforts of their teachers, especially in English, go sadly to waste. The boy or girl who leaves the parish school, fairly correct in the use of the mother tongue, loses in the factory, or in the store, or in later companionship, the fruit of devoted instruction.

"Love's labor lost"! Still we seem to be coming to better things. The art of vocal expression, some years ago, was hardly recognized as an element in higher education. There were even colleges which neglected it. Men were to be equipped with illimitable stores of information, but were to receive no training in the method of expressing it by word of mouth. Today we live in a new order. Public speaking has its place in high schools and colleges. The professions recognize that their members should have some ability in the gentle art. The dental schools of the country have inaugurated their four years' course, and I have been informed that some practice in public speaking has a place in it. Business men have for some years back seen the advantages of capacity in speech. They have been taking lessons in voice-culture, not to fit themselves for the platform, but in order to acquire a finish of expression which will increase their efficiency. Oral expression has a future. It should engage at least some part of every teacher's attention, whether in the grammar school or the university.

Economic Versus Political Democracy

MINIMUM-WAGE and labor disputations have often developed the distinction between economic and political democracy, but the phraseology is comparatively recent. While peace conferences may adjudicate political democracy as an international problem, peace terms will not settle the internal domestic problems which will follow in the wake of the war. One of the first of these will be that of social and industrial reconstruction, or briefly stated, economic democracy. Already our Government has named a commission to develop a healthy policy with respect to labor, now and after the war. The President's Mediation Commission has successfully opened the copper mines in Arizona, quelled the unrest in the lumber industry in the Pacific Northwest, and averted the threatened strikes in the oil fields of southern California, the strike partly executed on the telephone lines of the Pacific States, and the threatened tie-up of the packing industry centered in Chicago. Again, the labor troubles in our Eastern shipyards were successfully remedied.

The Guarantees of Democracy

ON the other side of the world, the Russian Bolsheviki profess to be less interested in political than in economic democracy. The British Labor party, under the leadership of Arthur Henderson, a former member of the British War Cabinet under Lloyd George, has launched its program for an industrial democracy in England. Quite recently through a report upon reconstruction made by a sub-committee, it has given the world an economic program that demands the attention of all economists and others interested in human welfare. The labor interests of the other Allies are also more or less well organized, and together with British labor present a very formidable front to reconstruction problems that will come after the war.

Political democracy guarantees the self-determination of a people through plebiscite, provides a representative system of government with majority rule coincident with the recognition of minority and individual rights, and extends suffrage to its electorate, irrespective of creed, race, property, wealth, or hereditary tests. With women playing so large and important a part in the prosecution of the war at home, it is only fair that a further test, that of sex, be removed. Political democracy, quite naturally, cannot bestow the full and proper degree of material prosperity as between all individuals except, in so far as healthy political institutions affect abundant production of wealth, and the equitable distribution of the resultant social dividend.

And it is in the equitable distribution of the social dividend that economic democracy begins and ends. Economic democracy does not mean equality of income, nor even equality of opportunity. It precludes Socialism, since a State bureaucracy would even suspend man's inalienable right to labor or not to labor; negative the right to strike, labor's most potent weapon in collective bargaining; deny the liberty of investing wages or savings, so as to accrue rent, interest, or profits; destroy the incentives for initiative and saving; reduce the sum-total of operative capital equipment, with a consequent reduction in production; and finally, fail to accumulate a sufficient social income even to "go around" under any system of distribution, utopian or otherwise.

"Economic Democracy" Interpreted

ON the contrary, what society wants and needs is more production of wealth, a greater volume of economic goods, more capital equipment per worker. A shorter day and greater pay are ultimately economically inoperative, unless the worker can add a correlative increment to production, either through increased efficiency resulting from a refreshed mind and body, or through a more extensive application of machinery per unit of labor. Otherwise higher wages only become an aggravating factor in raising commodity price levels, and energizing the "vicious economic circle" which calls for still further wage increases and the repetition of the cumulative progression upwards. In the final analysis, I believe economic democracy, correctly interpreted, means "distributive justice," if I may use the words of a distinguished Catholic economist. The British Labor party's reconstruction program would seem to confirm this interpretation. The four "pillars" designed to support its socio-economic structure, and on which I shall comment in a following article, apparently constitute, with some important revisions, a feasible economic mechanism, capable of effecting a more scientific and equitable distribution of wealth than now prevails. While intrinsically sound, our present system does not direct the various shares now going to land, labor, capital, and the entrepreneur in the full and proper proportions, so as to conduce to universal human well-being. Especially is this true respecting unskilled labor. War and rising living costs have only emphasized the social madadjustments for which not a few corfective programs have been advanced. Socialism is omnipresent with its specifics, but Socialism would shortly develop into State tyranny and State absolutism. British labor has promulgated its program, and our own Federal Government has constituted a commission to outline an industrial and labor policy. In its report, this commission counsels the creation of a National War Labor Board.

Russian Socialism

SOCIALISM as sponsored by Bolshevism, both in its economic and political aspects, will first be reviewed. The Socialist party in Russia consists of the majority faction, the Bolsheviki or Maximalists, and the minority faction, the Mensheviki or Minimalists. Lenine was and is now leading the former element, while Kerensky and the "intellectual" Socialists represented the latter. The Minimalists are the practical Socialists. They believe in effecting reforms gradually even through the instrumentality of existing political parties and economic institutions. They anticipate the millennium only in the distant future. Kerensky's party alone recognized Russia's proper relations to her Allies and determined to fight autocracy first and then institute reforms at home. Lenine and Trotzky, as spokesmen for the Bolsheviki, reversed the process. Opposing Kerensky because he failed to give Russia a peace at any price, they disorganized the industrial organization at home and ordered an armistice and demobilization on the eastern front. The bourgeoisie were dispossessed, wealth expropriated, bank funds transferred or simply stolen, industry slackened and the channels of distribution actually dammed. In fact, their economic warfare was so extended that everybody who had ever saved a dollar was deemed bourgeois and as possessing no rights worthy of recognition. Such is the Bolshevist idea of industrial democracy.

Bolsheviki in America

THE Russian fiasco is consummated. How that benighted land ever hopes to achieve political democracy, the forerunner of industrial democracy, while it remains the footstool of the Kaiser has not been explained. The world must first be made "safe for democracy" politically, only after this can industrial and social reconstruction begin. The Russian Bolsheviki seem to have forgotten this; the American "Bolsheviki," Nearing, Berger and other "intellectuals," are blind to it. Spargo, Russell and other leaders of the orphaned American Socialist party, through their disaffection with their former political allegiance, most emphatically confirm this fact. America has extended her sympathy to a misled people seeking to become masters of their own destiny, and also to encourage Russia in the fight against the common foe. Our country expresses the same solicitude for the people of Russia now under the dominance of Germany as she does for unfortunate Belgium, Northern France, Serbia and Roumania. Nevertheless, the awful penalty for the failure of Russia experimentalists is being paid by America and the Allies. The American and British laborer and the French peasant are being opposed in hand to hand combat on the western front by Teutonic hordes released through the Bolshevist perfidy. The Central Powers through peace arrangements with Roumania and the Ukraine, have removed the last vestiges of fear of starvation, so that now we can no longer hope to bring Germany to submission through any economic blockade. The small French bourgeoisie, noted for their thrift and frugality, will largely lose their savings now invested in Russian loans, unless a responsible Russia guarantees them; and finally, Russia, split into several quasi-independent States, is doomed to supply Germany with the human munitions and provisions for future wars, unless we are victorious.

We have our Bolsheviki in this country, nominally posing as the champions of our "exploited classes." They, too, would "fight" the Kaiser with platitudes; they, too, are urging a desultory prosecution and even cessation of the war, by striving to undermine the morale of our citizenship and military forces, just at the time relentless German might stalks about unconquered on the battlefields of Europe. A peace with such a Germany drunk with military success, would be most premature and, for a free country, shameful. It would involve the recognition of German world-mastery, the forfeiture of democracy in its most vital forms, the political and economic tyranny of a military caste, and indemnities severe enough to conscript the savings of the humblest workman in America. And such a peace would result as surely as the machinations of the Russian dreamer, playing into the hands of a shrewd German diplomacy, forced Russia to sign a degrading pact. Far from achieving political democracy, the Bolsheviki have only made the struggle of the free nations the more difficult. With German autocracy rampant, freedom, both industrial and political, is impossible.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Our Men in France

IT is delightful to read Father Coakley's impressions of our American soldiers at the front, as described in a letter published in the Pittsburgh Observer. After his first week's experience with our army in France he wrote:

> The character of the men is a revelation. Perhaps I should not say this, but I had heard so much from inexperienced persons as to what to expect in the army, that the realization is a grateful surprise. I have been in this camp for nearly a week, associating with the officers and men intimately, at meals, in the field, at instruction camps, at lectures, in all places, and I have found as high and as generous natures and as noble characters as I have ever found in my life. In quarters where one would least expect it, one finds unsullied innocence, the sound mind in the sound body, men keen, alert, fresh, active, intelligent, bubbling over with enthusiasm, working hard and with no time for the sordid things of life. I have heard less profanity, for instance, during the last week at this camp than I could hear any day on the streets of Pittsburgh, which, to me at least, proves that the fine flower of chivalry still blooms fair and lovely in the American army.

So far as the chaplains themselves are concerned, says Father Coakley, everything possible is done by the officers to facilitate their work. Orderlies are at their disposal, announcements are read out at camp gatherings, and the brigade and regiment bands are gladly offered for religious services.

The New Food Regulations

A REDUCTION of our monthly consumption of wheat from 42,000,000 to 21,000,000 bushels, or fully one-half, is described by the Food Administration as an "essential provision." This would leave approximately a pound and a half of wheat products for each person per week. The new rules, with which a voluntary compliance is expected, may thus be briefly summarized:

(1) Householders shall not use more than one pound and a half of wheat products per person each week. (2) Hotels and clubs shall observe two wheatless days per week as at present, and in addition shall not serve to any one guest at one meal breadstuffs containing in the aggregate more than two ounces of wheat flour; nor shall they serve any wheat products unless specially ordered. (3) Retailers shall not sell more than one-eighth of a barrel of flour to any town customer at one time, nor more than one-quarter barrel to a country customer, and in no case shall they sell wheat products without selling an equal weight of other cereals. (4) Bakers and grocers are asked to reduce the victory bread sold by delivery from a one pound loaf to a three-quarter pound loaf. The same proportions are to be observed in other weights. (5) Manufacturers using wheat products for non-food purposes shall cease such use entirely. (6) No limit is placed upon the use of other cereals, flours and meals, etc.

It is hoped that with the arrival of harvest these restrictions may be relaxed. The suggestion is made that those who can afford to substitute other products should strive to forego the use of wheat entirely, thus leaving a margin for the poor who are dependent upon bakeries and unable easily to readjust their diet.

Self-Denial and the Liberty Loan

THE virtue of self-denial is earnestly urged by the Government in connection with the purchase of Liberty Loan Bonds. Aside from all supernatural motives, the following purely natural reasons are deserving of consideration. The American citizen who, instead of spending a given sum for articles that are not strictly necessary, denies himself and lends the money to the Government performs a two-fold service. In the first place he provides the country with the sinews of war. In the second he relieves to that same extent the drain on our "goods and services." In other words, he saves all the labor that would be required for the manufacture of the articles he wished to buy, and in addition allows so much more freight space for Government needs. Thus by his sacrifice he has left at the disposal of the country a certain amount of material, a certain amount of labor, and a certain amount of transportation facilities. When millions of other citizens pursue this same course we can understand what it will mean to the country at large. It implies a loan of millions of dollars, a supply of tremendous quantities of material, and free space in hundreds of thousands of cars left entirely at the Government's disposal. Hence the reason for urging thrift and self-denial in connection with the War-Savings Stamps and the Liberty Loan.

Mailing Parcels to American Expeditionary Forces

IT is important that attention be called to the new postal regulations dealing with the mailing of parcels to members of the American Expeditionary Forces abroad. Postmasters are not permitted to accept for mailing any articles addressed to such members unless sent at the written request of the soldier or other individual connected with these forces. Such requests must further have the approval of the regimental or higher commander, or of an executive officer of the organization to which the addressee is attached. Postmasters are ordered to secure in each case the assurance of the sender that all the articles contained in the parcel are sent at the addressee's approved written request. This must be inclosed in the parcel and the sender must place, under his name and address, the following indorsement on the wrapper of the parcel: "This parcel contains only articles sent at approved request of addressee, which is inclosed." The new orders and instructions are issued at the request of the War Department. Express and freight companies are bound by the same regulations.

Bishop Russell on the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A.

IN the Charleston Evening Post for March 13, a clear statement is offered by Bishop Russell relative to the Y. M. C. A. and the Y. W. C. A. Non-Catholics cannot fail to appreciate the force of his argument. He had been asked to make an address in behalf of a Y. W. C. A. campaign, and in declining the invitation explained that he did not refuse his assistance because these organizations were Protestant. Were they frankly to profess themselves such and ask his cooperation in any philanthropic work he would be pleased to comply. But it was not possible to do so when they called themselves Christian, and at the same time implied by their constitution that Catholics cannot be comprehended under that term, but are nothing more in their eyes than infidels. He, therefore, could not join forces with them without insulting his own Church. Here is the pith of the Bishop's argument, which members of the Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. can readily comprehend by placing themselves in our position:

> Both these organizations call themselves Christian. At the same time their constitutions exclude Catholics, the largest Christian body in the world, from active membership. Catholics, it is true, may become members, but only on a par with the infidel, the Mormon or the Mohammedan. I am a Christian. Consequently, I cannot affiliate in any way with an organization which, while professing to be Christian, says to me by the provisions of its constitution: "You are not a Christian."

It is the Bishop's suggestion that both these associations should squarely place themselves before the public as "Protestant evangelical associations." This would change the Y. M.

C. A. into Y. M. P. A. and no offence could be taken by Catholics. "They should change their name or their constitution." We would quite readily cooperate with any Protestant organization in any plan for the good of the community, he adds, "but we cannot do so without stultifying ourselves so long as these organizations refuse to recognize us as Christians."

American Jews Pay Tribute to John Redmond

A MARKED copy of the American Israelite was sent to us containing the following tribute to the memory of John Redmond:

> It is not only the Irish people who have lost an ardent champion through the death of John Redmond, for so many years the brave and intelligent leader of the Irish Parliamentary party. The Jews the world over have through the passing of John Redmond been deprived of a sincere and whole-souled friend, who at the time of the fearful massacres at Kishineff and elsewhere, directed the attention of the world to the barbarities and atrocities which were being committed in Russia and so stirred the conscience of the civilized nations that a universal protest put an end, at least temporarily, to the outrages. Nor was John Redmond silent when even in his own country there were those who sought to soil Ireland's record of never having persecuted Jews, and a malicious attack was made upon the good name of the Jews of Ireland by the Limerick Confraternity. It was John Redmond, backed by all decent and fair-minded Irishmen, who put an end to the agitation.

For these reasons the Jews wish their gratitude to be placed upon record and to be "counted among the mourners for John Redmond."

Latest Catholic Statistics for the United States

IN his recent statistics of church-membership in the United States, Dr. H. K. Carroll remarked:

> The Roman Catholic Church added to its numbers in 1916 nearly 390,000 estimated communicants; the editor of the "Official Catholic Directory" estimates the net increase for 1917 at 175,000 "population," which represents 148,750 communicants, a falling off in net gains of 241,250. The reason which promptly suggests itself is failure of immigration, which has long been a source of increase to that polyglot Church.

Dr. Carroll is curiously mistaken both in his figures and his conclusion. He had taken the statistics for 1916 and ascribed them, by an explicable but rather unscientific oversight, to 1917. The fact is that the figures for 1917 are now set forth for the first time in the 1918 issue of the "Official Catholic Directory," published by P. J. Kenedy and Sons, New York, and at present in the hands of the binder. We find that the increase in the number of Catholics for the year 1917 actually amounts to 393,424. Nor does this represent the entire growth of the Catholic Church in the United States, since in thirty-eight dioceses no new census was taken last year. The conclusion consequently is exactly the opposite of that drawn by Dr. Carroll; for since no immigration was possible, as he himself argues, it follows that the splendid growth of the Church during the past year has been entirely indigenous, not foreign but purely American. The present number of Catholics in the United States is 17,416,303. Our total increase during the last ten years has been no less than 3,538,877. Mr. Joseph H. Meier, who during all this period has compiled these statistics for the "Catholic Directory," adds the following important comment:

> The figure 17,416,303 is not at all exaggerated, in fact, the figure is low, as no records can be kept of the "floating" Catholic population and as nearly all of the thirty-eight dioceses in which no census was taken have surely increased in population during the past few years. If it were possible to show the increases for the thirty-eight dioceses, among which are some of the important Archdioceses in the country, and if it were possible to gather data on the "floating" Catholic population of the United States, the actual Catholic population of this country would be shown to be over 19,000,000. Special care was taken so that the young men in the military service would not be counted twice, that is, once in the diocese in which the camp or cantonment was located and again in their home dioceses. Arrangements were made to include only the Catholic soldiers and sailors in their home dioceses.

If to the figures already quoted we add the number of Catholics in Alaska, the Canal Zone, the Virgin Islands, Guam, our possessions in Samoa, the Hawaiian Islands, Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands, it will be found, according to the advance sheets of the "Catholic Directory", that the total number of Catholics under the protection of the Stars and Stripes is 26,266,642. Taking into account all the inevitable omissions in such a census it is safe to say that there are approximately 30,000,000 Catholics under the folds of our starry banner. In the list of Catholic army and navy chaplains will be found the names of 309 Catholic priests. Additional chaplains have since been appointed, but their names arrived too late for insertion in the new issue of the Directory. We may further judge the development of the Church by these items of special interest:

> There are now 20,477 Catholic priests in the United States. Of this number 14,922 are secular priests and 5,555 are priests of Religious Orders. Other figures are as follows: archbishops, 13; bishops, 93; churches with resident priests, 10,369; missions with churches, 5,448; seminaries, 106; seminarians, 7,238; parochial schools, 5,748; children attending parochial schools, 1,593,407; colleges for boys, 217; academies for girls, 677; orphan asylums, 297; homes for aged, 109.

We are further informed that there are now twenty-seven States in the Union with a Catholic population of 100,000 souls or more.

Passing of a Great Missionary

THE REV. GEORGE DE LA MOTTE, S.J., whose death occurred recently at St. Ignatius Mission, Montana, was a man who combined in himself many exceptional qualities. As a brilliant theologian he distinguished himself at Woodstock College, Md., by the public defense of all philosophy and theology. Later he was made rector of the Jesuit School of philosophy and theology in the far West, and taught in the department of theology. At another period he was superior of the entire Rocky Mountain "Mission" of the Jesuits, which he directed for many years. When in 1907 the Jesuit Missions of California and of the Rocky Mountains were combined he was again chosen superior to prepare them for the further development that was soon to follow, when they were erected into the independent California Province of the Society of Jesus. While these achievements made him a man of public note, he will perhaps be best remembered as an ardent missionary to the Indians. Among them he had spent his early years of activity in the religious life, learning their tongue and teaching them the mysteries of the Faith. With them his heart remained always, no matter what honors might be given him or what dignities thrust upon him. When relieved of the duties of his public office he at once asked to be sent back to his beloved Indians. He was one of the most revered and successful missionaries that have labored among these tribes, and Mission Valley will long bear its testimony to his life of heroic sacrifice and devotion to duty. He was master of three different Indian languages, and loved nothing better than to teach his redskin children the rudiments of our holy religion, to picture to them the scenes of the sacred life and death of Christ, or to instruct them in his clear and simple way in the sublime mysteries of Christianity. The Catholic Indian Missions have sustained a great loss through the death of this zealous priest, and our Indian Mission Bureau has been deprived of one of its most efficient and ardent colaborers.

The War.—The offensive of Picardy has turned into the battle of Flanders, the brunt of the fighting during the week centering around the historic fields of Ypres. The week began with a struggle for the village of Neuve Eglise on a plateau 225 feet above the sea or 165 above the surrounding plain, and midway between Messines and Bailleul. Against the height the Germans launched attack after attack. Twice they took the town only to be driven out by the British. They succeeded finally in holding it, and thus secured their first foothold on high ground in Flanders. From the strategic point thus won they moved forward towards Wulverghem at the southern edge of the Messines Ridge, and the day after taking Neuve Eglise occupied that town. Reports of April 16 told of some British positions taken at Bailleul, but stated also that massed enemy attacks on Merville to the south, on the edge of the Nieppe Forest, were repulsed. Wytschaete, at the northern end of the Messines Ridge, and Spanbroekmolem, in the central and highest point of the Ridge, were captured soon after by the enemy with a fierce struggle. At the same time severe fighting was in progress on the nine-mile front running northwest from Meteren, about a mile west of Bailleul in which the Germans also gained a footing, to Wytschaete. Bailleul, which had been under fire for several days, had to be evacuated by the British, who fell back on an east and west line slightly north of Bailleul and Wulverghem. For a while the British in a series of counter-attacks effected a temporary lodgment in Meteren and Wytschaete, but were again forced to retire. Simultaneously with the withdrawal of the British from these positions, the enemy directed an intense bombardment along the whole Lys front on the British lines and launched heavy infantry attacks on the twelve-mile stretch from the Forest of Nieppe to Wytschaete; these, however, were repulsed. In the Ypres salient the forward British positions east of the town had to be withdrawn to a new line, while the enemy occupied Poelcapelle and Langemarck and the village of Passchendaele on the ridge of the same name northeast of Ypres.

Bulletin, Apr. 15, p.m.-Apr. 22, a.m.

On April 18, switching their main attack from the northern flank on the Lys salient to the southern flank, the Germans delivered a series of terrific assaults on the Allied front from Givenchy just west of La Bassée, eleven miles northwest to the neighborhood of St. Venant. Field Marshal Haig reported the enemy repulsed at every point. On the same day the enemy attacked the northern flank of the salient, especially in the neighborhood of Kemmel, north of Wulverghem, but was also repulsed there. At the same time local enemy attacks in the neighborhood of Merris, southeast of Bailleul, were beaten off. Dispatches covering these events added that in the Hangard region slightly northwest of Montdidier, between the Somme and the Avre, the French were beginning to attack the enemy. The official reports from both London and Berlin of April 19 agree that on that date the battle-front on the Lys remained virtually unchanged with an evident lull in the operations. British positions at Caudescure, north of Merville, were subjected to heavy gunfire, while British and French guns harassed the German troops and transports moving behind the battle-front. Bridges thrown by the enemy over La Bassée Canal, notably at Hinges, were destroyed and ground lost by the British at Robecq was regained. Mount Kemmel, west of Wytschaete on the northern flank of the salient, was evidently becoming the goal of the German offensive. The lull in the fighting on the Lys front continued on April 20, no major operations being reported. On the Belgian front northeast of Ypres enemy raids near the Passchendaele Ridge were beaten off. In the Givenchy-Festubert region west of La Bassée some ground was regained by the British, and a little further westward in the neighborhood of Robecq, German attacking parties were driven off. The latest reports indicate minor Allied successes at Robecq and northeast of Ypres.

Operations with the Americans in France attained a maximum of intensity hitherto unequaled. In the Verdun sector at St. Mihiel, and especially near Toul, our forces participated in fighting of the severest nature. Twelve hundred German troops attacked the American positions west of Rennères Forest, northwest of Toul. They succeeded in penetrating the front-line trenches and captured the village of Seicheprey, but after fierce fighting were driven back. The Germans claim to have taken over 100 American prisoners and some machine guns.

In Palestine a new Turco-German drive was opened against the British near the coast without any substantial success. Activity was resumed in the Balkans, the Allies taking a few unimportant villages. German forces have captured Helsingfors, the capital of Finland, and the Turks are in Batoum. Italian troops are fighting on the right wing of the Allies in France. The French have reinforced Field Marshal Haig's armies. The Bolshevist Government has sent an order to Vladivostok to send the war material concentrated there to Western Europe. Meanwhile, more Japanese troops are reported to be on the way to Vladivostok, where British and American soldiers are also stationed. Anti-Japanese demonstrations are said to be increasing in that city.

Changes in Various Cabinets

In England Lord Milner succeeded Lord Derby as Secretary of State for War, while Austen Chamberlain joined the War Cabinet. Both additions are expected to make for a firmer prosecution of the war. Lord Derby succeeds Sir Francis Bertie as Ambassador at Paris. The "explosion" growing out of the controversy between Premier Clemenceau and Count Czernin with regard to the statement of the Count that France had approached Austria on the question of peace, a statement qualified as a "lie" by the French Premier, ended with the resignation of the Austro-Hungarian Premier. He is succeeded by Count Burian, who also retains his portfolio as Minister of Finance. Dr. Alexander Wekerle, Hungarian Premier and Minister of Finance, also resigned and was succeeded by Count Tisza. The letter which Premier Clemenceau declared had been written by Emperor Charles of Austria to his brother-in-law, Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, and had been communicated by the latter to Premier Painlevé on March 31, 1917, and in which the Emperor admitted the justice of the claims of France to Alsace-Lorraine, was disavowed by the Emperor, who pledged anew his loyalty to the Teutonic alliance.

On April 20 President Wilson issued a proclamation extending to women of German and Austro-Hungarian nationality more than fourteen years of age the restrictions previously imposed on the men of these nationalities residing in the United States. The time from which these women shall be forbidden to enter the barred zones, such as the vicinity of steamship docks and munition plants, etc., was left by the President to the Attorney General. The Attorney General gave notice shortly after the President's proclamation that alien enemy women would not be brought under the terms of the new regulation until they had time and opportunity to apply for permits and show reasons why they should be allowed to enter the restricted areas. The regulation prohibiting enemy alien women from entering or remaining in the District of Columbia becomes effective immediately. The Attorney General, however, ruled that transients among them would be allowed to remain in the District until April 22, while those who had resided there since the United States had entered the war would be allowed until May 5 to leave. Another proclamation by the President appointed April 26 as a day on which to hold patriotic gatherings in order to further the Liberty Loan campaign.

Other Items

Mr. Charles M. Schwab, Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, was drafted by the Government to build ships. He is now Director General of the Emergency Fleet Corporation, with full powers of supervision and direction of the work of shipbuilding. His authority in nowise conflicts with that of the other members of the Shipping Board. It is estimated that in 1918 "ship production" will amount to 4,000,000 tons. The return of Secretary of War Baker from France after six weeks' absence finds the country ready for the Secretary's declaration that "speed up" is to be the watchword from now on. One evidence of this is a new call for 50,000 more drafted men, a change in the draft law basing quotas on the number of men in Class 1, and the agreement of Congress to draft men who have reached the age of twenty-one since July, 1917.

Canada.—According to the Toronto correspondent of the New York Times, the Military Service act has proved a failure in Canada. Its weakness lay in the fact that it allowed three appeals, one to a local tribunal, a second to a provincial judicial tribunal, and a third to a central appeal tribunal at Ottawa. As a consequence, exemptions have been numerous. After six months' application of the act it was found that Class 1, in which more than 400,000 men had registered, yielded only 30,000 soldiers. The report declares that there were three great disappointments in the administration of the act:

A New Conscription

(1) The huge percentage of men who failed to pass the medical tests. Every one was prepared for a percentage that would be higher than that disclosed in the examination of recruits under the voluntary system, but no one was prepared for a showing of defectives which in some localities ran as high as 60 per cent. (2) The passive resistance of the French Canadian population, which, by taking advantage of the multiple appeals and the scarcity of judges in the Province of Quebec, has up to the present nullified the act so far as a quarter of the population is concerned. Only about 1,500 French Canadians have been conscripted yet. (3) Occupational exemptions have exceeded all estimates. From the beginning it was announced that agriculture would be a favored occupation. But to agriculture was added others, notably munition and railway work.

To remedy this the Government has ordered all unmarried men between the ages of twenty and twenty-three to the colors, without right of appeal and regardless of occupation. For the present physical unfitness only will bring about release from the army.

France.—French Catholics have been appealing to M. Clemenceau to grant to Catholic soldiers the exercise of the rights enjoyed by Jews and Mussulmans. Notwithstanding the appeals, however, he has not availed himself of the opportunity to meet the request. Official circulars, which were made public long since, secure complete liberty of conscience for all except Catholics, but the letter concerning the Catholic soldiers was marked confidential. The Paris correspondent of the Irish Catholic remarks on this:

The consequence has been, and is still, that a too great number of officers seem to take pleasure in rendering it impossible for the Catholic soldiers under their orders to attend the celebration of Mass on Sunday, when, in reality, there is no real necessity so far as the hostilities are concerned, to occupy the men in drilling or other fatigue duties. A great many people, and amongst them numerous influential Catholics, imagine that M. Clemenceau has recognized the error of his ways, in so far as his former attitude towards the Catholic Church is concerned, and that he will demand the resumption of diplomatic relations with the Vatican. It is possible, and indeed probable, he regrets many of his hostile acts and utterances against the Catholics, but he, unfortunately, remains the prisoner of those acts and words. The fear of the anti-religious Socialists will almost certainly prevent him from ever crying mea culpa.

Despite this petty persecution of the Catholic soldiers, their spirit is admirable, as can be judged from this interesting narrative contributed to the aforesaid paper:

Mgr. Ruch, the young and valiant coadjutor of the Bishop of Nancy, who was mobilized as chaplain on the outbreak of war in August, 1914, and who has, by his admirable conduct during the hostilities earned the Cross of the Legion of Honor, as well as the War Cross, came to Paris last week to deliver a lecture on his experiences and recollections. In presenting the prelate to the audience, M. Doumic enhanced the interest of his hearers in the lecturer by relating that, in order to keep his engagement to appear before them, he had been obliged to ride close on fifty miles on a bicycle to the railway station, and then to travel the whole of the night standing in the gallery of one of the carriages of a terribly over-crowded train. Mgr. Ruch spoke of the wounded soldiers. He had, he said, administered consolation to at least 20,000 of them. What was most worthy of admiration in them was, he contended, not the exceptional heroism of a certain number of them, but the excellent bearing of the great mass of the wounded men. The three great sources of their courage, when fighting against the barbarous foe, were the fatherland, the family, and God. It is universally acknowledged that there is no greater proof of affection than to give one's life for what one loves. Mgr. Ruch declared there could be no doubt that it is for the salvation of their country the French soldiers suffer and, if need be, die. That sentiment, he affirmed, dictated to many of the wounded men he consoled on their deathbed to cry, with almost their last breath, Vive la France. The wounded men are, with very few exceptions, conscious that the family is, so to speak, the heart of the fatherland, and the chaplain knows with what true love the wounded and dying men think of their fathers, mothers, sisters, and brothers. Lastly, with regard to God, most certainly all the French soldiers are not saints. But suffering and the approach of death—in a word, sufferings entailed by fighting in a good cause—awaken, even more frequently than may be imagined, righteous thoughts, not only in devout Catholics, but also in the minds of men who had long since ceased to practise the religion in which they were born. As a matter of fact, religion is, on the battle-field and wherever men suffer and die, the great consoler. And Mgr. Ruch, perhaps better than the vast majority of people, knows it alone can enable men to accept with equanimity suffering and death, because it shows that, after suffering and death, there is the divine certainty of another life with endless happiness.

From reports sent by the French correspondent of AMERICA, it appears that the religious revival, mentioned by Mgr. Ruch, continues to be a subject of animated discussion in France.

Ireland.—The war-power bill, which contains the now famous Irish Conscription clause, passed the third reading in the House of Commons on Wednesday, April 17, by a vote of 301 to 103, was put through the House of Lords the following day and was immediately given the royal assent. Despite this, the determination of the Irish nation to resist the draft has increased rather than diminished. Early in the week Cardinal Logue, Archbishop Walsh of Dublin and Bishop Fogarty of Killaloe, warned England against any attempt to enforce the act, and on Thursday, April 18, the Hierarchy met at Maynooth and issued a manifesto, which was signed by twenty-seven prelates, to the effect that conscription against the will of the people is oppressive and inhuman and may be resisted by all means in keeping with the law of God. On the same day a conference of the leaders of all factions, Carson's excepted, met in Dublin and declared that any attempt to enforce the draft would be an unwarranted aggression which would be resisted by all Irishmen by the most effective means at their disposal. The Irish Trades Congress proposed a workless day to give workmen a chance to sign anti-conscription pledges, nine-tenths of the population concurring in the plan. At Cork the rural district council refused to transact any business whatever, and from far-off Sydney, New South Wales, a labor council called upon Lloyd George to reconsider his decision, since his determination was unjust and would lead to grave complications. The country is in a state of intense agitation, and evidently with a view to appeasing the angry people, the British authorities declared priests exempt from the draft. The exemption left the Irish unappeased, and meetings of protest were held even in Ulster. Young men are leaving the colleges for home. St. John's College, Waterford, is empty, and all students, save those in Major Orders, have left Maynooth. Many English and Irish Unionist papers have become alarmed. The Irish Times, hitherto conscriptionist, implored the Government to seize the last opportunity to escape from a miserable position by a voluntary recruiting campaign. The Times declared that if the Bishops and the Nationalists united five divisions of Irish volunteers would be raised before the act could be put into operation. The Daily News urged the Government to drop the attempt to draft the Irish, declaring that at the moment the one question of any consequence is to avoid the terrible blow to the cause of the Allies which a "declaration of war" upon Ireland implies.

Conscription

It does not really matter whether Irish resistance to the attempt to enforce conscription would be judged as right or wrong, reasonable or unreasonable. Here is the fact before us that a great majority of Irishmen are united in repudiating the claims of the Government and are determined to resist its enforcement at all costs. That being so it is certain that hope of extracting by means of a new military service act a considerable body of the new troops from Ireland is doomed to disappointment.

The Sheffield Telegraph strikes a different note and affirms that the threats of Ireland must not intimidate the Government. In its opinion, > Men either stand by freedom or on the side of those fighting against freedom; with the nations in which there is government of the people and by the people or on the side of autocratic military domination. For the common folk there is no middle course. We Britons know where we stand. So do the French, the Italians and the Americans. Where does Nationalist Ireland stand in deliberately pledging itself to resist what democratic America has accepted in the cause of freedom and progress?

> The Allies have conscription. Only Ireland has been excused—Ireland, which pretends it has always been treated worse than other countries and which is always hunting some sort of grievance. Its mock heroics finding no sort of sympathy in the United States, to which it always shouts for admiration, it is forgetting this war is as much America's war as it is France's or Britain's, and the people of the States are displaying impatience with men who refuse to bear arms in the defense of dearly won freedom in this hour when everything is in danger.

After declaring that Irishmen are always against the Government and ready to fight anybody but the enemy they should fight, the Telegraph concludes: "Ireland never was guilty of greater injustice than now when its action places it on the side of the tyrant against the free peoples of the world."

Later in the week, on Saturday, April 20, fifty-five members of the Irish party met in Dublin, John Dillon presiding, and unanimously adopted this resolution:

> In the present crisis we are of the opinion that the highest and most immediate duty of the members of this party is to remain in Ireland and actively cooperate with their constituents in opposing the enforcement of compulsory military service in Ireland. The enforcement of compulsory military service on a nation without its assent constitutes one of the most brutal acts of tyranny and oppression of which any Government can be guilty. The present proposal of the Lloyd George Government to enforce conscription in Ireland is an outrage and a gross violation of the national rights of Ireland.

The resolution states that the history of the relations between the two countries, the ruin and decay of the Irish population under English domination and the manner in which Ireland's generous offer at the outbreak of war was received cruelly intensifies the shameless character of the present proposal. The same day 1,500 delegates of trades unions meeting at the Mansion House, Dublin, pledged resistance to the draft and determined on the stoppage of all work as a sign of their protest. Strangely enough there were present delegates from Ulster, from Londonderry, for instance, and from Belfast, where the first anti-draft riot took place. On April 21 Mr. Dillon received this cablegram from the Hierarchy of Australia: "Considering the invariable failure of coercion in Ireland, we strenuously protest against any attempt by the British Government to conscript Ireland." The pledge to resist conscription was taken by hundreds of thousands of people on Sunday, April 21. Huge throngs of people met in the open air or in halls and repeated the pledge sentence by sentence or raised their right hands in assent or signed the document. The Bishop of Ross, addressing 3,000 people at Skibbereen, pointed out that the conscription order was not yet given and would not be given for many weeks, perhaps months. He declared that if the people were cool and determined it would never be given. The Bishop of Cloyne told a large audience at Queenstown that the Irish were facing a powerful and unscrupulous adversary, who was without heart and sympathy; he warned the people to avoid collision with the armed force of Great Britain. Meantime the British have prepared for the worst. General French and his staff are active. According to the Cork correspondent of the Daily Chronicle, the British authorities have taken control of the principal Irish railways, the post-office and telephone exchanges, and the police have removed all arms and ammunition from the gunsmiths' shops and other places.

Russia.—The diplomatic representatives of the Allied Powers have been informed by the Siberian Provincial Duma that a Government of Autonomous Siberia has been organized by the various cooperative societies of the country. The new Government proclaims its objects to be these:

"Autonomous Siberia"

> To establish public order with the purpose of assuring the inviolability of person and of property. To oppose actively the Bolsheviki, so that the legitimate power of the All-Russian National Constituent Assembly may be securely established. To defend the political and economic independence and the territorial integrity of Siberia. To convene an All-Siberian Constituent Assembly. To resist actively the peace concluded with the Central Empires by the Bolshevist Government, co-operating in this with the Allied Powers, with the view of concluding jointly with the allied nations a general democratic peace. To re-establish friendly, recognized relations with the allied and neutral nations based on existing agreements and treaties. To take all necessary measures to counteract the further penetration of Russian territory by the enemy Powers.

The Autonomous Government hopes for the ready and energetic assistance of the Allied Powers in carrying out this difficult program.

M. Gukovsky, the new Minister of Finance, reported on April 16 to the Executive Committee of the Workmen's and Soldiers' delegates regarding Russia's financial condition and announced that the semi-annual expenditure would amount to only 40,000,000 rubles. The railroads, he said, were carrying 70 per cent less freight than formerly, the wages of employees had been increased several hundred per cent and their hours reduced, necessitating three or four shifts. No taxes are being collected by the Central Government, as local Soviets are using all moneys for their own purposes. The Minister pictured industrial conditions as deplorable, giving as an instance that in one place the manufacture of a single locomotive now costs 600,000 rubles and only two a day are produced.

Impending Bankruptcy

Soviet troops have stamped out the anarchist organization in Moscow, and the city is now quiet.

The Popes and Rome's Destiny

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

ON September 20, 1870, the Piedmontese troops of Victor Emmanuel II battered down the Porta Pia and marched into Rome. The temporal power of the Popes had come to an end. On the day preceding this act of injustice and treachery, Pius IX had driven to the Piazza of St. John Lateran, and to prepare himself, no doubt, by the memories of the Passion of his Master, for his own impending sorrows and trial had ascended the Scala Santa and blessed the little band of soldiers under General Kanzler, who were to defend the gate. Since that day no Roman Pontiff has ever been seen in the streets of Rome. The Pope, it is true, still resides in the Vatican. Now and again a glimpse may be had of him in St. Peter's, but he goes no more as a king among his people, to kneel at the shrines of Rome's hundred saints or to comfort as Pio Nono was wont to do in their humble home the sorrows of the outcast and the poor.

Time and again the world has seen the Pope driven from Rome. Surrounded as we are by tragedies enacted almost daily before our very eyes, we cannot tell whether the time may not come again when we shall see another Pope taking the road of exile and forced, as many of his predecessors have been in the past, either to rely for safety and shelter on the hospitality of a friend, or to remain a prisoner under the eye of some bitter foe. We need not go back very far in history to meet such a picture. A hundred years ago, in the midst of another world war, the conqueror of Marengo and Austerlitz held the saintly Pius VII a prisoner at Fontainebleau, only to find that the will of his gray-haired captive was stronger than the threats and the violence of an armed conqueror. Thirty-three years later Pius IX was forced by a revolution made to order by his enemies to take refuge at Gaeta under the protection of the King of Naples. Ferdinand of Naples had perhaps made many blunders in life, but his welcome to the exiled Pope showed that he had the true instincts of royalty.

The City of Rome occupies a unique position in the history of the world. Two civilizations meet there. In is the Eternal City. Whether we consider it as the seat of the Caesars or of the Popes, no other city can point to such permanence of power and empire. The kings that reigned there when its walls were built were but figures of those white-robed shepherds who were to rule from the Vatican hill. Its republic and its empire were but the dim image of the wider republic and the nobler empire of which the Leos, the Gregories and the Innocents of later ages were to be the masters and the legislators. When pagan Rome passed away, and the City of Augustus, Diocletian and Romulus Augustulus tottered under the blows of the Heruli and their confederate tribes, it did not seem strange that the Popes should step into the place of its helpless rulers. Rome seemed almost to have been waiting for their coming. Papal Rome saved the Rome of old. Through the Popes Rome received a second birth and reached a height of glory, a fullness of sway and influence of which the former city could never dream.

We cannot conceive of Rome without the Popes. They have preserved for us the civilization, the arts, the letters, the monuments of the past. It is hard now to realize that the successor of the men who saved it from the barbarians and who long ruled, not without mistakes, but on the whole for the happiness of their people, is a stranger in the streets where Urban and Pius were welcomed with enthusiasm on their return from exile; that he may not safely visit the monuments which his predecessors erected and which vie in splendor and majesty with the Pantheon and the Coliseum of the imperial city. But we find it easy to imagine why it was that, guided by heaven and his own fearless heart, Peter the Fisherman chose Rome to be the seat of that nobler empire of the soul which he was to govern under the very shadow of Cæsar's house. The kingdom of which he was to be the visible ruler was to embrace all humanity under its sway. As Rome, even to the untutored minds of the countless tribes that lived under its laws was the center and the source of the power which they perforce respected and feared, it was to become the seat also of that higher power which men would come to reverence and love. By its traditions, its history, its spirit, the atmosphere which permeated all its past and seemed to hover around the shrines even of its pagan and helpless gods, it meant universality, it pointed to empire.

We are not astonished, then, at Peter's choice. We must admire its heroic audacity. It was setting empire against empire, not indeed to cause war or discord, but to strengthen, if possible, the tottering fabric of a weakened world by the supernatural help and the virtues which the religion of Christ alone could bring forth. When the temporal rule of the emperors failed of its legitimate and natural ends and the sword of their consuls was no longer able to protect their subjects, Rome looked to that other line of rulers whose only insignia had hitherto been the red robe of martyrdom, and asked them to save it. From that day Rome has been the City of the Popes. They have been its rulers, its lawgivers, its protectors, its saviors. Under them, it has grown. With them it rose to greatness. From them the City on the seven hills drew its splendor. They were its history. It was never itself, spiritually or materially, when for some reason or other the Popes withdrew from its walls or were forced into exile by the sword of the tyrant.

The Roman people was termed by Rome's greatest writers a fickle mob. Whether under the republic, the emperors or the kings, it seems to have deserved the description. It proved at times just as fickle under the Popes. But by a strange fascination and spell which the Popes seemed to have woven around the hearts of their people, the Romans ever wanted them. They drove them into exile, but they were never at rest until they saw them back again in Rome and had done them reverence once more in the Lateran or in St. Peter's and promised to behave better for the future. The rule of the Popes may not have been always thoroughly efficient, but it is much to be doubted whether from the time when the temporal power passed to their hands to the days when it was so ruthlessly and unjustly wrested from Pius IX, there was a happier people than the subjects of the Vicar of Christ. The rule of the Pope was, with rare exceptions, that of a benignant and indulgent father, and the temporal and material prosperity of his people could favorably compare with that of any of the states in Europe existing at the same time. But the Romans behaved often very much like spoiled children. They were forgiven as often as they erred.

History is there to prove that every time the Popes have to leave Rome the Eternal City loses something of its better self. It can scarcely be conceived without Peter. It would be just as easy to picture the Rome of old widowed of her consuls as it would be to think of the City of the Seven Hills without the White Shepherd of the Vatican. Whether the Sovereign Pontiffs remain at Avignon, for some time at least through their own act, or whether, like Gregory VII, Boniface VIII, Pius VII and Pius IX, they are forced into exile through the treachery of princes, Rome suffers, and with Rome the whole Christian world.

Rome is essentially the City of the Popes. For centuries it has been identified with their names, their deeds, their memories. They built her monuments. They made the basilicas of St. Peter's, St. Paul's and St. John Lateran the marvels of Christian architecture. In their libraries and museums they preserved the masterpieces of the Greek and Roman world. Under them Rome was the spiritual and for a long time the temporal capital of the Christian commonwealth. To the schools erected by the Popes scholars flocked from all parts of the world. At the solemn audiences of the Vicar of Christ, all nations met, to prove that the kingdom over which he ruled was above everything else a kingdom of the soul. To the Pope rulers appealed to have their differences settled. He was umpire and judge where kings were the litigants and kingdoms the matter under debate. From Rome and the Watchman on the Vatican hill went forth the cry of alarm when the sails of the Turkish fleet were bearing down upon the ramparts of Malta and of Rhodes. Rome was never Rome without these strange pontiff-kings from the day when the Popes emerged from the darkness of the catacombs and openly began the creation of a new world. Rome owes all that is noblest in its monuments, its history, its art, its traditions to the Fishermen who followed Peter. It does not rise to the height of its great destinies until a Pope resides and reigns there. Then Rome is the center and the heart of the living world. For almost 3,000 years she has been the pivotal point of the world's history. Even under her pagan masters she stood for law and organized society. Under the pontiff-kings who succeeded to their sway she has represented a higher law, a nobler polity. The Popes made her all that she is now. She needs them. She is shorn of her true dower and her real splendor when they are no longer in her midst. The Rienzis of the fourteenth century and the Mazzinis and the Armellinis who took their place in the nineteenth cannot be the fit substitutes for her rightful lords. If Rome suffers when the Popes have to abandon their royal city, Christendom itself feels the baneful results of their absence. The whole government of the Catholic world is disturbed. A Pope in exile from Rome means disorder in the Eternal City and in Italy. It entails a disruption of the orderly course of legislative action on the part of the Pontiff. It throws the Pope on the charity of strangers, makes communication with him and his ministers extremely difficult, hampers the action of the bureaus and tribunals of the Roman court. History has proven again and again that only when the Pontiff is in his own royal city, fully master of his person, surrounded with his legal advisers, untrammeled in his acts and absolutely free can he easily, safely and effectively rule the Church, and while governing the millions who recognize his spiritual sway, be for the world at large an effective agent and instrument in the cause of morality, order and peace.

Protestantism, Catholicism and Democracy

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

TIME was when the Catholic Church was despised because of her love for the poor. Through all the ages they have gathered about her and have always clung to her with a passionate devotion. But as democracy grows in favor, a new gibe must be invented to discredit her. The masses have grown in importance and their loyalty to the Church must be shaken. At once we find her changed into the champion of autocracy, herself the arch-autocrat of all the world. Says a Presbyterian minister:

> Protestants see no difference between a Kaiser claiming a Divine right to rule and a Pope setting up the same claim. This is the issue in a nutshell. A Protestant sees no difference between a Kaiser aiming at a world empire over which he is supreme and a Pope seeking world dominion.

We think better of Protestants than does this Presbyterian preacher. We do not believe their ignorance so abysmal as thus entirely to confuse the purely spiritual and the temporal order. We have abundant evidence before us that Protestants are capable of understanding the difference between that Kingdom which is not of this world, whose vicegerent under Christ Himself is the successor of St. Peter, and that earthly kingdom which, with all its glory, was shown to Our Saviour from the mountain top. The clean-cut, free-born, patriotic Catholic youth of America, that enrolled in such overwhelming numbers in the army and navy at the first call to the colors, did not fail clearly to perceive the difference. Neither can Protestants fail to see it, and many there are who nobly acknowledge it. Yet what did it matter to the instigators of the death of Christ that they could not fail to perceive the difference between the worldly empire of Cæsar and the purely spiritual Kingdom of Christ? They but repeated the more loudly their accusation that He claimed to be "Christ, the King." So the men now bent upon the destruction of His work on earth, His Holy Church, will still continue, in spite of their better knowledge, to ring the changes upon their new charges, assailing the "autocracy of Rome." Brazenly the Pope is accused of aiming at civil and temporal supremacy. There can be no safety for democracy until they have abolished from the face of the earth "the Catholic practice of autocracy." To give point and purpose to the calumny, Protestantism is pictured in contrast as the mother of democracy.

Now, to those acquainted with the true nature of the "Reformation" nothing could be more ludicrous and openly defiant of all historic fact than this latter assumption. As if men could ever close their ears, and that especially in our democratic age, to the echo of those lusty words of Luther addressed to his despotic princes in reference to the common people of his own time: "One must constantly cling to their necks and urge them on with whips, or else they will not go ahead. So then are the rulers to drive, beat, choke, hang, burn, behead and break upon the wheel the vulgar masses, Sir All." An excellent text, we might suggest, for the pedestal of a monument to the Reformation as "the mother of democracy"! Its authenticity cannot be questioned, for it is taken from the Protestant Erlangen edition of Luther's works (Vol. XV, 2, p. 276). A score of other passages, equally appropriate, might be added, as, for instance, that in which Luther longs for the return of the days of servitude: "So that no one could stir but the fist would come down upon his head." We refer to the Protestant Weimar edition, Vol. XXIV, pp. 367 and 368.

Luther, as we know, delighted to hurl his Jovian thunderbolts at the heads of secular princes so long as they refused to accept his new dogmas or were remiss in imposing them upon their people. But never was relentless tyranny over the bodies and consciences of men given such complete sanction as when he found a despot willing to enforce his dogmas, without so much as the change of a letter or an iota, the Luther fecit stamped upon them. Thus in his discussion of Psalm 101 (100), his ideal Lutheran autocrat becomes virtually the head of a theocratic state, is invested with absolute spiritual as well as temporal power, and is urged to enforce the new Lutheranism with the power of the sword.

Granted the fact, which no historian can deny, that Luther is the father of tyrannic autocracy in Europe, must the Reformation itself be considered equally culpable? The answer can only be a decided affirmative. Non-Catholic authors freely admit that the motives which urged the Lutheran princes to embrace the new Evangel were purely political. The fingers of a single hand, says Houston Steward Chamberlain, would be too numerous to count the princes who accepted Lutheranism from religious motives. (Grisar III, p. 929.) It was the immense autocratic power given them by Luther and extended even over the consciences of their subjects, together with the vast possibilities of material gain in the confiscation of church property, which decided their action, not to mention more ignoble motives.

The evil that Luther did lived after him. Under the new reign of autocratic Protestantism, which owed its origin to him, arose that most undemocratic and tyrannical of state policies, according to which the ruler determined the religion of his subjects. Nor did Protestant princes fail to enforce this principle most relentlessly.

Typically Protestant, too, is the doctrine of "the Divine right of kings," so persistently combated by the Catholic Church. It is the irony of fate that this great political dogma of the Reformation has now become so obnoxious that ignorant preachers and journalists actually ascribe it to the Church herself, the greatest sufferer under its iron rule. It was put into practice not merely by the Lutheran princes of Germany, but by such English monarchs also as Henry VIII, who claimed spiritual as well as temporal authority over their subjects. Its purpose was to convert the reign of the tyrannical Protestant autocrats into a Divine institution. Very different is the teaching of the Church, which simply repeats the Apostolic doctrine that all lawful authority, whether in empire or in republic, is derived from God alone, and which carefully circumscribes this power by the limits that Christ has placed, demanding for Cæsar the things of Cæsar and for God the things of God. Thus through all these ages the Catholic Church remained the sole champion of the spirit of true Christian democracy.

It may perhaps be pointed out that certain republican governments have risen into being since the days of the Reformation. This is true, but they did not arise because of it, except in so far as they were a protest against the tyrannical autocracy of Luther's ideal monarch and the noxious Reformation doctrine of the Divine right of kings. So, too, the French Revolution followed upon the abuses of the French monarchy, but only because its rich nobility had heartlessly disregarded the social teachings of the Catholic Church.

On the soil of Catholic principles only can the perfect flower of Christian democracy flourish and develop in all its beauty. Within the Fold of the Catholic Church there is no distinction of slave or freeman, of man or woman, of Greek or Roman, but all are one in Christ. At her altars all partake of the same spiritual food, king and beggar, Pope and peasant. Alike they all kneel to obtain forgiveness of their transgressions from Almighty God, through the power conferred by Christ upon the Apostles and their successors: "Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained." From the Sovereign Pontiff down to the little child that has just attained its use of reason, they must alike accuse themselves with contrite heart of all their faults against God and against their neighbor, firmly resolved to begin anew a life of justice and Christian charity. There can be no surer fulfilment of true human brotherhood and the highest ideal of democracy.

The sphere of the Church is not political. Like Christ, she aims at no dominion over the glory of this earth. She possesses no arms of the flesh to combat tyranny and despotism. Yet from her sheath she draws a mightier weapon than tyrants ever wielded, the sword of the spirit. The poor and the oppressed of all nations are alike dear to her, and she fearlessly defends their cause, as the champion of true Christian democracy, whether in empire or republic. It was her power alone that broke the shackles of the slave in the early Roman days, and again set him at liberty in the latter ages of the barbarian conquest. In our own time her voice spoke out in trumpet tones for the just rights of the masses, for the laborer and the poor, as is clear from the Encylclicals of Pope Leo XIII and Pope Pius X. The noblest ideals that actually inspire democracy today have all been drunk in with the milk of her breast.

The nations of the earth have refused to accept her as an arbiter in great conflicts. This has been their loss. Yet she has not failed to condemn injustice and greed, to offer her means and service to the unfortunate of every race, to recall to them all Christ's law of brotherhood and love. There was nothing more that she could do, because there was nothing more that men would permit her to do.

"But," comes the persistent question, "is not the Church herself an autocracy?" The great Catholic Church, the Church of all the ages, the Church of empires and republics, the Church of Christian democracy for all times, the indefectible Church of Christ, is neither more nor less than Christ Himself meant her to be. She is the Church built upon Peter, she retains in the hand of his Successor the keys of the Kingdom that Christ committed to Peter alone among all the Apostles, she perpetuates in her episcopacy the powers that Christ bestowed upon the Twelve to be transmitted to their successors to the end of time, she still daily fulfils in her priesthood the mandate of the Last Supper: "Do this in commemoration of me." If, therefore, men will speak of her today as "an autocracy," then her sole autocrat is Christ Jesus. He is the Invisible Head of the Church. To make known His name, to preach His doctrine, to confer His Sacraments in all the world is her only mission. To enthrone Him in the hearts of all is her sole ambition.

If this is criminal, the Catholic Church pleads guilty. But undemocratic the Church certainly is not. Rather is her doctrine the very foundation of the highest democracy, aiming at the truest brotherhood of all mankind. "Servant of the servants of God" is the official title of the man who embraces in his heart all the worthiest aspirations of Christian democracy in every age. His seal is the seal of the Fisherman.

President Butler on the Schools, the Nations and the War

AUSTIN O'MALLEY, M.D.

IN Philadelphia a few days ago there was a centenary commemoration of the appointing of public school controllers in that city, and the audience that did the commemorating was addressed by Dr. Nathan Schaeffer, the superintendent of public instruction in Pennsylvania since 1893, and by Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, the president of Columbia University. There was a lack of enthusiasm over this commemoration; the Governor of the State and the Mayor of the City were absent, and the newspapers gave scant space to the report.

Dr. Schaeffer, who was born in the German part of Pennsylvania, and therefore pronounces news, "noose," and is and has, "iss" and "hass," described in faint outline the beginning of the public schools in Philadelphia. He informed us that certain ignorant persons are of the opinion that the term "Lancastrian Method of Instruction" has to do with the town of Lancaster. The teachers smiled from the heights of superior knowledge. Lancaster actually was a man who once taught school in Philadelphia. One always learns a lot of important stuff at any public school meeting.

This overwhelming fact set in its proper historical perspective, he said that about 1881 or 1883—he could not remember the date—a general controller or superintendent of the public schools in Philadelphia was appointed, and now there are so many schools, so many teachers, and they are all we got for many million dollars. The head of public instruction in a State which has more than 1,000,000 inhabitants above the population of Ireland and Wales combined, talked for three-quarters of an hour bombinans in vacuo. In a few weeks, clad in the raiment of yesteryear, we must scrape together the school tax to keep up the flow of natural gas in the little red school house, while our children, who for various excellent reasons cannot avail themselves of the illumination, say grace over war-bran.

Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler assured us we are eating war-bran and our teeth are set on edge solely because the Germans have had public schools with a consistent system of education; perverted, of course, but a system. The French have had another kind since 1870, which is definite, and meets his approval because among its qualities is secularity. It insists on liberty, fraternity, and equality. He said nothing of its elimination of God, the inequality of its equality, and the effects on its pupils. Be that as it may, the English and Americans, he further assured us, have no more educational system than a school of porgies. As a distinguished educator he did not sink to the word porgies, but that is what he meant. It seems the malignant Teutonic school system, with the present war as its catastrophe, uprose, according to Dr. Butler, from certain dissertations uttered by Fichte; and all the time we had been thinking the unpleasantness now annoying us started because German soldiers sat up o' nights reading the philosophy of one Nietzsche. The reviews said so positively, and they are omniscient. German soldiers are, of course, just like our own, universally addicted to the study of philosophy, and it is fitting that the onus for their misdeeds has been shifted from Nietzsche, whose memory we have been reviling misguidedly, to the deader but guiltier Fichte. We are pleased that someone is giving a rap to Fichte. Not a few of us have always had a grievance against him since the professors of philosophy that roiled the placidity of our youth used to make us try to assimilate his doctrine, which neither they nor he understood. By the way, the Kaiser recently attributed the Germanic mental exaltation to still another philosopher, Kant; and there is something in that statement too. Kant would stir up anyone. I have met several men during the past forty years who solemnly asserted they knew what Kant was talking about, just as Dr. Butler intimated he comprehends the Fichtean speech, but not one of them could prove his assertion. People do not understand Kant; they merely mention him nonchalantly at alumni dinners because that is the vogue.

In Dr. Butler's opinion the outcome of Fichte's teaching is that the Germans have the notion the individual is for the State; the good of the State is the sole end of all sacrifice, labor, learning; the State is above morality, and a government, provided it is German, can do no wrong. These notions, it seems, in a mysterious fashion made the Germans very effective. Something certainly has made them uncomfortably effective, and we may as well blame Fichte for it as anyone else. It is scientific to put the finger just on the origin of an evil. About twenty-seven years ago when I was a student in Germany the boys all marched to school, not with bookbags on their arms but with knapsacks on their backs; they drew up in military squads at recess and solemnly kicked the football by sharp command; even the little girls on the sidewalks instead of playing ring around the rosy drilled as infantry. They have been at the same thing ever since, and this has something to do with the war.

While speaking with restrained admiration of the German philosophers I should be sorry to be understood as having anything but respect for Dr. Butler. The German philosophers, popularly so called, are an eruption, a kind of röteln, on the German kultur; more an effect than a cause; but after the system pushed out this exanthem it has been an undoubted source of intellectual disease. Moreover, since the New Englanders about two generations ago began to inoculate American colleges with a second-hand Germanic measles the disease has been a nuisance here, and we are grateful to Dr. Butler for now suggesting a quarantine for the thing. There is a school of German real philosophers, but they do not get on the front page; they are prophets without honor; and the ordinary student of philosophy knows as much about them as he does of middle Irish poetry. What is wrong with Germany is not philosophy, but a lack of philosophy. Truth is one and so is philosophy, and no philosophy is German, or French, or American, more than morality is.

The president of Columbia University said America has no system, no plan, no definite purpose or unity in its school system, and it never will be efficient until it arrives at such order. The world is ruled by ideas, not by stocks and bonds. There is not a little truth in this statement; it is stale "noose" to some of us, as Dr. Schaeffer would say, but it is grateful to hear a man like the president of Columbia University insisting on the fact. The war is doing some good.

The constructive suggestion Dr. Butler makes is that we are to take the preamble to the Federal Constitution, the second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence (if that document may now get past the Censor), and Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, and on these texts work out our salvation unto a perfect democracy. The Preamble to the Constitution is:

> We the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do order and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

The Declaration of Independence said:

> We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal; that they are endowed by the Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter and abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

Whatever may be relevant in the Gettysburg Address, delivered November 19, 1863, are the words:

> Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. . . . From these honored dead we take increased devotion to the cause for which they here gave the last full measure of devotion—that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain—that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom—and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

If the statement that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, which is false, be changed to the truth that governments derive their just powers from God, the texts are very good. Even the glittering generality that all men are born equal may be let pass as harmless, as it is so useful to perorating politicians.

It is to be regretted Dr. Butler forgot the Sermon on the Mount when enumerating texts. The trouble with Germany, America, France, and England is that they think they can go along without God. Because He is rejected He has turned His face from us until the world is groveling in desolation. Wars and rumors of war, false Christs in the market places, and the crying of the prophets to us is as the barking of distant dogs, because we try to get along without Him. Even we of the Household of the Faith, while the whole world is tumbling about our ears and civilization is worn as thin and threadbare as our piety, still make the hoarding of counters or social climbing the end-all here. When our consciences turn in sleep and mutter uneasily we toss five dollars into the Knights of Columbus Fund and pose as caulkers to the Bark of Peter. The vials of the wrath of God Almighty are seething and brimming unto the overflow, but we have not yet got beyond the stage where one is content in comparing our Catholic military numerical ratio with that in the tanks of the Baptists.

Uninspired prophecy is as cheap as fortune-telling, but an uninspired prophet can see that this war is only beginning for the United States, that it must be ended by the United States, and the ending will be in sackcloth and ashes. The sooner we get measured for our sackcloth the better. Airplane, ships, guns, which are yet somewhat hypothetical; pottering women, muddling men, bragging politicians, homesick boys; Sam Browne belts and khaki trouserettes, will not alone win the war. If we do not beg our Father to forgive us our trespasses and deliver us from evil we shall soon get a jolt which will disturb all smiling. Six little girls before the Blessed Sacrament tomorrow morning can do more than all the fifty-seven varieties of drives we are having. The drives are necessary—the money, the ships, the men, the sacrifices, and the blood, must be; the flummery, nasty passions, and the like will be; but those that pray will win the war. The Ally to propitiate is the Lord God of Hosts.

Houses of Glass

Daniel A. Lord, S.J.

ONCE upon a time a wise maker of saws—not steel ones, but saws that when fresh are called epigrams—advised those who live in glass houses to pull down the blinds. Incidentally he implied that he did not think much of the common-sense of any man who deliberately chose to dwell in a crystal palace. Better a cottage if it presented stern, uncompromising walls to the inquisitive neighbors than a castle that was open to the public. Probably he was voicing the opinion of an age when men liked to sit around in their shirt-sleeves with their stockinged feet on the mantelpiece, and women affected kimonas and wore cold-cream to meals.

But glass houses are at present a popular style of domestic architecture. In fact, the man or woman living in a non-translucent, brick dwelling is tempted to ram out one of the walls, leaving the living room like a stage parlor with only three sides. The passion for privacy has given way to a craze for publicity; the gentle glow of the green-shaded table-lamp has faded before the searching glare of the spotlight. We have just a little too much open house without enough hospitality.

For example, a well-known young couple have discovered their complete incompatibility of temper. The husband likes his eggs boiled solid, while his charming young wife scorns them other than barely introduced to hot water; and the cook refuses to boil eggs to more than one state of coagulation. So the heroine of this domestic tragedy determines to go home to mamma, provided she can ever find mamma at home; and the hero turns a wan eye towards bachelor hall.

Now in the days when glass houses were reserved for flowers and winter grapes, the disillusioned wife would have put on a thick veil and crept into a cab with drawn curtains. Once at mamma's, she would have shut her chamber door and pined in solitude like a wounded doe. He, feeling that his life was ruined, would have shunned society, worn black, cultivated a martyr-like air, and answered his friends' sympathetic if questioning glance with a silent grip of the hand.

Not so today. Today the wounded wife "calls up the paper" and then sits with a photograph of herself within easy reach until the city editor rushes a special writer out to the apartment by taxi. Onto the willing pad of this sentiment-sluice, she pours the sad story of her wrongs. She tells of her late husband's villainous temper, relates how, on a certain day, he spoke brutally to Fluff, her lap-dog, and how on another he laughed with the utmost brutality at her new spring hat. She tells how he could smile at the maid and swear at her, his devoted wife, in one and the same facial movement, and adds a few details on his general lack of breeding and the number of nights on which he suffered from a multiplication of lamp-posts. After which she tearfully presses into the interviewer's hand a portrait of herself in an evening gown and sets aside the first week's alimony to buy extra copies of the paper.

As for the husband, he does not hesitate to throw up the blinds on the family living room, cost his wife what it may. He calls on the publishers with a manuscript entitled "My Mad Months of Matrimony," and offers them the serial rights or the privilege of publishing it in one volume, illustrated. He points out the clever way in which he describes his ex-wife putting on her complexion. He reads his epigrams on the subject of wifely temper and wifely extravagance and wifely fondness for cheap novels and the cherry in the bottom of the glass. He lets the public hear about all the family squabbles and grows eloquent on the subject of his wife's relatives. And all the while the neighbors stand with their faces pressed against the pane, glutting themselves with a domestic drama in real life rehearsed for their exclusive benefit. Few neighbors find any fault with the number of glass houses in their block.

An aspiring young daughter, whose father still sighs for corned beef and cabbage when the butler serves him terrapin, is breaking into society and using a siege gun to do it. Does she hide herself away in a cloistered garden surrounded by high walls and infested by great danes? Hardly. She haunts the society-page of the Sunday paper as often as she can slip past the society editor. She furnishes the dailies with portraits of herself on horseback, with her Russian wolf-hound, in a Red Cross uniform, on the beach, skating, knitting, pouring tea, at the charity bazaar, playing tennis, selling tags for stray kittens, and intently gazing upon a long-stemmed rose. Then she coyly expresses to her friends her astonishment at the way those papers get hold of pictures. If young ladies of the rotogravure type have any moments when they long for privacy, they bravely stifle their feelings for the sake of a curious public. Compared with them, a moving-picture actor is something of a hermit, while a pugilist in training is the violet by the mossy stone. They not only live in glass houses, but day and night they keep the electric lights blazing and a brass band playing before the main portico.

Nowadays just as soon as a man robs a bank or writes a successful novel, invents a new gun, or climbs Mount McKinley on roller skates, he is expected to fill out a questionnaire telling the color of his grandparents' eye, the flower he likes best, his hour for rising, and the price he pays for his neckties. A famous man may as well renounce all claim to privacy and move all his belongings into the most comfortable glass house he can rent. Unconventional pictures of him begin to break out on the picture-page of the newspapers, pictures that represent him with a four-days' beard raking the leaves from his front lawn. The shabbier the clothes and the more disreputable-looking the pipe he is smoking, the better satisfied the public seems to be. Evidently famous men are not supposed to be handsome.

As for the rest of us ordinary mortals who do not get divorces or make the winter drive on the society line or write or fight ourselves into fame, we are beginning to live in a kind of universal glass house. There was a time when men and women, for example, wore certain garments which they hastily covered with others and purchased only in a furtive sort of way. Now the nation clothes itself, not in the privacy of a dressing-room, but in the advertising section of the magazines. Underclothing, thanks to the advertiser, has become as much a matter of general notoriety as overcoats. And everyone knows that, if it is summer time, you wear just such and such an advertised brand; if winter time, just such another which now occupies the back cover of every magazine.

Those advertising pages have become the glass house of the ordinary man. They tell the curious public just what we eat, what we drink, and frankly just what we wear. If we purchase a new suit from an advertised firm, every man we meet on the avenue knows precisely what it cost us. The only ones who can afford privacy in the matter of clothes and food are the very wealthy, and most of them would die if they had privacy, while the rest of us feel that we have the privacy of a kitten in a nursery of five lively youngsters.

Glass houses unquestionably add to the picturesqueness of the landscape, and there is no denying their effect in satisfying a general curiosity. But in sacrificing privacy we are sacrificing a number of things eminently worth while, depth of thought, restfulness of spirit, the ability to pray. For all these quickly shrivel and die in the pitiless rays that beat on the panes of a house of glass.

Dramas That Bloom in the Spring

JOHN B. KENNEDY

SPEAKING with levity, it may be said that the supreme trial reserved for Job was an introduction to Broadway, or thereabouts, at a time when his theatrical neighbors were such frivolous creations as "Flo-Flo" and "Jack o' Lantern." As a trial the introduction was an unmixed artistic success despite the megaphonic rendition of that awesome vehicle, the Voice Out of the Wind. The picture of the setting, with Job and his comforters in the center of a majestically simple scene in the Land of Uz, restrainedly passionate in color effect, has been widely published. Even in half-tone it radiates the expression of solemnity and utter pathos so essential to a dignified representation of the sublime subject. Female narrators, in niches at the side of the stage, maintained continuity between the passages of dialogue, rendered by actors who evidently had taken pains to inspire themselves at the source, the Sacred Scriptures. To anyone bored or disheartened by the prevalence on the metropolitan stage of the indecent and the inane, this production of Job was most encouraging. It demonstrated that a conscientious artist, not primarily concerned with profit, can do justice, even in New York, to a thrilling Biblical character. Compared with a circus-like distortion such as "The Wanderer," which presumed to make the prodigal son of ancient days as spectacular as modern fictionists would have him, the "Book of Job" is verily like the figure of the afflicted patriarch beside a gaudy poetaster. Stuart Walker, the man responsible for this singular theatrical episode, has arranged to make the "Book of Job" an annual Lenten feature, thus incurring an incongruity in his enterprise. The "Book of Job" is grandly impressive at any time, especially when a taxed and supertaxed public confronted with subtly ironical bulletins in every public conveyance in Manhattan, is commencing to believe in its own patience; but for Lent something even more sublime than the "Book of Job" should readily suggest itself to an artist whose appreciation of the sonorous values of Scriptural drama has been well proved.

Greek tragedy has also had its place, and a very high one, this year, giving Miss Margaret Anglin an opportunity to demonstrate that she is the leading American actress; which praise, I think, originated with the most reliable critic of the New York daily press, a critic whose verdicts on current attractions are rarely blazoned in advertisement space, no doubt because they are rarely, if ever, influenced by advertisement space. And Shakespeare, not to be outdone, has been creditably presented in a series of matinees.

The serious-mindedness, let us not pause to question it, of a certain section of the theater-going public, has received added encouragement by a return of Ibsen's "Wild Duck" and "Hedda Gabler," and Mr. Shaw's self-styled, and quite truthfully, "unpleasant play," "Mrs. Warren's Profession." Of Ibsen it seems almost superfluous to say that if he has written any vitally important gospel in his drama some bright pagan has yet to discover the key to the code, for no Christian or Jew or even Mussulman will have the patience to search for it. As for "Mrs. Warren's profession," it is personal but pertinent to remark that from the comfortable fortune he has acquired from his later exhibitions of slap-stick dialectics Mr. Shaw should, in decency, pension the poor woman.

Considering plays more popular, there is a genuine pleasure in reporting that the juvenile drama is flourishing. Booth Tarkington, whose strange fate it is to be successful always, has, in "Seventeen," provided a story which an able dramatizer converts into living delight. William Sylvanus Baxter, who strives to anticipate his manhood despite the mockery of an impish sister, is an alias for most healthy American citizens in their yodeling youth. His is the type of character which Father Joseph Conroy, S.J., in those instructive Saturday-noon conferences at dear old St. Louis University, dissected, to the vast amusement of scores of lads who were all Baxters, with variations.

"Seventeen" not only contains a humorous lesson for adolescents and a serial laugh for adults, but stands as a definite stage in the advance of juvenile drama. There is hardly a living theater-goer who has not had the dismal experience of witnessing juvenile plays where the girl and boy characters, particularly the boy, were either monsters of innocent merriment or perfect specimens of copy-book morality unconsciously playing truant from their glass-cases. Those awful young persons in the old-time melodrama who detected the villain instantly by the contour of his corsets through the Prince Albert coat exercised, for more than one generation, a tyranny over the tears of sympathetic industrial young ladies. The enfants terribles, velvet-collared and studying statistics of Arabian fisheries in the first act of the stale farce-comedy and being bailed out from the county lock-up, with father at the finale, no longer propagate cynicism among scene-shifters. A brighter day has dawned. Now the juvenile is really juvenile, neither an angel minus wings nor a demon minus the tail. "Seventeen" is not the only play that can substantiate the claim. There is the "Little Teacher" wherein a florist's half-dozen of stage children perform with a precocity not in the least brazen. The lately deceased author of that entertaining satire "A Tailor-Made Man" wrote the "Little Teacher." The play is a little sticky with theatrical virtue in spots, but its portraiture of rural narrowness broadened by the shining charity of a city person is true and effective. Miss Mary Ryan plays the little teacher with a symmetry of emotionalism that makes the few dry moments palatable and smoothes over the heavily buttered minutes.

Plays of a patriotic theme are sprinkled over the official list of attractions. There is "An American Ace," subtitled "a big, patriotic melodrama at patriotic prices"; the audience receives patriotic programs and the actors put on patriotic grease paint. "An American Ace" can be summarized as somewhat ennobled blood and thunder. The "Man Who Stayed at Home" comes from England and teaches, with interesting British unctuousness, the lesson that slackers don't always slack. "Her Country" is modestly styled "the patriotic play" with no particular accent on the article, which really is not entitled to one; "Seven Days' Leave" is the kind of stuff the staid and sturdy cockney roars at from the depths of the pit. It gives strength to the argument that if melodrama is the most appropriate medium for the display of patriotism, the quality of patriotism bears improvement. "The Copperhead" is an excellently-acted play.

And here something must be said against the practice of introducing khaki into every musical comedy, revue or other show that has not sufficient intrinsic merit to manage without it. Our objection to this indiscriminate use of the fighting cloth is really patriotic. The abuse of the flag behind the footlights is scandalous, but the flag is the property of all, and if certain patriots are thrown into fervor by seeing it hung about the bower of a bevy of beauty—the words are borrowed from an unknown but unbiquitous poet—we feel pity more than wrath. But khaki was designed and is primarily used as a color in which the nation's defenders give and receive wounds and death. True, many hundreds of bright young men are licensed to wear khaki without much risk to health or comfort. When that inconsistency becomes emphasized a government at present immersed in far graver problems will, no doubt, rectify matters. Even now, some popular protest should be made and vigorously made to insure heeding, against the cheapening by gallant supernumeraries and shapely young women, on and off the stage, of the color sanctified by blood shed in the nation's cause. There are plays, "General Post" being one of them, where the use of khaki is essential to the presentation of legitimate plot. But when hundreds of thousands of young men wear the color as a badge of their readiness to give "the last full measure of devotion" it is provoking to find khaki exploited by hordes of powdered charmers of both sexes to whom patriotism is known chiefly as a commodity not generally stocked by foreign-born delicatessen merchants.

Charles Rann Kennedy's "An Army with Banners" is typical of this polished playwright's attempts to make art objectively purposeful when it is not subjectively perfect; the result being that his morals are a little top-heavy for his tales. Through the "Servant in the House," the "Terrible Meek" and "Winter Feast" and his latest allegory, Mr. Kennedy shows a praiseworthy endeavor to captivate the public with spiritual drama—not the problem play, where a robust interrogation-mark is attacked and more or less satisfactorily disposed of. But I think, and the opinion is necessarily personal, that Mr. Kennedy's chief disadvantage is one he shares in common with several other talented and well-intentioned literary men, a failure adequately to realize that intellectual and social culture, no matter through what processes of sublimation they may be coaxed or forced by skilful plotting, are not essential to spiritual rebirth or invigoration; that, where a too sophisticated artist is their guide, they may be led often through genteel affliction to complacence rather than through pain and tears to salvation. The old morality play, with the virtuous hero playing solo leap-frog over "Old Nick's" back contains many hidden hints for authors who would write new moralities.

As patriotic plays are numerous, ditto films are plentiful to boredom. D. W. Griffith's "Hearts of the World" is characteristically colossal; press agent, please notice. Then there is Ambassador Gerard's "My Four Years in Germany," which has not cast much lustre either on its author or his subject. "My Own United States" is a good-class film; "Over the Top" features the loquacious Sergeant Empey, and numerous martial pictures, warranted to evoke unbridled applause, form the body of the procession. Perhaps the most amusing is the masterpiece entitled "The Kaiser—the Beast of Berlin," which loudly and lithographically contradicts many genuine authorities, Mr. Gerard for one, on the domestic attributes of the senior Hohenzollern. Liberty bonds are far more effective war-aid than such reckless waste of celluloid. If the American masses need such lurid stuff to stir them, then, as Wilhelm himself might remark: "It is to strafe!"

Capital and Labor

To the Editor of AMERICA:

AMERICA for March 2 voices the Editor's disappointment over the fact that his campaign to employers in general and Catholic employers in particular to induce them to turn over a new leaf in so far as the conduct of their affairs concerns their employees has proven an utter failure—a fate, in the opinion of the writer, it richly deserved. The Editor was not qualified by experience to discuss for practical men a subject upon which he sought to enlighten them. "It is therefore disheartening," he says, "to know that many Catholics, presumably men of education and certainly leaders in their communities, are utterly unaware of the danger to society in any social program which fails to guarantee justice to the worker, and, primarily, his right founded on the natural law of entering into a free contract in disposing of his labor." The Editor's implication here is utterly ridiculous because every individual is as free as the air he breathes without let or hindrance, to accept or turn down a job, a fact that is self-evident now when there are three jobs waiting for every two applicants and consequently wage-earners are experiencing no difficulties on that score. But what the Editor evidently has in mind is that wage-earners should be guaranteed the privilege of collective bargaining. I would suggest that he read up the history of the Buck's Stove and Range Company polishers' boycott which began in 1906 and ran through the courts of the District of Columbia until December 23, 1908, when Justice Wright handed a jail sentence to the chiefs of the Labor Trust, the conspirators behind the crime.

Briefly, the Buck's Stove and Range industry was established in St. Louis in 1846; year in and year out thereafter it made annual contracts with the 745 members of the several unions in its employ, all of which contracts were in full force and effect when the metal polishers inaugurated their boycott in 1906. In all these contracts there was a provision that should a dispute arise it was to be referred to a committee designated for its adjustment and in the meantime there should be no cessation of work. But the metal polishers ignored these provisions, executed their walk-out and surrounded the plant with pickets. Finding that mere picketing of the plant was ineffective, they brought the "secondary boycott" into play and made it nation-wide in scope. In San Francisco they were most vicious in their activities. There, agents of the St. Louis concern always had purchased stoves annually to cover their year's requirements; as this had gone on for a quarter of a century the annual sale of repair parts had grown to considerable proportions and was an asset of great value to those who had built up the business. The lax police regulations in San Francisco at that time permitted pickets to stand in front of the shops where the Buck's stoves were offered for sale and warn prospective customers against entering. This secondary boycott plan of attack on innocent stove-dealers two thousand miles away from the seat of the dispute had the hearty approval of Dr. John A. Ryan, the author of "A Living Wage," that continuous sermon to employers, without an intimation between covers to employees that the return for a fair day's pay was an honest day's work! The secondary boycott is no more nor less than the confiscation or destruction of property of third parties; Dr. Ryan's sanction of it was a fit companion piece to Dr. O'Hara's Lord Scully comparison: "The prevailing type of industrial organization is the corporation, in which the stockholders and Board of Directors know nothing and care nothing about the conditions of labor in the establishments from which their income is derived, for distance, it is said, disinfects dividends. Moreover, the executive officials cannot let their personal humane feelings affect the question, for everything is controlled by the inexorable demand for interest and dividends."

A lifetime before the inception of Workingmen's Compensation acts in the various States, innumerable employers on their own initiative had inaugurated aid societies through which employers paid so liberally for the care of those personally injured and the support of their families while they were laid up, that when their plans were abandoned in favor of the several compensation laws, these employers found that they were paying out no more than under the self-imposed systems.

From a layman's point of view, AMERICA in discussing a subject of nation-wide complication should be sure of its ground before giving expression to an exhortation. At least, it is plain that when Edwin V. O'Hara in his paper of December 29, compared employers in general to the brand of Irish landlord who lives abroad and leaves to agents the disagreeable job of exacting rack rents from his unfortunate tenants, he is treating a serious subject in a way neither scientific nor logical. While it may be true that there are cases of absentee captains of industry, in this half-million community, the owners as a rule are the first on the job in the morning and the last out at night.

Milwaukee. T. J. NEACY.

[The defense of Doctors Ryan and O'Hara, if any is needed, may be safely left to Doctors O'Hara and Ryan. Mr. Neacy's letter is printed, not as throwing any light upon a difficult problem, or as giving the remedy, which, as Leo XIII writes, "must be found and found quickly, for the misery and wretchedness pressing so heavily and unjustly at this moment on the vast majority of the working classes," for it does neither of these things. But it is not without point. It admirably illustrates a contention often urged in these pages: that many Catholics are unacquainted with the principles upon which the solution of the labor problem must be based. For instance, Mr. Neacy writes, "What the Editor evidently had in mind is that the wage-earner should be granted the privilege of collective bargaining." The Editor had nothing of the sort in mind, nor would the well-informed Catholic student of social affairs allow himself to speak of the "privilege" of collective bargaining. The very phraseology illustrates one of many misunderstandings at the root of the labor problem. Collective bargaining is not a "privilege," but a right, and a right that cannot be destroyed by a thousand Buck Stove cases, even were each the fearful outrage which Mr. Neacy conceives it to be.

But the divergence between Mr. Neacy and the principles of Catholic social philosophy becomes more apparent in Mr. Neacy's statement of "a free contract." "Every individual," he writes, "is as free as the air he breathes, without let or hindrance, to accept or turn down a job." It is difficult to believe that Mr. Neacy is serious in thus describing a "free contract." AMERICA prefers to take its doctrine in this matter from the fairly modern, but unfortunately neglected, Encyclical of Leo XIII "On the Condition of the Working Classes." The great Pontiff cannot regard the question with that optimism which sits so gracefully upon Mr. Neacy. On the contrary, "the momentous gravity of the state of things now obtaining fills every mind with painful apprehension," and the reason of this apprehension is that "a small number of very rich men have been able to lay upon the teeming masses of the laboring poor a yoke little better than that of slavery itself." "Hence, by degrees it has come to pass," mourns the Pontiff, "that workingmen have been surrendered, all isolated and helpless, to the hard-heartedness of employers and the greed of unchecked competition." The very point which Mr. Neacy dismisses so airily, "every man is as free as the air he breathes, without let or hindrance, to accept or turn down a job," the Pope stresses as "a subject of great and urgent importance." After showing that there are certain low wages which the workingman cannot accept without "crime," since "the preservation of life is the bounden duty of one and all, and to be wanting therein is a crime," he continues:

> Let it be then taken for granted that workman and employer should, as a rule, make free agreements, and in particular should agree freely as to the wages: nevertheless, there underlies a dictate of natural justice more imperious and more ancient than any bargain between man and man, namely, that remuneration ought to be sufficient to support a frugal and well-behaved wage-earner. If through necessity or fear of a worse evil, the workman accept harder conditions because an employer or contractor will afford him no better, he is made the victim of force and injustice.

Bill James is "as free as the air he breathes," writes Mr. Neacy, "to accept or turn down a job," that pays him twelve dollars a week. It will not support him and his wife, but he accepts it through "fear of a worse evil," i. e., he can get no other, and without the weekly twelve dollars both he and his wife will die of starvation. Mr. Neacy says that Bill has no grievance, because he is perfectly free "to accept or turn down the job." Leo XIII holds that Bill is "the victim of force and injustice." AMERICA, as always, sides with the Pope, whose words for the past two decades have had a poignant significance.—ED. AMERICA.]

Human Respect

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of April 6 Father T. M. M. says that he experimented with three pedestrians to determine their attitude towards a priest and found that two non-Catholics greeted him pleasantly, while a Knight of Columbus gave him no sign of recognition. If the inference is that Knights of Columbus do not properly respect the priesthood, I would like to enter the protest that no member of my council would act in the manner of the K. C. described by Father T. M. M. Apropos of the subject of human respect, I recently heard a lecture in a Catholic church by a Catholic priest on a patriotic topic, and heard the Liberty Bond issue and Red Cross lauded to the sky, while the K. C. was only mentioned in the same sentence with the "Y" and Jewish welfare work. The fact that several prominent non-Catholics were in the audience, of course, had nothing to do with the matter.

A Catholic Chapel for Annapolis

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Would it not be well for the Knights of Columbus, who are now doing such yeomen service for our country, to take up the matter of a chapel for the Catholics at the Naval Academy in Annapolis? Your Maryland correspondent has put the situation fairly before us. May the mother of one of the "middies," who appreciates very much the praise bestowed upon them, add a few words to the suggestions he has made?

It was a bit of a wrench to take a lad from a Jesuit college and turn him over, body and soul, to the Government. Not knowing anything of the education given at Annapolis, I was at first a little uneasy about the religious side of the matter. After meeting Admiral Benson, the head of our navy, a devout Catholic, some say a daily communicant, who impresses one instantly as a man who can at all times be counted on to do his duty, I was somewhat reassured. Cardinal Gibbons, the beloved senior prelate of this country, reassured me still more by saying that the education given at Annapolis was unmatched anywhere and that the religious part also was taken care of.

But we mothers are troublesome people, you know. Where our boys are concerned we have to be quite certain. We are second to none in love of our country. We are proud to have our sons, all our sons, in her service; but, our duty does not cease there. We have still to see that they come out of Annapolis, where they receive a splendid technical education and a discipline that spells character and manhood, with a religious faith as undimmed as the faith they had when they entered.

A visit to Annapolis showed an ideally situated spot, everything on the most magnificent scale, a beautiful, stately chapel, where the Protestant Episcopal service is held, the Y. M. C. A. also there, and doing much for the comfort and pleasure of the boys. The Catholics are indeed more favored than some of the denominations. Those who wish to receive Holy Communion are called at 5.20 a. m. About a score go, and the rest, 150, more or less, march in company-formation to the late Mass. They are a splendid looking lot of young men and they certainly do cover the ground as anyone knows who has tried to keep up with them. But what of the boy who enters Annapolis with wavering faith or without a background of solid Catholic training? How would he fare? That is the question. All have not had the advantage of having been previously trained by Jesuits.

We must wake up, we Catholics. We have kept to ourselves entirely too long. There is no prejudice against Catholics at Annapolis. We all know that the better Catholic a man is, the better citizen he will be. Cannot the Knights of Columbus take this matter up? Perhaps they could devote some of the great war-fund they have already raised to building a chapel there.

The boys will be starting off in a few weeks on their yearly cruise of whose itinerary we know nothing. They are not allowed to tell. They may be in as great peril as any of the soldiers going across. It would certainly be a comfort to Catholic parents to know that they had a Catholic chaplain to bid them God-speed before they start.

Prohibition, the Constitution, the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have read several articles and letters in AMERICA as to prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass. I heartily approve of Father Kenny's article, under the above title, in your issue of March 13. I presume to submit, as my personal views, the following, feeling satisfied that it is on some such broad lines as I suggest that the fight in the courts on these drastic, unjust laws should be made and will be won, to the end that "prohibition" shall not, directly or indirectly, prohibit or prevent the Mass.

Citizens of the United States have dual citizenship; they are citizens of the United States, first and foremost, and then citizens of the State in which they reside and have their homes. These respective citizenships result in rights as well as in duties. As between these citizenships, allegiance to the Union is supreme. A citizen's duty is first to the Union, then to the State; and, if these respective duties conflict, he must sacrifice his duty to the State to do his duty to the Union. For it is unlawful, for instance, for a State to secede from the Union. This principle was sealed and forever fixed by the blood of those who died to establish it in our late Civil War.

In governmental constitutions, as in laws, there is the spirit as well as the letter, and in interpreting constitutions and laws it is well-settled by the decisions of the courts that the spirit, not the letter, prevails. Our Government has declared that we are in the present awful war to fight for liberty; "to make the world safe for democracy." Our people, our citizens of the United States, are responding nobly and generously to this cause, in men and in money, and many have already forfeited their lives for this cause on the battlefields of Europe. In this cause it is the supreme power of the United States which drafts our citizens to be soldiers and which controls the citizens, as well as the several States, in the matter of war. But the liberty we are fighting for is true liberty, not a sham; it is liberty which not even the tyranny of a brutal majority shall be permitted, under our Constitution, to take away from us; it is liberty and freedom under just and constitutional laws. Such liberty necessarily includes protection in our enjoyment of life, property, and also in that which is dearer than all else and which most of us will fight most quickly for—liberty, freedom, to worship God according to our religious belief.

The central act of Catholic worship is the Mass, in which Supreme Sacrifice, when the words of consecration are pronounced by a duly ordained priest, wine, not grape juice or cider, is changed into the very blood which Jesus Christ shed for us that we might be free in the largest sense of that term, and that we might be saved forever. Our civil allegiance is first to the United States; but, if that Government will not, or cannot, protect us against the brutal tyranny of the State which presumes to pass a law the effect of which, if obeyed and enforced, is to do away, within its boundaries, with the central, cardinal act of worship in our Church, then our allegiance is to God alone. We gladly render to Caesar that which is Caesar's; but we shall first, last and forever render to God that which is due to Him.

I know the history of this, my native country; I have studied its Constitution and the history thereof and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States interpreting our Constitution. I believe there is enough in the spirit of that great Constitution, when interpreted in the light of its history and of the history of the United States, to impel the ultimate legal tribunal of the United States, which tribunal, in the event, must protect the rights of the citizens of the United States against tyranny or abuse, to declare: That no State law is valid which presumes to prevent wine from being made, used or sold for sacramental purposes.

I believe the same supreme Government of the United States which will not allow a State to secede from the Union; which may draft my sons and take them from their State, overseas, to fight in foreign lands; which justly exacts duties from its citizens in return for the rights which it guarantees—will also recognize and enforce, through its Supreme Court, the rights of its Catholic citizens against the bigotry and tyranny of a State which, under the guise of a law, does abridge the liberty of every Catholic citizen of the United States who, unfortunately for him, also happens to be a citizen of, or a temporary resident in, such a benighted, ignorant and utterly unworthy fragment of the great United States. Liberty to fight and, if need be, to die for the Union necessarily connotes, under the spirit of our overshadowing United States Constitution, liberty to worship God as our religion teaches us to do.

Catholic Chapel at West Point

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In his letter of April 6, R. J. McWilliams mentions the Catholic chapel at West Point, as having been "built, if I am not mistaken, not by the Government, but by Catholics." The fact is that the chapel was built by the $30,000 appropriation, made for that purpose by Congress in February, 1897. I am not sure who introduced the bill, but I know its success was due to the efforts of the Hon. B. B. Odell, Jr., in whose district West Point was, and those of the Hon. James S. Sherman, and their friends.

For many years the Rt. Rev. C. G. O'Keefe, of Highland Falls, had tried to secure a chapel at the Military Academy. In the Fifty-fifth Congress, elected in 1896, there were only two Catholics, the Hon. John Fitzgerald, of Boston, and the Hon. Denis M. Hurley, of Brooklyn. The latter succeeded in interesting Mr. Odell, Jr., and Mr. Sherman in the project, and it was by the influence of these gentlemen that the bill was passed. The Catholics of the country are indebted to these broad-minded Protestant gentlemen.

The "Saturday Evening Post"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of March 23, I note a letter from Mr. Frank Scheper in defense of Miss Frazer in her misrepresentations of the Holy Father in connection with the Italian situation. This article indirectly contains a defense of Mr. Lorimer, also, for having published such an article. If Mr. Scheper is right—and let us hope he is—then we may expect Mr. Lorimer to see that Miss Frazer's calumny of the Holy Father is retracted in the columns of the Post. If, on the other hand, Mr. Scheper is not right, then we cannot but feel that he has made a defense wholly unmerited by either Miss Frazer or Mr. Lorimer. I, for one, do not think any retractions will be made in the Post nor elsewhere. We can only wait and see.

Irish in the Revolution

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In reply to a query by a Mr. Campbell, which appeared in a recent issue of your magazine, permit me to state that the War Department publication relating to officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary War, in its last issue, gives the names of the officers and brigades from France, including Lynch's and Moylan's. Another Government publication, "Records of the Continental Congress," mentions the names of some Irish leaders who gave their services free, it being necessary to pass a special Act of Congress to accept their services free.

It pleases me to be able to give this information, since there seems to be a great lack of knowledge regarding the Irish in the Revolution of the Colonies. Quite recently, while reading a beautiful copy of the Notre Dame Scholastic, [illegible] I noticed that a certain governor paid a glowing tribute to the Irish soldier in all the wars from the "Mexican War up till the Spanish-American War," thus making it appear to the ignorant and sometimes bigoted portion of our population that the Irish had no hand or part in the formation of the Union. The Doire Publishing Company, a few years ago, published a book entitled "Early Irish Settlers in North America." This book should be in the hands of everybody of Irish blood who wants to know the great part the Irish and Scotch-Irish have played in the formation of our country. This is shown by the records of the Pennsylvania troops in the Revolutionary War, not to speak of the reports of the British Government on the subject, which are in effect, that three-fourths of those taking an active part in the revolution and out of it were Irish or of Irish descent.

By a strange coincidence, last Sunday, while at Mass, I noticed a man next to me using his beads, and several others apparently did not follow the Mass as they should. The thought occurred to me that it might be a good thing if moving pictures, explanatory of the Mass were made by one central authority and sent broadcast all over the world, in the various languages. It would be an object-lesson how the Church uses every science known to teach our holy religion, so that even the densest-minded may see. But the point I want to make is this: three days later I read a letter in AMERICA from a gentleman offering the same suggestion that I now offer! In things of this kind, I often ask myself, have we really begun to scratch on the surface of knowledge yet?

A Good Boy and a Hero

"HE was a good boy." Falling from a mother's lips, these homely words are as touching as the most eloquent panegyric. They tell their own story of a boy's reverence for the sanctities of home, of the tender love for the mother now mourning the boy's loss, of obedience to the stalwart father who guided his steps, a story of faith, purity and devotion to duty that adds a crowning glory to the virtues of a truly Christian and American household. When to these words the gray-haired mother can add with pride even in the midst of her tears: "He gave his life for others," she may rest assured that no finer eulogy could be spoken over her dead boy, for the lips of Truth itself have said that greater love than this no man hath, that a man lay down his life for his friends.

Albert J. Kern, of Company D, Sixth U. S. Engineers, was killed in action "somewhere in France" on that western front where he and his American companions in arms were gallantly holding the line. A mother's unerring love has spoken his eulogy. A good boy and a hero! Wonderful eloquence of a mother's heart. It has compressed into half a dozen words a life of purity and devotion crowned with the halo of sacrifice.

We know where the dead American soldier was trained and prepared for the supreme test. We know why his mother could speak so lovingly and so proudly of his memory. A Catholic, reared in the atmosphere of a Catholic home, in Catholic schools, strengthened by the life-giving and purifying Sacraments of the Catholic Church, of which he was a faithful son, he learnt the duties of the child and the citizen. When the supreme test came he was ready to meet it.

In Catholic homes, in Catholic schools, under Catholic guidance, with the help of the Sacraments of the Catholic Church, tens of thousands of boys and youths are growing up today ready to follow in the footsteps of the young soldier who died that others might be free. The influences under which he grew up and that made him "a good boy," strong and pure, the teachers who instructed him in the duty of laying down his life for his country's cause, if ever she called upon him for the sacrifice, are casting thousands of others in the same mold. Hundreds have already proved that they have not received that training in vain. Catholic schools, Catholic colleges and Catholic universities have proudly sent their sons to the colors, and have watched them fall and bleed for justice and freedom. If of them also we can speak the words spoken over the young American engineer, it is because they were true to the ideals of Catholic family life and Catholic citizenship. The former require purity, the latter devotion and loyalty. In the stress of war, in the days of tragedy through which we are now passing, that loyalty must be able to reach the heights of sacrifice. Life even must be thrown away that others may live.

Catholic education in the home, the school, the parish church is the mother of the sturdy virtues we need today in the great struggle upon which the United States have so unselfishly entered. That education teaches purity, discipline, the spirit of sacrifice and self-control. These are the virtues needed in the camp, in the trenches, on the battlefield. We have been attacked again and again because in our schools it was said we did not make good citizens, loyal and devoted Americans. We were untrue to American ideals, it was repeated; we were strangers to the thoughts and the inspirations of our countrymen. Our Catholic soldiers have given their answer. They have met the supreme test. Every Catholic soldier that holds a rifle in his hands on the frontier of freedom, every Catholic boy who crimsons with his blood the fields of France, is a refutation of the charge. Our ideals have stood the test. Our system of Catholic education has not failed. When pure and strong men were needed for the country's honor and the country's need, Catholic schools marshaled them in an unbroken phalanx under her flag. At all costs those Catholic boys and young men will do their country's just bidding. If necessary, like gallant Albert Kern of the Sixth U. S. Engineers, they will gladly die for her.

A Living Wage

THE Consumers' League of the City of New York has appealed to the people of the State to support the Wagner minimum wage bill lately introduced into the Senate, and it is to be hoped that the petition will evoke a ready and hearty response. New York has been strangely dilatory in caring for the working classes, and, as a consequence, its numerous fat men have grown fatter on the labor even of women and girls.

Minimum wage commissions have existed in Australia for eighteen years, in England for four years, and since 1912 and 1913 in California, Colorado, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Nebraska, Oregon, Utah, Washington and Wisconsin. But where is boastful New York? Not in the list of progressive States as yet, but only now approaching the light, despite the fact that, a year ago, the Supreme Court of the United States declared the Oregon minimum wage law constitutional. Nor can it be said that there has been no need of such a measure in this State. The lowest weekly wage upon which a woman can live decently and healthfully in New York City is $11.70, yet four-fifths of the laundry workers receive less than $11 a week; in restaurants one-half of the women employees get less than $10; in paper-box factories women, working at the highest possible speed, are able to earn only $7 a week, while $8 is considered a splendid stipend for girls in department stores.

What a year's life at $7 a week is worth can be judged from this yearly bill of expense of a girl who earned that sum:

> Board and room at $4.20 a week, $218.40; lunches at $1.00 a week, $52.00; car fares at 60 cents a week, $31.20; 1 suit, $16.80; 2 dresses, $13.30; 2 hats at 68 cents and $1.40, $2.08; woolen underwear at 82 cents, $1.65; 2 pair gloves at 35 cents, 70 cents; 24 pair stockings at 17½ cents, $4.20; 2 pair corsets, $3.50; 3 pair shoes at $2.80, $8.40; 2 petticoats at 63 cents, $1.26; 2 flannel petticoats at 37½ cents, 75 cents; 6 corset covers at 14 cents, 84 cents; 5 white shirt waists, 4 at 97 cents, 1 at $1.07, $4.94; 1 black shirt waist, $2.25; sickness, insurance, pleasures, all incidental, $1.73. Total, $364.00.

This is a shameful state of affairs, thoroughly discreditable to the largest and most populous State in the Union, and to the metropolis as well. It is time to redeem the past, and there is a chance to do so now. As Catholics should be the leaders in every movement for justice, they must make themselves heard in favor of this minimum wage legislation which is aimed at a great abuse which has deprived thousands of young people of their right to health, happiness and decency.

Unfortunate Lawlessness

SEVERAL times recently our daily papers printed reports of lynching and other outrages committed against men accused of disloyalty to the Government. Quite naturally every true citizen burns with indignation on hearing of disrespect either to the flag or to the gallant men under arms. Treason and near-treason should be severely punished, the former by death, if the Government sees fit to enforce such a penalty. But there is a right way and a wrong way of bringing this to pass, and the wrong way is by lawlessness. That mobs of irresponsible people, sometimes of jail-birds who have themselves habitually dishonored their country, should be allowed to seize men for real or fancied disloyalty and put them to death in a brutal manner, or tar and feather them, is shocking to the better instincts of the vast majority of the American people. Moreover, such acts are a reflection on the competency or good faith of our public officials and courts. On the face of it they make it appear that people place so little confidence in constituted authority that they are determined to take the law into their own hands and inflict whatever punishment they deem fit. This, of course, is the passion of the mob, and mobs are always dangerous, but especially so in time of war. It were high time, then, that the Government took cognizance of this state of affairs and put a stop to brutality, as unwarranted as it is ferocious.

Our officials owe such a course of action to themselves and to all other loyal Americans who abhor outrages, whether committed in Belgium or in Indiana or Texas or in any other place.

Poisonous "History"

"IT is not too much to say that the whole of historical work proper has been anti-Catholic for now 200 years or more," asserts Mr. Hilaire Belloc in an admirable article he contributes to the current Catholic Review. Gibbons, Mommsen and Michelet, with their numerous followers and imitators, he writes, have poisoned the cultivated minds of Europe and America by securing the almost universal acceptance of certain false postulates "which are the very negation of Catholic, and, therefore, true European history." One of these postulates is that there existed in the early centuries a thing called "Christianity" rather than Catholicism, "a thing which is but a modern term for something common to the various Protestant sects." Another of their false postulates is "that every distinctly Catholic thing in religious development is a corruption or innovation, from the Primacy of Peter to the Real Presence of Our Blessed Lord in the Eucharist." Because "all the great historians" always assume these postulates to be true, the makers of history text-books then so popularize and spread the falsehoods in question that innumerable school children and college students in every civilized land accept them almost as self-evident truths.

Another maneuver that Mr. Belloc finds the anti-Catholic historian using very effectively is "to act by negation." He writes:

> The method of the Church's enemies at this moment (it has endured now for over a century—I do not know how much longer it will endure, but it seems to me to be now weakening) is not to proclaim the strength and evil of the Catholic Church and their determination to destroy it, but to pretend that it is negligible. The modern enemies of the Catholic Church pose as not really combating it, but as having other more important aims of their own which can afford to neglect the folly of the Faith. They boast a tolerant spirit which contemptuously allows the survival of what is now an innocuous superstition, and, where the Church must be mentioned, they always speak of it as something extraneous to the society in which it is discovered. . . . Of Europe as a whole it [poisonous Protestant history] gives not only a false picture, but a picture incomplete in the most essential and largest outlines. Of England it hardly tells you anything coherent and comprehensive until England has its present religion fully settled about 300 years ago. Before that moment one can make nothing of it: the key is missing. . . . I should say that the ground work of the whole [method Protestant historians pursue] was ignorance, but that mixed up with this ignorance was a perpetual tendency to react against the savor of the Catholic Church wherever it might be discovered. And I should add to this statement that upon many points there is no doubt at all that the mass of modern Protestant historians have deliberately preferred falsehood, when the truth would have involved a recognition of Catholic strength and meaning.

But what bearings on the practical life of American Catholics, it may be asked, have Mr. Belloc's conclusions? Unquestionably a most important bearing. For the poisoned historical atmosphere created by the writers above described is the very one breathed by every Catholic boy or girl who sits at the feet of non-Catholic professors or instructors of history. All the history-teaching of these men or women is generally based on the false postulates and the dishonest methods of the anti-Catholic historians whose text-books they use. It is perfectly plain what happens then to the benighted young Romanists who listen attentively every day to what their amiable and cultivated teachers tell them about the far-from-Divine character and origin of the Catholic Church. The poor little Papists consult forthwith their history text-books and find that just what teacher said about the Church is actually down in print, so, of course, it must be true. "Why should I believe any longer," they will argue "in the medieval superstitions of Catholicism? I will emancipate my mind from those outworn tenets I learned at home, and then I shall be like my fearless and scholarly teacher of history, who moves in such cultivated society." Thus is the Catholic faith of many a student of history, attending non-Catholic schools and colleges undermined and ruined. But is Almighty God likely to hold the Catholic parents of these young people free from all responsibility for the disaster?

Convent Girls and "Movies"

AN Ursuline Sister of many years' experience as a teacher describes in the current Catholic Mind the effect of the "movie habit" on the characters of the adolescent girls in her class and then contrasts her pupils of today with those she taught fourteen years ago. It is the modern maiden that suffers by the comparison, and her unrestrained addiction to moving pictures, in the opinion of her teacher, is the undoubted cause. The Sister writes:

> Two years ago I was given work in a class, composed of girls very similar in age, mental capacity, refinement and social position to the class of fourteen years ago. They were from good Catholic homes, and were sweet, amiable and well-behaved young girls, whose parents watched over them carefully and kept them from contact with anything which seemed to them to be a bad influence. The girls, however, were allowed a freedom in attending picture shows, which was doing them a harm not realized by their parents. That pernicious freedom! It was responsible for a difference between the two classes, that only an experienced teacher could appreciate.
> The girls of fourteen years ago entered the academic course, simple, sweet, innocent children; they advanced to their graduating year and left school, not ignorant of the world and its evils, but with minds untainted by knowledge received in wrong ways; the girls of the later class were not only too sophisticated for their years, but were rather pleased to be so. Now in their second year of high-school work they are restless and somewhat unsteady in character; they are easily bored, find mental concentration difficult, and tire easily, wherever sustained effort is necessary. . . .
> It was no small matter to bring these girls to the point where they would admit many of the pictures they had seen were evil, but that point was reached at last. The next thing was to get them to see that the pictures had done harm to their own souls; and this was most difficult, because the worst result of the frequenting of picture shows is that it wears away the delicate bloom of modesty so imperceptibly that young people do not even know they have lost anything; and, as has been said before, they take credit to themselves for not being what they call "silly" about trifles.

Quite hopeless of curing her pupils of the "movie habit," the Sister only labored to make them use common prudence in the choice of the pictures they went to see and to arm them with principles that would guide their selection of films. She is justly indignant, however, with those careless parents who by exercising little supervision over their daughters' amusements have made it necessary for the religious teacher to give so much time and attention to freeing her pupils' minds from the poison with which the indiscriminate addiction to moving pictures has filled them. It is greatly to be feared that many a Catholic mother nowadays, who always knows what her lap-dog is doing and just where her Angora cat is, has scant knowledge and less concern as to where and how her adolescent daughters are amusing themselves. These mothers doubtless believe that in sending their girls to the Sisters' day-school they have done everything that can reasonably be expected of them. But it is the parents of these girls, not the teachers, who are answerable before God for the way those committed to their keeping pass the time after school hours. If their daughters, notwithstanding the consequent loss of all mental vigor, simply must frequent the moving-picture theaters, parents should at least take care that the "movies" are not allowed to imperil our convent girls' faith and purity.

The Drive on the Pope

DESPITE his difficult and almost impossible position, the Pope has done so magnificently well in this war that the Allies, especially England, and even Italy, have been constrained to make public acknowledgment of his beneficence. As usual, this has aroused the blind hatred of a blatant minority of non-Catholics who profess one or other of the lower forms of heresy popular amongst unlettered colored folk and low-grade slackers, like Georgia "crackers."

The frowzy little girl of 150 Fifth Avenue, the Methodist Christian Advocate, is chief among the howlers, ably seconded by the voluble Christian Science Monitor, though professedly it is difficult to understand how the latter can howl at all, for there is no matter, only mind, and mighty little of it in the office of the latter paper.

The naughty little girl used a letter written by the President to one Bishop Henderson as the occasion of an unjust attack on the Holy Father. Apart from the ethics of this, it was a most tactless procedure to link the name of the President of the United States with a senseless onset on the Pope, with whose principles Mr. Wilson agreed, and whose American sons have responded so nobly to the bugle call. If the little girl cannot appreciate truth and Mr. Wilson's delicate position, perhaps she could, by a mighty effort, bring herself to realize that harmony amongst our citizens is so essential in this crisis that nothing should be done to disturb good relations between American and American. If even this is too much to expect from the damosel, perhaps the Rockefeller Foundation will supply her with enough ginger cake and pink lemonade to keep her quiet till she reaches the age of reason.

As for the Monitor, it can be passed over with the remark that its editorials contain false and serious charges which are not retracted when indisputable evidence is presented in rebuttal. The reason for this may probably be found in the amazing revelations about the founder of the silly cult made by Ida Tarbell some years ago. Catholicism is honored in having such an enemy.

Ah, but there is one man whose respect American Catholicism values—the beloved Commander-in-Chief of our overseas forces, General Pershing. And to our dismay he was written down in Protestant papers "as issuing a warning to the American people and commenting upon the attitude of the Vatican towards the Central Powers." That was serious, or rather, it would have been serious were there no cable. But there is a cable, and General Pershing used it to send this message to the sturdy Morning Star of New Orleans:

AMERICAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES,
OFFICE OF THE COMMANDER-IN-CHIEF,
FRANCE, February 26, 1918.

Editor the Morning Star,
305 Camp Street, New Orleans, La.:

With reference to your article quoting from other papers a message purporting to be a warning from me to the American people in which I commented on the strength of Germany and the probable duration of the war and the attitude of the Vatican toward the Central Powers, I wish to state emphatically that the statements contained therein and attributed to me were never made by me.

Yours very sincerely,
JOHN J. PERSHING.

Thus one bubble after another has been pricked, but the scandal-mongers will continue their work, until at last, aided by the chief devil or his first assistant, they cause serious disunion amongst citizens just now intent on crushing a dangerous foe. Verb. sat. sap.

Literature

GEOFFREY CHAUCER

POET of the England that in his day was merry England, London-born poet, of the London "small, white and clean," man of letters, man of action, soldier, member of parliament, ambassador, and one who knew life on many sides and from various aspects, one of the greatest poets of England, such was Geoffrey Chaucer.

Frank and bright he is, mirthful, serious too, with the seriousness that can break into mirth, the mirth of the answer to the call of spring, the mirth of the answer to the call of human joy; the seriousness that knows well whence the great issues of life come forth and whither they must tend. Here too is the humor that in its lightness can shew forth what the most scathing satire might fail to make us see; here is the enjoyment of the good things given richly by God for us to enjoy; the understanding of human nature, however variously circumstanced; here is the delight in beauty, the beauty of nature, of love, of art, of sacrifice and endurance, the beauty that ennobles the most seemingly commonplace surroundings, making them translucent with itself. Here, too, is the gift of the instinct of proportion, which makes the poet say:

"Me list nat of the chaf nor of the stree
Maken so long a tale, as of the corn."

To all these things Geoffrey Chaucer added that within which these things that make a man do not necessarily go to the making of the poet, namely, the grace of expression, the glory of music.

It is quite true that we must take some trouble to get at the high beauty of his music. Away with modernization, even the modernization that other poets have wrought upon him. Not to Dryden, not to Pope, not to Wordsworth, nor Mrs. Barrett Browning, no, not to any one, would we go. Not in paraphrase, not in any but his own poet-garb, would we have him meet us. We must have himself, and that self we cannot have apart from his own words in his own rhythm. We will go straight to him, and spend time far from unprofitably in learning to read his verse, with its beautiful vocalic and consonantal system and its marvelous wealth of exquisite cadences.

If in the house he has reared there be certain rooms that, for general readers, it were best to leave with curtains drawn, let us remember that a poet is a child of his age as well as a child of all time, and let us take his great and gracious givings and leave the rest.

We may spend an evening at the Tabard Inn, an evening of that April that has with its sweet showers pierced the drought of March to the root, that April whose call to the west wind has been answered by the tender tops of the young things upspringing from the ground, and the melody of the small birds that cannot but sing because of the call of nature that pricks them in the heart. It is that April which calls to folk to go on pilgrimage; to give the first sweet glow of the young sun to the duty of sweet devotion. For this evening we shall be under the magic of a certain delicate-featured man whose eyes when bent down see more than our uplifted ones; and with those wonderful eyes of his we shall see that company. It is a company that might be described as motley or inclusive, according to the point of view. To us it is inclusive, because of the bond that unites rich and poor, knight and civilian, gentlewoman delicate in mind, exquisite in manner, clothed in the habit of religion, with a prosperous, loud-voiced and broad-spoken tradeswoman in her fine scarlet hosen and her spurs. Here are the heavenly and the worldly in mind, the worthy and the unworthy. For some of these the bond of that devotion which is the end of the pilgrimage is an external one only, while to others it is the reality of realities.

What characters they are, and how well we know them all, with their strength and their foibles, fairness and its opposite, types of men and women in all ages. We have seen Madame Eglentyne, have we not, wearing a dress not of religion; we have heard her pretty voice with its courtly modulations, and we have perhaps impatiently watched her giving dainties to her spoilt lapdogs, and thought of her perhaps rather as an affected fine lady. But we have not heard her tell a story, the story that Chaucer, who has seen her with other eyes than ours, knew that she could tell. We heard in her story her tender understanding of a little child and his sweet ambition to honor Our Blessed Mother Mary, and her great compassion blent with holy indignation as he falls into the enemies' hands, and her pride in the babe-martyr who died for love of the Alma Redemptoris Mater. So the veil that hid her from us dropt, and we saw the grace of her womanhood, the "gentillesse" of her heart, and the depth of her devotion.

We know the Clerk of Oxford too, in garb not that of the fourteenth-century student. He is wrapt in his books, shy, slender of speech, always ready to learn and always ready to share his learning. By and by we shall hear him tell of the sore trial of a woman for whom, we know, he feels, and we shall know that he is no bookworm, but a lover of his kind as well as of his books. So may it not be with the others and their tellings. Sometimes we are flung back by the irony of the telling of a story absolutely different from what might naturally have been expected, in its tone, if not in its style.

What do we mean when we say how "modern" an older poet often seems to us? Is it not that he is recognized by us, however unconsciously, as one of those who, by reason of large grasp, wide outlook, sympathies, loves, hates, and all that makes human nature, is not for an age but for all time? There is that in Chaucer which makes us stretch out our hands to him knowing that we shall feel his genial clasp of them, across the 600 years, as we cannot always readily touch hands with those far nearer to us in time.

A teller of tales is our Chaucer. But more than this we have in him, for he is a great poet, and we know our great poets because they abide with us, being part of our atmosphere: because they are the seers and the "makers-see"; because, too, they have helped in the molding of others, perhaps, even, of those greater than themselves. The "makers-see!" What has Chaucer made us see? Whiteness of daisies in the green of English fields, wherein we have heard the lark, "the messenger of day," as he went up in song-spirals. We see too, and in the season that "priketh every gentil herte," the loveliness of girlhood as Emily walks to and fro at sunrise, singing as an angel, and, in her happy youth, gathering the flowers, red and white, to crown her head with its long braided yellow hair.

Many a fair thing, many a noble thing, many an aspect of truth, does this poet make us see. Let us take one more, that "gentillesse," the love of which is so fervent in him that he cannot but dwell on it over and over, with the lingering touch of a lover. For gentillesse is not gentleness, nor high birth, nor the perfection of breeding. It is gentlehood, that large, beautiful thing wherein so much is comprehended. It is the grace interior, grace that by its own irresistible force takes outward form as the very flower of social virtue. And, as our poet has it, this gentillesse comes from Him who is the "Fader of gentillesse," the origin and source thereof, even Our Lord Jesus Christ. What more true, what more beautiful, could a poet have said?

REVIEWS

The Four Gospels, with a Practical Critical Commentary for Priests and Students. By Rev. CHARLES J. CALLAN, O.P., Lector of Sacred Theology and Professor of Sacred Scripture in the Catholic Foreign Mission Seminary, Ossining, N. Y. New York: Joseph F. Wagner (Inc.). $4.00.

Father Callan has done a great service to priests and students by publishing this commentary on the Gospels, for, excepting the translation of the sacred text, nothing is harder to produce than a good commentary. An efficient commentator not only chooses the best readings of the text and explains its grammatical construction, but he also points out the Scriptural principles of faith and morals, harmonizes apparent discrepancies, and solves chronological and topographical problems. His explanations are brief but clear, full but concise, and they always keep in view the principles of Biblical inerrancy and Catholic teaching, but do not omit secular erudition and scientific research. The experienced commentator does not dwell injudiciously on disputed questions, exegetical speculations or divergent opinions, knowing that they are apt to occasion a great loss of time and a confusion of ideas; but he cannot neglect the light afforded by the context and by parallel passages wherever found.

Father Callan has fully satisfied all the requirements of a good commentator. Though prepared for his task by the prayerful meditation of a long religious life and the rigorous course of philosophical and theological studies peculiar to the Dominican Fathers, he was especially fitted for the work by his years of experience in the classroom. His commentary is not the erudite and abstruse work of a mere bookworm, but the practical result of his lectures on Sacred Scripture before his seminary audiences. Here he was teacher and examiner: his daily class was to him a test of his own clear insight into the true meaning of the sacred text; the periodical examinations supplied a test of his power of communicating his ideas in a clear and striking way so as to be understood and remembered by his students.

Even the book's preface and appendix will be found very helpful to the Bible student, for the appendix gives a good harmony of the Four Gospels, a genealogy of the Herods, and a bibliography. In the body of the book is furnished a detailed study of each particular statement and event of the Gospel narrative. Here the author follows the traditional order of the Four Evangelists, prefacing each Gospel by a brief and clear introduction which is followed by the English text of the respective Gospel. Such questions as the census proclaimed before Our Lord's birth, the year of His Nativity, the length of His public life, the date of the Last Supper and of the Crucifixion have been studied by specialists of the highest rank, and have given rise to as many different opinions as are practically possible. Father Callan offers the reader the results of all this study in a few pages, always combining soundness of judgment with accuracy of information. The authenticity of the ending of the Second Gospel, and of the last chapter of the Fourth, is treated in the same masterly way. The chronological difficulties connected with the incidents of the Holy Infancy and with the visits to the sepulcher on Easter morning are clearly stated and as clearly explained. Needless to say, the explanation of the dogmatic passages of the Gospels, those, for example, that refer to the Holy Eucharist, to Confession, to Marriage, will prove simply invaluable to both priests and students. Father Callan's commentary deserves to have many readers.

Outwitting the Hun: My Escape from a German Prison Camp. By LIEUT. PAT. O'BRIEN, Royal Flying Corps. Illustrated. New York: Harper and Brothers. $1.50.

Even the most jaded reader of war-books is likely to find this volume a real "thriller." The author is an American who joined the Royal Flying Corps last spring, and after a short and glorious career as a fighting scout was captured by the Germans when his disabled machine fell within their lines. While he was being carried under guard to a military prison in the interior, Lieutenant O'Brien leaped from the window of a train that was going thirty-five miles an hour and landed on the rock-ballasted road-bed, but was able to pick himself up, make for a forest and hide there till the following night. He then "crawled through Germany," successfully avoiding observation, and living on vegetables he found in the fields. He subsequently reached Luxembourg, crossing it in nine days, and entered Belgium, where he had no end of exciting adventures. The fugitive's eighteen days of hardship and privation so weakened him that after swimming the Meuse he lost consciousness. Being befriended by kind Belgians, he got rid of his British uniform, walked boldly by German sentries, and found his way to a large city, where a forged passport was prepared for him. He never tried to use it, however, but on gaining the Dutch frontier burrowed under the high electric barrier, and thus reached Holland and freedom. The author records that the moment he felt that he was at last safe he went down on his knees and thanked God for his long series of escapes. The British Consul at Rotterdam saw that Lieutenant O'Brien soon passed on to England, and there he had an audience with the King. He then journeyed home to Momence, Illinois, where his "loving old mother" was longing to see him again. W. D.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"The Flower of the Chapdelaines" (Scribner, $1.35), by George W. Cable, is a quaint story of the vieux carré of New Orleans. Those who insist on action will not find the novel very absorbing, for it rambles along leisurely, somewhat disconnectedly. It has, however, like its characters, an old-time beauty of its own and has caught a good deal of the charm of a departing civilization.——"The Threshold" (Doubleday, $1.40), by Marjorie Benton Clark, tells how Joan Babcock, twenty-three years old, starts labor-riots among the workmen in factories owned by two men who are in love with her, sets the two capitalists against each other and ends by establishing a community settlement with a glorified factory in an idyllic environment. The best characters in this wildly improbable but rather interesting tale are Mrs. Rafferty and her son, Patsy, who assist Joan in disrupting the village and then regenerating it.

"Was Tyndale a Martyr of Liberty?" asks the Rt. Rev. Philip R. McDevitt, D.D., Bishop of Harrisburg, in the April 22 number of the Catholic Mind apropos of certain paintings in Pennsylvania's capitol building which represent that heresiarch suffering and dying because he was the first to give the English the Scriptures in the vernacular. The Bishop proves that Tyndale's New Testament was banned only because it was a corrupt version, that there were English Bibles long before his time, and that, far from being a defender of liberty, Tyndale wrote a treatise on absolutism that was drastic enough to satisfy even Henry VIII. The author proves that the Tyndale pictures in the capitol are a travesty on history and an insult to every Pennsylvania Catholic whose money helped to pay the artist. The second paper in the number is an Ursuline Sister's examination of the effect the "movie habit" has on the mind and character of adolescent girls, and the issue ends with some well-deserved strictures on "Modern American Mothers."

In "Children of Passage" (Dutton, $1.50), by Frederick Watson, the portrayal of character is vivid yet natural, the author's presentation of the vulgar rich in the first chapter being notably clever, and the wholesome love story that brings the characters together will hold the reader, but the introduction of the plot is deferred too long.——"The Unseen Hand" (Doubleday, $1.40), by Clarence Herbert New, is a story of diplomatic intrigue with the frequent suggestion of intrigue that is not at all diplomatic. The plot is very involved and the complete incidents are not particularly "gripping."——Louis Couperus, the Dutch novelist, in "Old People and the Things That Pass" (Dodd, Mead, $1.50), shows his power as a portrayer of character, but there is scarcely an attractive person in the book and the effect of the story is depressing. For the most part his men and women live, or have lived, like carnal pagans.——Annie Vivanti Chartres, who writes in Italian, French, German and English, vividly describes in "The Outrage" (Knopf, $1.35) the abominations attending the Germans' invasion of a Belgian village. The book will probably be harmful to most of its readers.

"Children's Stories and How to Tell Them" (The Home Correspondence School, Springfield, Mass., $1.62), by J. Berg Esenwein and Marietta Stockard, is a valuable addition to Dr. Esenwein's "Writers' Library." In method and make-up it follows its predecessors in the same series. Clear, simple and practical, it cannot but be productive of good in the home as well as in the classroom. The cultural effect of a good story is clear to all experienced in the education of children. The early mental and moral stimulus the well-told story gives will lead to better talking, better reading and better writing. The book, besides indicating the many requirements of the successful story-teller, has in Part II fifty carefully selected short-stories with good supplementary lists of references. The general index, too, is quite handy. In fact nothing is omitted to make story-telling to children attractive and easy.

Modern sentimentality and that easy-going theology which objects to the "harshness" of the Church's teaching on hell and tends to square doctrine with man's desires receive a thorough shaking up in Mr. Raupert's admirably clear and logical vindication of hell as an essential dogma of Christianity. In "Hell and Its Problems" (Catholic Union Store, Buffalo, $0.25) he meets all the popular objections very convincingly and shows that Spiritism is only a new confirmation of an old doctrine. Especially good are the author's quotations from eminent scientists and his insistence on the fact that man alone condemns himself to hell, and in a sense makes hell for himself.——Opportunely for the ordination season comes the booklet, "The Ceremonies of Ordination to the Priesthood" (Loyola University Press, $0.25), a translation of the ceremonies contained in the Pontificale Romanum. The booklet will prove a great help to the understanding and the proper following of these ceremonies, so beautiful and so full of meaning, as well as a fitting and instructive souvenir of the great day.

Here is a martial "Christmas Carol" from Jesse Edgar Middleton's "Canadian Book of Songs" (Putnam, $1.50):

God rest you, merry gentlemen,
  Let nothing you dismay,
The living Son of Mary stands,
  In the listening post today.
And if you fight for weaker folk,
  For babes upon the breast,
Then have you fought full gallantly,
  And bayonets may be blest.

God save you, merry sailor folk,
  A-roving on the seas,
With lightning in the turret-guns,
  With winter on the breeze.
Saint Peter was a sailor man,
  The sons of Zebedee
Could haul a sheet or reeve a block
  On boisterous Galilee.

God rest you, merry bombadier,
  Beside the hidden gun,
There was a Roman officer
  Who came to Mary's Son.
And wore his blade more manfully
  Beneath the Syrian skies,
Because the radiance of a Hope
  Was ever in his eyes.

ECONOMICS

Four Pillars of British Labor Program

A PLAN for political and economic reconstruction infinitely more feasible than any which has emerged from Russia or the Socialists is the proposed program of the British Labor party. Its dominant note gives the caution:

> We must ensure that what is presently to be built up is a new social order, based not on fighting but on fraternity, not on the competitive struggle for the means of bare life, but on a deliberately planned cooperation in production and distribution for the benefit of all who participate by hand or by brain; not on the utmost possible inequality of riches, but on a systematic approach towards a healthy equality of material circumstances for every person born into the world; not on an enforced dominion over subject-nations, subject-races, subject-colonies, subject-classes, or a subject-sex, but, in industry as well as in government, on that equal freedom, that general consciousness of consent, and that widest possible participation in power, both economic and political, which is characteristic of democracy.

The fundamental mistake of the Bolsheviki, who would consummate the millenium in one revolutionary somersault, is to be avoided, as the program adds that "We do not, of course, pretend that it is possible, even after the drastic clearing away that is now going on, to build society anew in a year or two of feverish 'reconstruction.'" This new socio-economic structure is to be built of four "pillars," "resting upon the common foundation of the democratic control of society in all its activities." These pillars are termed: (1) the universal enforcement of the national minimum; (2) the democratic control of industry; (3) the revolution in national finance, and (4) the surplus wealth for the common good.

The German Social Legislation

THE interpretation of the "national minimum" is evident to all economists and sociologists who have followed the progress of social industrial legislation in this country and abroad. German kultur recognized the need of advanced social legislation in the execution of its Welt-Geist program. Its workingmen, its common people, would have to be cajoled through paternalistic industrial provisions making for social amelioration if they were to become docile and misled abettors of the nefarious schemes of their military leaders. The proximate ends were worthy, and German social legislation became in many respects the model for other nations to copy. But these proximate ends were but prefatory to that ultimate end, which has demanded the sacrifice of countless German lives in the consummation of the ambitions of their military masters. Kultur demanded kinder for the Kaiser, for kinder were paramount in any scheme of military conquest. Hence economic conditions had to be thrown about the working and middle classes, so as to make their station in life amenable to cooperation in the pan-Germanic program. What thus was apparently enlightened social legislation conducive to industrial amelioration and economic democracy in a slight degree was merely a gigantic sham designed to lead the German people to a slaughter, not of their own preferment, but that of their masters. Economic democracy then follows, not precedes, political democracy.

I further believe that the interest, most undisinterested, as shown by the German Government in the furtherance of better social conditions, is very largely responsible for the allegiance now accorded it by a people which knows no better. German thought, like the German army, is a highly organized machine, capable of considerable mass action, but not of individual initiative, with the leaders fallen. It is no wonder, then, that the schism between the German Government and its people is not so pronounced as the Bolsheviki preferred to believe. Thus again the contribution of economic freedom to human happiness is definitely negatived by the failure of a people primarily to control its political destinies.

The National Minimum

LET us return to the national minimum advocated by the British Labor party. This first principle must secure to "every member of the community, in good times and bad alike, all of the requisites of healthy life and worthy citizenship." Social legislation would have to provide for a "prescribed minimum of leisure, health, education, and subsistence." To this effect acceptable laws already on the statute books will have to be properly enforced, some others suitably amended, and new ones added. Workmen's compensation acts, minimum-wage laws, social insurance against unemployment, governmental provisions against unemployment, and lowered "real" wages following the demobilization of military forces and war industries' workers, are some of the constructive measures demanded.

There is much in this program to be commended. It virtually provides a State guarantee of the "dictates of natural justice," which Pope Leo XIII. characterized as "more imperious and more ancient than any bargain between man and man, namely, that the remuneration ought to be sufficient to maintain the wage-earner in reasonable and frugal comfort, sufficient to maintain himself, his wife and his children in reasonable comfort." Amazing as it seems, Leo XIII. anticipated British labor's demand for a "prescribed minimum of leisure, health, education, and subsistence" by some quarter of a century. I judge that all Catholic economists and sociologists can heartily subscribe to this first plank, even though British labor in the elaboration of its plan calls for so many "good" things that one questions the physical possibility of a social production able to provide a dividend large enough to "go around."

Democratic Control of Industry

THE pillar of "the democratic control of industry" insists on "democracy in industry as well as in government," although the priority of the latter is claimed, as "individual freedom is of little use without complete political rights." This pillar stands for the complete socialization of the means of production, common ownership of the nation's land, and immediate nationalization of railways, steamship lines, posts and telegraphs, mines, and the production of electrical power. The Labor party looks forward to a > Genuinely scientific reorganization of the nation's industry, no longer deflected by industrial profiteering, on the basis of the common ownership of the means of production; the equitable sharing of the proceeds among all who participate in any capacity and only among these, and the adoption, in particular services and occupations, of those systems and methods of administration and control that may be found, in practice, best to promote the public interest.

No mention is made whether present owners, whom society has implicitly guaranteed in their holdings, are to be expropriated or reimbursed upon government assumption of ownership.

Cooperation Versus Public Ownership

THE rights of jurisdiction latent in the State would validate the assumption of public ownership in certain particular fields, provided just and fair reimbursement were extended the private owner. But against this indiscriminate program of State Socialism I wish to contrast the principle of cooperative ownership and control of industry by the workers themselves, as recently outlined by AMERICA, and which already has been conveniently plagiarized by Socialists, and termed "gild Socialism."

Cooperative control of industry, contrary to all tenets of Socialism, involves the further extension of private property. It would demand a wide and effectual distribution of stockholdership among the workers in their respective industries. If elaborated upon the cooperative principles now followed by the farmers of Minnesota in their cooperative enterprises, there would be a limit assigned to the number of shares any stockholder could hold, while the "one man, one vote" principle would assure a strictly democratic direction of the industry.

Dividends earned would accrue to many stockholders, instead of comparatively few as at present. Such a program would retain the capable leaders now operating the various industries, and, as each workman would be a private owner, the entire industry would profit by an efficiency born of personal interest and investment. The consideration of the remaining two "pillars" will be left to the following article.

JOHN J. WAGNER.

EDUCATION

Some Histories of Education

NEARLY twenty years ago Father Robert Schwickerath, S.J., in his "Jesuit Education" called attention to the strange varieties of histories of education from which the American public gets its estimate of Catholic schools. Of these histories some were innocently ignorant and incorrect, but some can be acquitted only with difficulty of the charge of downright unfairness and bigotry. Compayré, whose work is called by Brother Azarias a "condensation of all virulence and hatred against everything Catholic, ill-concealed by a tone of philosophical moderation," was singled out for special criticism, while Painter, Payne and Seeley were shown to be so unreliable that even Cubberly, who has kind words for Compayré, was constrained to omit the trio from his "Syllabus." Raumer's "History of Education" is thought by Cubberly to be of value, although Henry Barnard confessed that he could not admit many passages from Raumer, bearing on Jesuit education. Barnard's own books, useful in many respects, are far removed from impartiality on many topics affecting the Church. Dr. Williams, of Cornell, has published three volumes, of which the third, "A History of Modern Education," is narrow in concept and unreliable. Shoup and Kemp are authors who strive honestly after impartiality, but neither is free from misstatements of the Catholic position.

THE POISONED WELLS

SINCE 1903 the study of the history of education has been undertaken by thousands of Catholic and non-Catholic prospective teachers. Yet it is fair to ask the question whether in all this time American teachers have obtained a wider and truer view of Christian education, and to answer the question in the negative does not seem an exaggeration. On the contrary, it is to be feared that the attitude of the average American teacher towards Christian, especially Catholic, education is marked by commiseration, if not actual contempt. Dr. Munroe's "A Textbook of the History of Education" was widely heralded by some as a text fulfilling all reasonable expectations. But a careful examination reveals that the book is insidiously unfair; insidiously because, unlike Compayré, the author does not attack openly, but under the guise of praise and excuse. Jesus Christ is not mentioned; His influence on eduction is neglected. The treatment accorded to the monks, to scholasticism, to the work of the Church in modern times, to the "grand achievement" of the "Reformation," are all calculated to give the Catholic student the impression that the educational work of the Church is worthless. As to the non-Catholic reader, he will be confirmed in his estimate of the Church's unhappy influence upon education, and even be led to conclude that no greater calamity can be feared for education than the influence of the Church. Dr. Munroe's work, first published in 1905, has been reprinted without essential change up to January, 1915, the date of the current edition. The same author has also edited a "Cyclopedia of Education." Of course, the articles in this work do not always agree either in substance or detail with the views expressed in the textbook. Thus the article on Luther, contributed by an admirer of the "Reformer," presents the Protestant estimate, no longer tenable after the critical examinations by Jansen and Grisar. Other articles, however, such as that on the Jesuits by Father Schwickerath, give an impartial view of the matters on which they treat.

BANEFUL EFFECT

THIS examination of the various histories of education does not pretend to be complete, but one more, "Outlines of the History of Education," by Aspinwall, should be added. Dr. Aspinwall is, or was, professor of the history of education in the New York State Normal College, and sends his book to the pedagogical world, enriched by a preface from Dr. A. S. Draper. The plan of the book is very similar to that of Dr. Cubberly's work, and the "authorities" quoted are, for the most part, Compayré, Graves, Painter, Munroe, Payne, Seeley, Williams, and the "Encyclopædia Britannica." Father Hughes' book on Loyola is the only Catholic source to which reference is made. On the influence of Luther and other reformers, the old myths, long abandoned by reputable historians, are set forth as sober fact. The chapter on monasticism is fair, although the worthy Doctor contrives to omit all reference to St. Benedict. In the chapter on the rise of the universities, Denifle is not even mentioned, and Fenelon, as in Painter, is represented as an adherent of Jansenism. Modern school systems, and State school systems, especially in America, are lauded as embodying the highest ideals of education. In brief, Dr. Aspinwall's book is little more than a resumé of all that has been said by other authors, attacking the work of the Church in education.

It is sad to think that year after year thousands of students are compelled to drink from these poisoned wells. Even if these young men and women came to the study of the history of education with unbiased minds, the effect would be deplorable. Many of them, however, through no fault of their own perhaps, take up the work with minds prejudiced against the Church and all things Catholic. Thus the very text-books in use in schools, for which Catholics pay their share of the taxes, contribute to strengthen hostility to the Church.

OUR OWN NEED

AS an example of gross ignorance, the following specimens are surely noteworthy. The New York Regents' examination questions on various subjects are collected and published, with answers. The history of education from 1904-1915 has been compiled by A. Hazleton Smith, A.B., with answers by Rose V. Perry. Question 17 is: "Give approximately the period during which scholasticism flourished. Name three famous scholastics and briefly describe the work of one of them." These are the answers, set down in sober earnestness:

> Scholasticism flourished about 1453. The three great scholastics of that century were Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch. Boccaccio was distinguished for his scholarship. He was zealous in collecting books and manuscripts, and he is said to have been the first Italian who imported a copy of the Iliad and Odyssey from Greece.

In Seeley's "Index" one finds St. Thomas Aquinas referred to as a "Benedictine" teacher, and Aspinwall reports that Dante is the author of the Divine Comedy and the Inferno.

Fortunately, the Catholic is not left entirely without guides. The "History of Education," by Dr. McCormick, of the Catholic University, is reliable and thoroughly Catholic in tone, although lacking the comprehensiveness of Dr. Stoeckl's "Geschichte der Paedagogik." There is another magnificent work in German, in four volumes, "Lexikon der Paedagogik," edited in collaboration with Dr. Otto Willmann, by E. Roloff. This work deals with all matters of history and theory of education in a most reliable manner. No more useful task could be undertaken for the benefit of our Catholic teachers, and of teachers in general, than the compilation of a work corresponding to this Lexikon. It would supply a corrective for thousands of teachers and students in our normal schools and teachers' colleges who are daily brought in contact with false and pernicious theories.

F. HEIERMANN, S.J.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Anti-Cigarette Day

JUDGING from a great variety of non-Catholic denominational papers that reach our sanctum, it would appear that the Two Great Commandments of Our Lord, embracing all the law and prophets, must yield in importance to two new Protestant commandments found nowhere in the Scriptures, the first of which is: "Thou shalt not drink intoxicating liquors," and the second is like to it and naturally follows upon it: "Thou shalt not smoke." Sunday, April 28, has been appointed as a day of universal prayer and preaching in all the churches of America to save men from the monstrous and destructive vice of cigarette smoking. Such is the ordinance issued by the Anti-Cigarette League of America. Its immediate purpose is to secure legislation to prohibit the sending of cigarettes, and probably of tobacco in general, to the soldiers and sailors at the front. All sense of proportion and of spiritual values has been lost. However "nasty" or "offensive" any one may consider the smoking of cigarettes, there are countless real and destructive vices to be combatted from the pulpit at the present moment. Why not designate April 28 as a day of prayer and preaching against the far more injurious vice of divorce, or the flagrant indecency of our theaters and literature, or against any other of the serious evils that are threatening our American civilization?

"The Miracle of the Mass"

"THE Miracle of the Mass" was the headline of an editorial the Engineering News-Record recently sent to the press "for release at once." The deplorably bad taste of the caption, to take no higher ground, must have struck most readers of the article, for the writer was not referring to the Holy Sacrifice at all, but merely making some commonplace remarks about the nature and effects of mass-movements at home and in the field. "The miracle of the mass can wreck us or save us," is one of his observations. Properly understood, that is true. What takes place at the moment of Consecration when Mass is said is not of course a "miracle" strictly speaking, but the Church's Holy Sacrifice, like the Divine Victim who is mystically immolated on the altar, "is set for the fall and for the resurrection of many," and "for a sign which shall be contradicted." Those who, with hearts free from grave sin but full of that "faith and devotion" mentioned in the canon, assist at Mass doubtless secure the graces that will "save" them. But those careless Catholics who through their own fault miss Mass on Sundays, and holy days, besides being guilty of a mortal sin of disobedience, fail to receive the graces Almighty God intends to give them there, and thus "the Miracle of the Mass can wreck" them. That the Holy Sacrifice, moreover, is still "a sign which shall be contradicted" seems to be proved by the action of those prohibition fanatics who would make it a crime for a priest to have Mass-wine in his possession.

Congress Passes the Chaplain's Bill

THE House of Representatives has passed the chaplain's bill increasing the ratio of chaplains in the army to one for every 1,200 officers and men. The bill is an amendment of the original law, which provided for one chaplain to every regiment, and was made necessary by the order issued last May increasing the number of men in an infantry regiment from 1,200 to 3,600. The present bill not only restores the previous proportion of chaplains but permits the assignment of chaplains to military groups other than regimental, which would otherwise have been left unprovided. The bill had already passed the Senate and the amendments made by the House have been accepted by that body. The following is the text of the bill:

> Sec. 15. Chaplains. The President is authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, chaplains in the army at the rate of not to exceed, including chaplains now in service, one for each one thousand two hundred officers and men in all branches of the military establishment, with rank, pay and allowance as now authorized by law: Provided, That there shall be assigned at least one chaplain for each regiment of Cavalry, Infantry, Field Artillery, and Engineers: Provided further, That the persons appointed under this act shall be duly accredited by some religious denomination or organization and be of good standing therein under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War: Provided, That the maximum age limit of chaplains in the army shall be 45 years.

It may be noted that this latest legislation increases the age limit of chaplains by five years. According to the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, there are now 199 Catholic chaplains, 457 Protestant and ten of other denominations. The new bill permits the appointment of an additional 800 chaplains. When the bill was presented to the President for signature, he returned it asking that certain points be clarified. The difficulty is so slight that the bill will probably be signed before AMERICA leaves the press.

Conditions in Our Indian and Negro Missions

ACCORDING to the financial statement of the Negro and Indian Missions of the United States, the total annual collection for 1917 amounted to $135,013.61. The special appropriations and contributions for the Indian schools through the Washington Bureau were $122,953.85 from the United States Government, $12,726.68 from the Preservation Society, and $5,615 from the Marquette League. Twenty thousand dollars were transferred to the Catholic Indian Bureau from the Negro and Indian Fund. As an instance of the conditions existing everywhere in the work that is being done among the Colored People and the Indians, the commission charged with the distribution of the fund prints a letter written to his Bishop by the Rev. A. Heick, S.V.D. It pictures the distress of our Sisters in the Catholic Negro school. Thus at Vicksburg the Sisters have been sleeping in the attic. "You know what this means in the South. Not even Negroes will take to that." In spite of the many sleepless nights during the unendurable heat of summer, the Sisters rose early in the morning and labored in the school all the day. Several of the teachers have been forbidden by the doctor to continue their work under the almost impossible conditions to which they are subjected.

> After the sad experience we had with our Sisters during this season, we cannot leave them in these missions without sinning against the Fifth Commandment. In other words, if we fail to get the means needed for putting up a decent dwelling for our Sisters, our schools will have to be without teachers at these places. How strange! We have the schools. Fine buildings they are. We can get the children, too. They like to go to the Catholic school. And mind you, we also have the Sisters. Ready and willing they are to follow the voice that seems to call them to work in the Colored Harvest field. Yet we must tell them to stay home and wait for better times.

The alternative is either to build during the coming summer or to give up this work in various districts where it is so sadly needed. The good Father still continues to hope that American Catholics will not forget the heroic missionaries among the Negroes: "I still firmly believe that we shall succeed. We have been praying to St. Joseph this month and shall continue to do so. We believe in prayers. May they deserve to be answered."

The War.—After several days of comparative inactivity, broken by minor engagements during which the British advanced their positions east of Robecq and the Germans gained ground southwest of Festubert, the latter launched two massed attacks, one in the Lys valley and the other between the Somme and the Avre. In the former they gained and have held important positions which imperil Ypres and constitute a new menace to the channel ports; in the latter they made an important advance, but subsequently were forced to relinquish almost all their gains.

Bulletin, Apr. 22, p.m.-Apr. 29, a.m.

Having secured their recently captured positions on the Messines ridge, the Germans brought up heavy reinforcements and drove the British out of Wytschaete. Later they took St. Eloi. Then they began their attack on Mount Kemmel, advancing on it from the north, east and south. Moving forward from Wytschaete they forced the British back to the village of Vierstraat, reaching high ground northeast of Mount Kemmel, from which they shelled the hill itself and made their way along its western slopes. At the same time they moved forward from Wulverghem and took the ridge lying east of the hill. Further south, near Dranoutre, they tried to reach the southern slopes of the hill, but failed. Having thus surrounded Mount Kemmel on three sides, they stormed the summit. As a consequence the Allied forces abandoned Vierstraat, Dramoutre and Vieugelhoek. The Germans then advanced and took La Clytte, Locre and Croix Poperinghe, but subsequently were driven out of La Clytte. Locre has changed hands five times. Voormezeel was taken by the Germans but was lost by them. Around Ypres the British have withdrawn their lines to the positions held in 1914.

Mount Kemmel

Simultaneously with the attack on Mount Kemmel, the Germans made another vigorous thrust towards Amiens. On a high plateau nine and a half miles east of the city and midway between the Somme and the Avre rivers, the town of Villers-Bretonneux is situated. On Wednesday the Germans advanced on it, making their way over the plateau and along its northern and southern slopes. The British had to retire from the town to the woods immediately to the west. This retirement exposed the French and Americans in the village of Hangard, a short distance to the south, and as a consequence it had to be abandoned. Later counter-attacks were made on both places, with the result that Villers-Bretonneux is again entirely in the hands of the Allies, and most of Hangard.

Villers-Bretonneux and Hangard

During the week the offensive was resumed by the Allies at all sectors of the Balkan front. The British, French, Italian and Serbians attacked the Central Powers throughout the line, concentrating their efforts on the Albanian positions, the bend of the Cerna southeast of Monastir and south of Doiran. No important results were achieved by the offensive, which lasted two days and is generally regarded as having for its purpose to prevent the transfer of Austrian and Bulgarian troops to the Western front, rumors of which have been current for some time.

Activity in the Balkans

During the night of April 23 a sensational raid was made on the naval bases of the Germans in Flanders. The attack was similar in object to that attempted by Lieutenant Hobson at Santiago and by Admiral Togo at Port Arthur, and resembled in some respects the landing of the Allies at Gallipoli. The British aimed at blocking the channels of the harbors of Ostend and Zeebrugge, and at cutting off from the mainland the mole that juts out in a semicircle from the latter place and protects both the harbor and the canal leading to Bruges. The attack was fairly successful. A large portion of the fairway of the harbor of Ostend was closed. At Ostend not only was a gap of about 120 feet made in the mole, but the channel has been effectively blocked by two sunken ships lying in the form of a V. The German dredger which is necessary to keep the channel open even under favorable circumstances was destroyed.

British Raid Naval Bases

The important details of the attack, as nearly as can be gleaned from British accounts, seem to have been as follows: Under cover of a storm, a thick artificial fog and a dense screen of smoke, six obsolete British cruisers, from twenty to thirty years old, five of them filled with cement, and supported by auxiliary ships, destroyers, fast motor boats and launches, crept along the Belgian coast from Nieuport to Ostend and Zeebrugge. Unfortunately the wind changed and revealed their approach to the Germans, who immediately opened fire. In spite of this the British steamed into both harbors. Two cruisers, filled with cement were run aground and sunk in the harbor at Ostend, one in the channel and the other slightly off its course. Two other cruisers, filled with cement, were sunk in the channel at Zeebrugge, a third grounding before accomplishing the same object. Motor boats took off and rescued the crews.

A sixth cruiser, the Vindictive, accompanied by two large ferry boats carrying volunteers who acted as a storming party, by fast motor boats which destroyed most of the craft in the harbor, and by two old submarines filled with explosives, made for the mole. Their principal object was to divert attention from the operations aimed at blocking the harbor, but they had as a subsidiary purpose to inflict as much damage as possible. The submarines tried to reach the piling approach to the mainland. One of them, it is believed, went astray, but the other reached its objective. The crew, abandoning the vessel just as the fuse was lighted, saw a terrific explosion take place, and after being exposed in the water to the German fire were picked up. The Vindictive reached the mole, rammed and demolished a German destroyer, and in spite of fearful losses landed troops. After maintaining its position for an hour, during which considerable damage was done to defenders, to the battery, to the submarine and destroyer depots and to the seaplane base, the storming party was recalled and the Vindictive sailed out of the harbor and returned to Dover.

Reports to the effect that Germany has submitted to Holland an ultimatum, that the German Minister has retired from The Hague and the Dutch Minister from Berlin, and that the two countries are on the verge of war, far from being confirmed, have been officially denied. All that is known for certain is "that the matter is a very serious one" and that it is concerned with the resumption of the question of permitting Germany to transport sand and gravel through Limbourg. This much is known from the statement of the Dutch Foreign Minister, Jonkheer von Loudon, made on April 25 in the First Chamber of Parliament. Late dispatches seem to indicate that the dispute is in a fair way to adjustment through concessions made by Holland.

Holland's Difficulties

On April 26 the text of the assurance given by President Wilson to Greece was published in Washington and Athens. It reads as follows:

United States and Greece

> The people of the United States view with admiration the unselfishness and courage with which the Greek people, animated by that love of liberty and devotion to right which they have inherited from a long line of heroic ancestors, are fighting to preserve the freedom for which their patriotic forefathers valiantly fought. Claiming similar ideals and moved by the same principles of right and justice, the Government and people of the United States are determined that the fullest possible measure of assistance shall be rendered to Greece and that her integrity shall be preserved and her rights secured in any final negotiations for peace that shall take place.

The President's statement has been received with great satisfaction in Greece, as it lays to rest rumors that the Allies might seek to conciliate Bulgaria by concessions forced on Greece.

Mr. Andrew Bonar Law, Chancellor of the Exchequer, on April 22 introduced in the House of Commons the budget, which he said was the largest in the history of the world. He asked for $14,117,935,750, of which he proposed to borrow $10,118,198,250. The revenue for the last fiscal year had been $3,536,172,825, a large increase over that of the preceding year, and indicated a financial strength greater than any one could have imagined possible. At the end of the present year Great Britain's total debt would be $39,900,000,000, and the debt of the Allies to Great Britain $8,160,000,000. Last year Great Britain lent to the Allies, $2,535,000,000, and the United States to Great Britain, $4,750,000,000. A plan was under consideration by which the United States will undertake to finance the Allies, and Great Britain will confine her efforts to financing herself. If Great Britain can succeed in the latter project it will be the test of the nation's financial stability.

Great Britain's Budget

The new taxation scheme, which is to be as large as is possible without hampering the conduct of the war, included increased rates of taxation on postage, incomes, spirits, tobacco, sugar and many luxuries. Russia's debt to Great Britain, Bonar Law declared, was not a bad debt in his opinion, because sooner or later there would be a stable government which would require capital for the exploitation of Russia's great resources. This capital could not be obtained unless Russia assumed the nation's debts.

Of Germany's financial condition he had the following to say:

> Germany's daily expenditure is $31,250,000, practically the same as the British, but the German total does not include various charges borne by the Central Governments here. The total German votes of credit amounts at the present time to $31,000,000,000. Assuming that the German estimates would be realized, the total taxation levied by the German Government will amount to $1,825,000,000 as against $5,220,000,000 in Great Britain. This is not enough to pay the interest on the war-debts accumulated. The German balance sheet, reckoned on the same basis as the British, with the interest on the sinking fund, pensions and prewar expenditure, is $3,600,000,000 yearly. With an additional permanent imperial revenue of $600,000,000, the total additional revenue becomes $925,000,000. This amount added to the prewar revenue brings the total up to $167,000,000, showing a deficit of $1,925,000,000.

Such a state of affairs in England, he added, would mean that national bankruptcy was not far distant.

The revelations of Prince Lichnowsky, published in various continental papers, and recently appearing in translation in England and the United States, destroy the illusion that Germany began the war in self-defense. They were first published without the Prince's knowledge and were circulated by a relative of his in the interests of peace. The Prince was formerly German Ambassador to Vienna and London. The following extract is very condemnatory:

German Revelations

(1) We encouraged Count Berchtold to attack Servia, though no German interest was involved, and the danger of a world war could not but be known to us—whether we knew the text of the ultimatum is absolutely indifferent. (2) In the days between July 23 and 30, 1914, when M. Sazonoff declared with emphasis that he could not suffer an attack on Servia, rejected the British mediation proposals, though Servia, under Russian and British pressure, had accepted almost the entire ultimatum, and although an agreement as to the two questionable reports was easily to be reached, and Count Berchtold was actually prepared to be satisfied with the Servian answer. (3) On July 30, when Count Berchtold wished to draw back, and without Austria being attacked on the mere mobilization of Russia, sent an ultimatum to Petersburg, and on July 31 declared war on the Russians, though the Czar had pledged his word that so long as negotiations were still going on he would not let a single man march, consequently deliberately destroyed the possibility of a peaceable settlement.

It is not to be wondered at if, in view of these incontestable facts, outside Germany the entire civilized world lays on us the sole blame for the world war. Is it not intelligible that our enemies declared themselves unable to rest till a system has been destroyed which forms a standing menace to our neighbors? Must they not otherwise fear to have to take up arms again in a few years, and once more to see their provinces overrun and their towns and villages destroyed?

These admissions are very damaging.

The whole document deserves careful study, for it throws much light on German methods. A letter from R. von Wild, of the German War Ministry, to Captain von Papen, the attaché at Washington, has recently been published, in which it is requested that information be gathered as to how the revolutionists blew up railroad trains in Mexico. The letter, which contains the phrase "in the event of a European war," and bears the significant date of March 12, 1914, seems to lend confirmation to Lichnowsky's statements.

The publication of Prince Lichnowsky's memorandum caused a storm of angry comment in Germany in which the Government and especially the militarist party were charged with responsibility for the war. Accordingly Herr von Jagow, Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs at the time the war began, was instructed to write an article calculated to offset the impression produced by the memorandum. He was far from successful. Among other things he said:

I by no means share the opinion prevalent among us today that England laid all the mines for the outbreak of the war; on the contrary, I believe in Sir Edward Grey's love of peace and in his earnest wish to arrive at an agreement with us. But he had allowed himself to become entangled too far in the net of the Franco-Russian policy; he no longer found the way out, and he did not prevent the world war, something that he could have done. Neither was the war popular with the English people. Belgium had to serve as a battlefield.

The entire text appeared in the New York Times for April 28, which commented on Lichnowsky's memorandum, Von Jagow's reply, and the German editorial pronouncements concerning the subject as follows:

German attempts to refute and explain away the charges contained in the famous memorandum in which Prince Lichnowsky lays the responsibility for the outbreak of the world war at the door of the German Foreign Office and the militarist elements controlling it have only resulted in corroborating the Prince's statements and in making the oft repeated assertion that Germany is fighting a war for self-defense so ridiculous that it is now generally discredited even in the Kaiser's Empire.

The German press finds comfort in the reflection that Von Hindenburg's sword, unlike Berlin diplomacy, has made no blunders.

Belgium.—The "Lion of Flanders," the outstanding hero of the war, Cardinal Mercier, has written to the Bishops of Germany and Austria this eloquent protest against the seizure of church bells and organs:

Cardinal Mercier's Letter

My Very Dear Brethren:

The painful tidings, announced semi-officially on February 8 by the occupying power, have been confirmed. The bulletin of laws and edicts dated February 21 requires an inventory of the bells and organs of our churches. Informed by experience, we need not delude ourselves; the inventory of today is the signal for the requisition of tomorrow. The repeated protests of the Sovereign Pontiff, our appeal to the Chancellor of the Empire, appear thus far to have been in vain.

Your Christian hearts will bleed. At a time when we are in such need of comfort, a veil of mourning will descend upon our land, covering like a shroud our every day. It is to be for Catholic Belgium an interminable Way of the Cross.

It is true, is it not, dear brethren, that we should have borne this sorrow, added to so many others, if it had concerned ourselves alone, but this time the rights of God, of Our Saviour, Jesus, the freedom of the Church and of her heritage are to be sacrificed to what is called necessity. That is, to the military need of our enemies. The freedom of the Church lies in her complete independence with regard to all secular powers, not alone in her teachings of the Word, in the administering of the Sacraments, in the untrammelled relations between all ranks of her Hierarchy, but also in the publishing and applying of her disciplinary decrees, in the conservation and administration of her temporal heritage.

In the execution of this duty of our pastoral office we protest, dear brethren, against the injury which the forcible seizure of church property will cause to the liberty of our mother, the Holy Church. We add that the removal of the bells without the consent of the religious authorities and despite their protests will be a sacrilege.

The bell is, in fact, a sacred object, its function is sacred. It is a consecrated object; that is to say, it is devoted irrevocably to Divine service. It has been not only blessed, but anointed by the Bishop with the holy oil and the holy chrism, just as you were anointed and consecrated at holy Baptism; just as anointed and consecrated as the priest's hands which are to touch the Consecrated Wafer.

The function of the bell is holy. The bell is sanctified by the Holy Ghost, says the liturgy: Sanctificetur a Spiritu Sancto, to the end that, in its voice, the faithful shall recognize the voice of the Church calling her children to hasten to her breast.

It announced your initiation into Christian life, your Confirmation, your First Communion. It announced, dear parents, your Christian marriage; it weeps for the dead; thrice daily it marks the mystery of the Incarnation; it recalls the immolation of the Lamb of God on the altar of sacrifice; it sings the joys of Sabbath rest, the cheer of our festivals of Christmas, of Easter, of Pentecost. Her prayers are associated with all the events and all the great memories, happy or unhappy, of the fatherland.

Yes, the seizure of our bells will be a profanation; whosoever assists in it will lend the hand to a sacrilege.

The Catholic Bishops of Germany and Austria will not deny these principles. If their patriotism has wrung from them concessions which must have cost their religious spirit dear, patriotism with us confirms, on the contrary, the law of resistance. We would be betraying the Church and the fatherland were we so cowardly as to permit without a public act of reprobation the seizure of metal to be converted by the enemy into engines of destruction, destined to carry death into the ranks of the heroes who are sacrificing themselves for us.

The authorities, strangers to our beliefs, will not be greatly moved, I fear, by the protest, however worthy of respect, of our religious consciences; but at least they should remember their given word and not tear up a juridical code which their believers have elaborated with us and promulgated. Morality has force of law for governments as for individuals.

His Eminence then cites the Hague Convention and continues as follows:

Evidently bells and organs are not necessary to supply the needs of the army of occupation; they lie in the domain of private property, are destined for the exercise of Catholic worship.

The transformation of these articles of the Church into war munitions will be, therefore, a flagrant violation of international law, an act of force perpetrated on the weaker by the stronger, because he is the stronger.

We Belgians, who have never wished nor acted other than well toward Germany, we are the weak ones. I call you all to witness, brethren, is it not true that prior to 1914 a current hospitality was turning our trusting hearts toward those who are today so harshly oppressing us? You will remember that on the very day of the invasion, the first lines that flowed from my pen spoke to you of those whom we have the sorrow to call our enemies. For four years Germany has been rewarding us. Nevertheless, we will not rebel. We will not seek in desperate recourse to material force the sudden triumph of our rights. Courage does not reside in passionate impulse but in self-mastery. We will offer to God in reparation for the sacrilege which is about to be committed against Him, and for the final success of our cause, our supreme sacrifice.

In the name of the freedom of the Church, in the name of the sanctity of the Catholic religion, in the name of international law, we condemn and reprove the seizure of the bells and organs of our churches; we forbid the clergy and faithful of our diocese to cooperate toward their removal; we refuse to accept the price of the sacred objects taken from us by violence.

Strong in invincible hope, we await the hour of our God.

D. J. CARDINAL MERCIER,
Archbishop of Malines.

Not long after this letter had been made public the Kaiser, so dispatches say, forbade the bells and organs to be seized.

Ireland.—The country is still intensely agitated over conscription. The workless day in protest against the draft was strictly observed except in certain parts of Ulster. The demonstration was well organized and showed that the anti-conscriptionists have full control of the forces which they have evoked. The Irish women are as active as the men. At a labor meeting held in Athlone women workers pledged themselves to undertake no work previously done by men, and they voted to oppose industrial as well as military conscription. Sinn Fein has warned the people to be prepared for an order in council immediately enforcing the Man Power act. The Nationalists declare that there is no sign of a change in the Cabinet's plans and that preparations for carrying them out are complete and formidable.

Conscription and Home Rule

Passive resistance continues to be the policy advocated. It will probably take form in a refusal to answer questions or to recognize tribunals. Dillon and his followers are still absent from Parliament, and, though the House of Commons is discussing a new bill which will impose heavy taxes on Ireland, the people have offered no objection to the absence of their representatives. No expectations are entertained that any Home Rule bill will modify opposition to the draft, and, unfortunately, the action of Carson has lent a religious aspect to the controversy. On April 24 the Orange leader issued a letter in which he accused the Government of breaking its pledge with Ulster. The portions of the letter, with a synopsis of other parts, sent to the United States, are as follows:

"The Government are on the point of introducing a Home Rule bill and have threatened to leave their posts in the hour of national danger unless it is carried into law. The Prime Minister says that any pledges which stood in the way are to be scrapped because the war has lasted longer than was expected by those who gave them. It may perhaps lead to a clearer understanding of the position in which Ulster is placed by this announcement to recall the sequence of events in relation thereto since 1914."

He then reviews in detail the history of the controversy during the war, his recital being devoted to showing that the Government broke a number of pledges to Ulster that no attempt would be made to force Ulster into a Home Rule scheme and that even when the Convention met the Government gave an understanding that legislation would only be introduced if a substantial agreement was reached, and that there could be no substantial agreement unless the representatves were assenting parties. He adds:

"The Prime Minister admits now that no substantial agreement has been reached, and the Ulster delegates in a separate report tell us that no agreement was reached on any point of importance. Yet Mr. Lloyd George announces the introduction of a Home Rule bill for the whole of Ireland, which, it is generally assumed, will be based on the majority report, from which the Ulster delegates unanimously dissented. Such is the story. The moral I will not attempt to draw."

On April 25 Carson wrote to the Secretary of the Ulster Unionist Council advising the reorganization of the machinery to oppose Home Rule and warning Ulster that it will be necessary to summon the Council's committee at the earliest moment after the publication of the bill by the Government. "The position to be taken will be of the gravest possible character," adds the Orange leader.

Freedom of Worship in the United States

THOMAS J. LIVINGSTONE, S.J.

BY freedom of worship is meant "freedom to worship God according to the dictates of one's conscience." Every person in the United States enjoys this liberty at present; the question is: What guarantee has he that this freedom will not be curtailed or taken away? To determine this, it is necessary to know from what source this liberty is derived. Does it come from the Federal Government or from the State, or is it inherent in the individual? Evidently a man has a right to worship God all alone on a desert island as well as in a crowded city; and as this right belongs to him inasmuch as he is a rational creature, a human being, it is a natural and inalienable right which can neither be lost nor delegated to another.

Our Government, both Federal and State, is carried on by delegated powers, as is clearly indicated in the Tenth Amendment of the Constitution: "The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." Now, as the right to religious worship is a natural and inalienable right, the people cannot delegate it to the Government, either State or Federal.

But is this right recognized by the various States and by the United States in a practical way? One of the essential functions of government is to protect the rights of its subjects; does our two-fold Government give any guarantee that this right to freedom of worship will be always preserved and protected? We need only concern ourselves with the recognition of these rights by the Government; for when a government officially recognizes a right of its subjects, it is bound by the very purpose of a government to protect its subjects in the exercise of that right.

So far as the States are concerned, we can limit our examination to the thirteen original States; for no new State was admitted to the Union until it had inserted in its constitution a guarantee of freedom of worship, as will presently appear. After the Declaration of Independence most of the States, in accordance with a recommendation of the Continental Congress, framed a constitution in harmony with the principles of that document. In every one of these constitutions in force at the time of the passing of the First Amendment, 1791, there was a provision which guaranteed freedom of worship. This guarantee was included in the Bill of Rights in those States that had drawn up one, otherwise it was contained in the Constitution itself. The Bill of Rights is the American equivalent of the Magna Charta of England.

Thus (1) Virginia, in its famous Bill of Rights of 1776 declares: "That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator, and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience." (2) Pennsylvania, 1776; (3) North Carolina, 1776, and (4) New Hampshire, 1784, declare freedom of worship to be a natural and inalienable, or indefeasible, right. (5) Maryland, 1776, calls it a duty; (6) Massachusetts, 1780, a right and duty; (7) New Jersey, 1776, an inestimable privilege. The free exercise of religion is guaranteed by (8) Georgia, 1777; (9) New York, 1777; (10) Delaware, 1776; and (11) Rhode Island, in the Royal Charter of Charles II, 1663, to which it adhered until it formed a constitution in 1844. (12) Connecticut did not frame a constitution until 1818; in this it decreed: "That the enjoyment of religious profession and worship without discrimination shall be forever free." (13) South Carolina, in its Constitution of 1778, proclaimed a State religion; but in 1790 it gave this up, ratified the ten amendments (being the fourth State to do so), and within three months had drawn up and ratified a new constitution in which freedom of worship was fully guaranteed: "The free exercise and enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever hereafter be allowed within this State to all mankind."

The first ten amendments to the Constitution were ratified in 1791, the first being as follows: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievance." This amendment is in the nature of a bill of rights by which Congress adds its guarantee to that of the States, declaring that these rights shall never be infringed upon. The example of South Carolina shows that the States considered themselves bound to conform their constitutions to the provisions of this amendment.

Freedom of worship was now forever secure in the original States; but regarding the States since admitted to the Union: is it equally secure in these? To answer this question it is only necessary to refer to the famous Ordinance of July 13, 1787, providing for the government of the North-West Territory (the only territory possessed by the United States at that time), and for the admission of States to be formed out of it. This Ordinance was reaffirmed in the first session of Congress held after the ratification of the Constitution and was signed by George Washington August 7, 1789. It shows that in the opinion of Congress the United States had a special mission to spread the principles of civil and religious liberty:

> Ordinance 12. And for extending the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty which form the basis whereon these republics, their laws and constitutions are erected; to fix and establish these principles as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments which forever hereafter shall be formed in the said territory: to provide also for the establishment of States and permanent governments therein, and for their admission to a share in the Federal councils on an equal footing with the original States, at as early period as may be consistent with the general interest:
> It is hereby ordained and declared by the authority aforesaid (The U. S. in Congress assembled), that the following articles shall be considered as articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said Territory and forever remain unalterable unless by common consent, to wit:
> Article First. No person, demeaning himself in a peaceable and orderly manner, shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments in the said Territory.
> Article Third. Education to be encouraged. Article Fourth. States formed, to remain in the Union forever. Article Sixth. No slavery.

The provisions of this Ordinance, originally designed for the North-West Territory, were applied to each new accession of territory and were used as a basis for the admission of all States into the Union. The leading idea in the Ordinance is that a new State must measure up to the standard of the old States before it is fit to be admitted into the Union on an equality with them.

Before the Civil War the incorporation in the State Constitution of such of the articles of the Ordinance as were prescribed by Congress was accepted as a sufficient guarantee of its compliance with the requirements of the compact; but since 1864 the compact itself had to be agreed to by the people in convention and its provisions inserted in the State Constitution before Statehood could be acquired, as is clear from the enabling act of any State admitted since 1864.

Besides the protection afforded by the compact with the United States Government, eighteen of the new States have the guarantee of freedom of worship assured by treaties between the United States and foreign powers. Thus in 1803 the United States in a treaty with France guaranteed freedom of worship to the inhabitants of the Territory of Louisiana, out of which twelve States were formed; in a treaty with Spain in 1819, the same provision was made for the people of Florida; in a treaty with Mexico in 1848, the same provision was made in favor of the inhabitants of the territory ceded by Mexico, out of which five States were formed, making a total of eighteen States in all.

In conclusion it is interesting and instructive to see how Congress interprets the First Amendment when applying it to citizens of a Territory governed by the United States. "An Act to provide for the Civil Government of the Philippines, 1902," Section Five of this act declares: "That no law shall be made respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, and that the free enjoyment of religious profession and worship, without discrimination or preference, shall forever be allowed."

Leadership and Publicity

RICHARD A. MUTTKOWSKI, Ph.D.

THE indifference and inactivity of Catholics are proverbial. For a year and more AMERICA has printed dozens of articles and communications excoriating the apathy of Catholics, be it on the matter of prohibition and the Mass, social work for young men and young women, on the social evil, on Socialism, the press, missionary collections, or a dozen other topics. The remedies offered to combat this indolence are many, but they generally resolve themselves into a plea for leadership and publicity. Given these two, much could be corrected and the situation would be materially improved. Just why the press and leadership should be linked together is fairly obvious. Leadership without publicity to spread knowledge of it could accomplish little. Leadership must, furthermore, be supported by organization, and here again the press plays an important rôle. Constructive work such as desired by the readers of AMERICA is only possible when mutual support exists.

As regards the leadership sought by Catholics: In the past our leaders have been drawn largely from the priesthood. In fact, the clergy constitutes our leadership, but unfortunately an insufficient one at this time. For the loss of confidence in the ministry by the non-Catholic public has undermined the confidence of the general public, less so of the Catholics, in the priesthood, a condition which emphasizes the need of lay leadership. Protestant denominations have relegated the ministry to a secondary place in the administration of the parish, for they recognize the truth of St. Paul's teachings by their actions, if not in actual words, that a married ministry serves the family first and the parish second.

Quite aside from this loss of influence, the parish duties of the priest in the way of religious, financial, social, educational and administrative work are so manifold that his own physical limitations prevent him from being effective in all phases. In most parishes the activities of the priest hardly extend beyond those of "parish clerk." If the laity took a proper interest in parish affairs, at least in the social and some administrative phases, better results might be achieved. Many a priest wears himself out with everlasting pleas for financial support, whereas the business side should be only secondarily his concern, so that he might concentrate on the really constructive phases of parish activities, such as the religious and sociological phases, and not dissipate his energies over petty financial transactions.

I am reminded of the reproach of a convert, who said:

> The trouble with you born-in-the-Faith Catholics is that you must have your priests think and act for you. Worse still, your priests actually try to do both. If your priests did not tell you when to bleat, and how to bleat, you would not have the courage even to think of bleating. You have achieved the pinnacle of selfishness. You are out to save your souls, but "save your soul" is a form of selfishness, too, for you don't care a tittle about the souls of others. Priests do, but not the laity. Your interest in your church ceases with assistance at Mass, and fulfilment of your spiritual duties, and perhaps sending your children to the school. Aside from these, as far as economic, political, and sociological affairs are concerned, you are brothers to that well-known biped, the ostrich, for you are all very wishful, but you do little, and only when spurred to it.

"That comes well from one who until recently vacillated between a policy of 'all faith and no works' and 'all works and no faith,'" I retorted.

"And now believes in 'faith plus works,'" he said.

His remark had stung, and yet there was too much truth in the pessimistic criticism to permit the sweeping denial I wished to make. Furthermore, it voiced thoughts that I had heard uttered before, and not from Catholic lips. Question: Are we laggards? Have we been cuddled and protected so many years until this generation knows no longer how to act of its own initiative, but must be spurred to it? Is too much done for us? Are we too lazy or too cowardly? In truth, we are too much in the habit of turning to priests and asking what we shall do, instead of taking the initiative ourselves. Not that alone, but Catholics expect that the priests shall not only offer a solution, but enact it for them. That this spirit pervades the Catholic body, at least in the United States, is reflected in the columns of AMERICA. Prelates and priests are asked to do this or that, whereas the laity should do it. Why always the priests and bishops? We forget that there are physical limitations, even where the willingness is great. For example, the present national crisis has developed the war council of Catholic bishops. But organization halts above instead of reaching down through the priesthood to the parish and its societies. There are a few diocesan councils, but no city and parish councils, which could be effective far beyond war-time needs. It is in this respect that Catholics fail, and fail egregiously. We might well copy the methods of our Protestant brethren, at least as far as the business phases are concerned, covering such matters as the support of institutions, of foreign missions, and of the press. If we Catholics had one-half the organization and spent one-half the efforts put forth by sectarian churches, what splendid results might be achieved! But our organization is all at the top, and none at the bottom, just the converse of Protestant denominations. True, we have plenty of societies in our parishes, but if we had fewer organizations and more organization would it not be better for us?

My plea is for lay leadership and for a greater participation of the laity in the parish affairs. Just why indifference should exist is sometimes a puzzle. Is it due to indolence? Or is it a case of docility, as some say? In other words, whose the fault, the priesthood's or the laity's? I venture to say that the fault must be shared equally. Too frequently priests will not tolerate lay cooperation in the administration of the parish, and many a budding constructive movement is quashed by their near-sighted opposition. On the other hand, many an ambitious program has been frustrated by the stupid apathy of the parishioners.

The reason for apathy lies in the ignorance of too many Catholics as to their own needs, largely because they do not read their Catholic periodicals. It is exasperating to hear a Catholic say, "I read the daily papers, and that is enough." No, it is not enough. To get at fundamentals: To read is a part of man's education. Primary education consists of systematized knowledge of God, men and things, and its purpose is to fit man for intercourse with his fellow-men. I do not regard the material criterion of making a man a producing machine as a just criterion. Education does not end with school, it only begins; a trite statement, but nevertheless a true one. Once a man leaves school, however, the only agencies for continuing his education are books and periodicals, and such of his fellow-men that he permits to influence him. Now, I maintain that no man can call himself an educated Catholic unless he knows something of Catholic history, principles, doctrines and achievements, so that he can at all times be ready to correct others and instruct them about the Church. Not defend, for the Catholic Church is too grand to require an apology, but those ignorant of her achievements need correction and instruction. The Church is not a mushroom growth come up over night that must protest its right to exist, but the oldest organization extant, with 2,000 years of practical experience to draw upon, quite aside from the Divine inspiration and guidance accorded her. Luther, the man who thought himself wiser than Christ Himself, may need apology, not Christ and His Church.

Yet the ignorance of Catholics regarding the essentials of their faith, its history and its achievements is something marvelous and truly appalling. So-called leaders are often the worst offenders. I know one fraternal leader who goes about bedecked with fraternal jewelry, beautiful to look upon, but whose knowledge of his catechism is so limited that for a long time he believed in the adoration of the Blessed Virgin by Catholics. I asked him if he ever said his Ave's and Our Lady's litany. But this man, though pretending to leadership, laid little claim to education. By the way, it was a Protestant who first corrected this man and called my attention to his belief. But it is the Catholic of that type who placidly ignores Lenten regulations and accepts meekly those hallowed myths about a doctrinal "end justifies the means," of Catholics being forbidden the Bible, of "oppression," "inquisitions," of "imperialism of the Church," and the like. If these Catholics would read Catholic literature they would not run the risk of being corrected by well-informed non-Catholics. It is that type of Catholic, too, that always carps and criticizes at any attempt at Catholic publicity and even apologizes for his Faith.

Perhaps I am pessimistic, but off-hand I would say that more than half the Catholics of this country are unacquainted with Catholic periodicals and that another fourth does not read them at all. Many people who subscribe to a Catholic paper or periodical do it from a "charitable motive," and never trouble to read it. In many instances the parents read and the children not at all, a condition which I have encountered too often. Among Catholic students at secular colleges, and in Catholic colleges, for that matter, only very few, perhaps one of every four or five, ever read a Catholic journal. But rest assured that they glance through every issue of Life and study the Saturday Evening Post assiduously. They can tell the daily doings of Mutt and Jeff, of the Duff family, and other comic celebrities of the daily papers, but of the vicious attacks on the Pope, of prohibition and its threat against the Mass, of Catholic missions, of Catholic education they know not a word.

It is agreed that a Catholic should read Catholic periodicals and literature. One logically asks: What is available? And this brings me to the point of this discussion. Let me state our biggest weakness: we have no Catholic journal of national circulation, one that might be found on newsstands in railroad stations and hotels, one that is known to all Catholics, one that might be a household word, one dealing with the vital topics of the day, be they religious, political, social, economic, or otherwise, presented from the Catholic standpoint. Is there such a Catholic journal? Not yet. AMERICA is most promising among younger weeklies, and has won its way to the front in nine years through sheer merit. May God speed it to the place of eminence it justly merits! Some of the diocesan papers achieve real merit, others are pitifully inadequate. For they contain little news, usually an ill-arranged enumeration of the week's general, local and diocesan events, some thing of "family interest," some articles on borrowed topics or perhaps plagiarized outright from more prominent journals like AMERICA, Ave Maria, Sunday Visitor, Extension, etc. Indeed, if I should point to a fault of Catholic journalism, I would say it is the vicious habit of "borrowing your neighbor's credit." It is rather striking to read articles in this week's issue of AMERICA and see them presented, slightly rearranged and without credit, a week or two later in the diocesan journals. Plagiarism is supposed to be characteristic of mediocrity and inferiority, but if that is true, then mediocrity and inferiority are widespread, indeed. The situation is little better among monthly periodicals. Primarily they lack "force" and "character," and are rather inferior imitations of non-Catholic "popular" monthlies. Of the hundred and one charity journals, the proceeds of which go to the support of institutions of various types, I shall say little. Most of them are filled with pious ineffectualities and because they cater to a very limited clientele and are frankly intended to be a partial return for a definite monetary support, they perhaps obstruct rather than advance the cause of a Catholic press, especially since that clientele is apt to consider this the only available type of Catholic periodical. Only reverence for the subject-matter prevents many a litterateur from calling them unflattering "trash."

The feasibility of Catholic dailies has been threshed out repeatedly in AMERICA during past years. Because of its local patronage for advertising matter, because of local interest for a large portion of its news, a daily is limited. But if dailies like the New York Times and the Chicago Tribune can command a national interest, and this despite the fact that news and advertising matter are largely local, why then cannot another daily succeed? Furthermore, if it is possible for Socialists to promote dailies in a dozen cities, if foreign-language dailies can be published profitably in German, Polish, Yiddish, Bohemian, Swedish, French and other tongues in our big cities and can exist side by side with the regular English journals, ought not Catholic dailies be able to exist at least in very large cities? Again, if racial, political and economic interests can support a special press, why not a common religious interest?

Catholic dailies and Catholic periodicals with national interest have been advocated by Catholic leaders, the clergy and the laity. Why do these needs remain unsatisfied? Simply because our efforts are split up, because our leaders do not concentrate their efforts, and because the market is cluttered up with an ineffective medley clamoring lustily for support. In these modern days of publishing the matter needs the financial and moral support of more than a few scattered leaders. Only with a big organization behind can such periodicals and dailies be assured a success. I hope that the Knights of Columbus in their grand educational work will before long take up this phase of general education, by means of an active campaign for the support of a few selected and, if needs be, newly organized Catholic periodicals, just as they have advanced the cause of education by reprinting a number of splendid books and by the establishment of scholarships at the Catholic University. This lies well within the confines of the program instituted by the Knights and with the prestige given them by their war-time activities they should have little difficulty in promoting constructive results.

In this paper I have emphasized two essential needs: organized leadership and an efficient press to support it. We have neither. Both are vital to the success of Catholicism, but both seem to halt at the apathy of Catholics. My convert friend was right: Catholics are too much concerned in the saving of their own souls and consider that their only obligation in this world. They forget that our fellow-men have a right to be considered. Seven of the Commandments demand that we serve our neighbor. We belong to others. Our lives are not our own to live. We belong to the past and to the future, we are linked inseparably to both. Others have worked for us, others demand our service. It is the spirit of active charity, the charity of deeds, not merely of a charitable purse, which Catholics need more than anything else.

The results of extant apathy are numerous. Repressive and discriminative laws have been enacted in several States, and yet the Catholics, instead of rising in a mighty protest, huddle down with an insufferable placidity that has the additional effrontery to consider itself "martyred" and persecuted. As if a martyr had ever suffered because he was silent! At this very moment when of our soldiers a Catholic third is fighting for the future of the world, attacks, both open and disguised, break forth in the legislatures. There is the case of Maryland and the threat of prohibition. And as this is written, AMERICA brings news of the Michigan attack on the schools. The school and the Mass. Abolish the Mass and you abolish worship. Abolish the school and you abolish Catholic education. The outcome? Who knows? Will it be better after the war is won? Germany's Kulturkampf occurred in the years immediately following the Franco-Prussian war. We have confidence in the fairness of our fellow-Americans, but Americans, although fair, are often misinformed. France's over-confidence in her Catholicism lost her the Orders, the Church property, and the schools.

There is just one remedy, preparation. In this case preparation implies organization with able leadership backed by efficient publicity. But the best plans, the ablest leaders, the most skilful journalism cannot accomplish results unless the people in general take an interest. That interest is essential, and this is a fact which should be hammered home by the clergy and lay leaders. Insist that the people read, and read of the best only, and provide that best. See that reading begins in the schools and continues in the family. But the "best" are too few and these few do not receive the support they deserve.

Early New England Irish

GEORGE O'DWYER

RECENTLY in delving into an almost forgotten set of volumes issued by the British Public Record Office the writer came upon some interesting historical material. In one volume were the orders issued in the seventeenth century by Oliver Cromwell and his Council of State for the deportation of Irish, men, women and children, to these shores. Intermingled with these orders were copies of letters written by Cromwell's paid lieutenants in America concerning certain Puritan folk then in power in New England. The reading of these orders and letters aroused in the mind of the writer a desire for investigation of early American documents. One line of research led finally to a brochure written by John H. Edmonds of the Harvard library, the title of which was "Dorman Mahoone, alias Mathews, an Early Boston Irishman." The paper throughout showed the result of painstaking research and some of the deductions concerning the progress of Mr. Mahoone were decidedly ingenious. There was one paragraph, however, that did not harmonize with the researches of the writer of this article. It read: "Prior to the Irish Rebellion of 1641, an occasional Irishman was welcome to New England, but after that . . . they were no longer."

The latter part of this statement aroused keen curiosity and after a thorough investigation I concluded it was not true to fact. Up to 1676 the vital records of Massachusetts have many misspelled Irish names. A glance at the Calendar of British State papers, colonial series, supplemented by references to O'Hart's standard work on Irish genealogies leads to the same conclusion. Apparently, church and town clerks of the Massachusetts and Plymouth Bay Colony hid Irish names under English spellings or misspellings. On close study it appears that the names of the early arrivals, whether they were Irish, English or Scotch, were spelled phonetically. At least the misspellings on the early town and church records indicate this. In some cases this can be explained by the fact that many of those deported from Ireland spoke their native Irish language. Naturally it was difficult for their Puritan masters to understand their pronunciations. Hence on the Bradford records Mulligan is written Mulicken; on the Ipswich records McLaughlin is Claffin, Campbell is Campanall; Casey, Cresie; Hughes, Cues; O'Donnell, Dwinell; on the Andover records Coughlin becomes Coffering; Corcoran, Cockrin; Clark, Clerk; Kelly, Calley; Hagan, Agan; on the old Boston records, Murphy, Murphey; Sullivan, Silloway; Mahoney, Mahoone, and McCarthy, Macarta.

The first recorded deed in Suffolk county, Massachusetts, had Irishmen as principals and presents a fair sample of distortion of Irish names. It is dated January 25, 1640. The interpretation of the first two lines of the particular deed by the original copyist was as follows: "Be it known unto all men by these presen that I, John Iles of Katheropr in countye of Clone, husbandman." After a careful and laborious study of the above names, the writer traced the originator of the deed to County Clare, in Ireland. Katherope was found to be Carrigaholt, in the same county, not in Clone, and Iles is undoubtedly Hylle, which, in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries was the name of one of the most prominent families in Ireland.

By order of Cromwell and his hirelings, many Irishmen, women and children also, had their names deliberately changed by the English deportation commissioners at the booking offices and on board the ships before starting for America. In order to offer an explanation for this, the British slave-drivers evoked an old law of the fifteenth century, which required Irish people from certain parts of Ireland "to take the names of an English town, a trade, color, art or cult." Thus we find Irishmen in this country with the names of Dyer, Winchester, England, Ireland, Black, White, Wright, Green, etc. Of course, in those times the authorities of New England were in sympathy with the English authorities in this respect; moreover, the town and church clerks show by their records their impatience with the Gaelic spelling.

In some instances the Celtic temper and ability were aroused by this cavalier conduct. In 1654 two Irish servants, with the correctly spelled names of Philip Welch and William Downing, brought a case against their master, Samuel Symonds, alleging that they were taken from their beds at night in Ireland, brought to a seaport and compelled to go on board a vessel against their wills. It seems the men who kidnaped them, they were only boys at the time, were called "spirits" and made a practice of selling Irish youths and adults to captains of ships bound for America for the highest price they could get. Welch and Downing, cited above, were sold to Symonds on arrival at Boston and brought to Ipswick, where he forced them into an unnatural period of servitude. The writer in his researches has found several instances of Irish slavery in the Massachusetts and Plymouth colonies at this particular period. Another was the case of William Hiferney, who testified before the court at Plymouth that "He was stolen away from his country, brought hither, and sold to his master, John Hallet of Scituate for twelve years, when he was unacquainted with the English tongue." The court persuaded Hallet to take off two years from Hiferney's time "if he be faithful."

The early court records of Essex county also afford interesting reading to the student of the early history of the Irish in America; and the prevalence of Irish names in the Quarterly Sessions at Ipswich and Salem show that the race must have been prominent along the north shore from the first settlements. In those interesting days, Ipswich, as well as Salem, was an important fishing and commercial town. The inspection of the vital records of the former showed a surprisingly large number of Irish names, and they date from the first occupation of the settlement. Among the first entries of land grants is this one, dating from 1634: "Given and granted to Matthias Curren, twoo acres of Land lyinge unto his house on the est end thereof to him, his heirs and assigns." The same year Thomas Finnan was given 100 acres. On February 10, 1640, "the haye uppon Chebaco waye toward Labor in Vane Creek is granted to John Lee for this year only;" Edmund Dear (Dwyer) was a commoner in December, 1667: Thomas Lovell from Dublin, Ireland, was a resident in 1647; Hugh Sherrat (Sheridan?) was "granted a house lot on the point where he hath built a house;" Thomas Smith is "granted a planting lott beyond Muddy river, as it may be found after Goodman Cooley;" Michael Katherieke was "paide 32s for work done at the bridge and for carriage for the gun" on March 17, 1642 St. Patrick's day. This opens up a wide field of speculation. Andrew Diamond was a merchant and one of twenty-seven planters to have the honorary title of "Mr." affixed to his name.

From the birth records it appears that Michael Farley was born in the town August 2, 1686; John Buckley on May 8, 1660; Mary Clarke, daughter of Thomas, in 1669. From the marriage records of the seventeenth century it is clear that many Irish couples were joined in matrimony in Ipswich. Among the more distinctive names are: John Barry and Mary Chapman, January, 1676; James Collings (Collins) and Hannah Dutch, 1674; Michael Cresie (Casey) and Mary Quilter, April, 1660; John Downing and Mihitabel Brabrook, 1669; Thomas Hart and Mary Norton, October, 1664; Mary Hely (Healy) and John Ward, May, 1676. The writer found in the marriage records of Ipswich 160 names in which one or both parties to the contract had Irish names.

The researches into the older towns along the Merrimack river disclosed the same interesting facts. Even the settlements in the interior of the State were found to have a good proportion of Irish names on the church and town records. Up to the present time the fact that the Irish race was concerned in the development of these settlements has been only superficially considered.

The Irish influx into New England started with the landing of the Mayflower at Plymouth in 1620, and the Celts have come regularly into this part of the country ever since, notwithstanding at one period, court tirades issued against their coming by the savants of the Massachusetts colony influenced by a coterie of divines and elders of the established Congregational church. Of course on arrival in Boston, Plymouth, Salem and Ipswich they were asked to move on, to any old place, preferably to the vicinity of the Merrimack river, where there was much land "not occupied by any," as the order of 1634 had it.

There was a particularly good reason for directing the incoming Irish and Scotch emigrants to the vicinity of the Merrimack river. In those primitive days this river was the edge of the colony and various refractory hordes of Indians strayed every now and then down into the settlements seeking to gratify their repugnance for the newcomers. And it was fully well known, even in those benighted times, that the Irish were pretty good men to have nearby when a battle was to be fought. Winthrop, the Mathers, Endicott and other crafty politicians of the period knew this, and when the Celt came their action was decisive. They required the unwelcome immigrants from Erin to move to the confines of the settlements. Here their bravery would have an outlet and incidentally it would save the scalps of the Puritans. The elect in Boston, Ipswich, Salem and Gloucester would die with whole skins.

Books for the Camps

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

WE are in the midst of a drive for books for the camps and it is gratifying to see how finely the call has been answered. Visits to a dozen reasonably important libraries in a dozen places during the past month have shown me the same activity everywhere. Well-dressed women are willing to carry heavy packages of books to the library with their own hands, because of the underlying thought that thus they will help relieve the tedium of the soldiers' heavy hours. Wheelbarrows have been pressed into service, and in the smaller towns baby carriages have made excellent express wagons, either with or without living occupants. The huge heaps piled in the libraries show how thoroughly alive to this call the American public has been. Nothing but war could have evoked such a response.

To some people this appears an unmitigated good. Printed matter in book form, especially when bound in cloth, must, so they think, be of undoubted benefit to readers. Others, however, know that, so far from being an invariable good, books are often the source of much evil. Fiction, in particular, has been calculated of late to be anything but beneficial, and while frequently merely trivial, has very often, much more often, indeed, than most people think, been seriously harmful. With naturalism running riot in print, one would just as reasonably allow young persons to sample at will the bottles of a drug store, trusting that no harm would come to them, as to let them read indiscriminately the books that have been popular in recent years.

I have been wondering whether there is to be any censorship of this indiscriminate literature or whether it is to be dumped without further consideration into the libraries of the camps. I know the word censorship grates on many people in this country and is presumed to smack of medieval obscurantism and other supposedly undesirable things; but we are growing accustomed to the idea, and, what is more, are acquiescing in its practice. Our newspapers and magazines are subject to censorship, and we realize that it is right that they should be, and some of us think there should be more of it. The letters we receive from abroad have nearly all been opened and those we send are submitted to the same process. In general we have waked up to the fact that censorship may be necessary to prevent evil. The question is how far should it be extended.

I have a particular interest in this question, because I have accepted the request of a Government Bureau to talk to the young men of the camps on certain disease-dangers, which soldiers may encounter, and it has been suggested to me that the principles of morality and the practice of self-control should be the main burden of the lectures. One of the motives to be insisted on is the sense of duty. The soldiers are to be told that they are no longer their own masters, but are enlisted to do a great patriotic work; that for them to take any risks of being incapacitated for that service is to injure the cause; and that to do so deliberately is to fail in patriotism. The college athlete is supposed to conserve and foster his strength for the contest with the neighboring university; to break training or to indulge in dissipation is simply to invite disaster that will make it impossible for him properly to represent his college. The same holds true for the soldier; he must exercise self-control out of a sense of loyalty. Appeal is made to higher considerations also, but there is probably no motive more generally effective than the sense of duty and its proper accomplishment.

As a physician, I should like to know whether the soldiers, after I deliver one of these lectures, are to have the chance to undo whatever influence for good I may have exercised. This assuredly will be the case if they find at hand books that were deliberately written to make an appeal to the lower passions, novels that have been best-sellers mainly because they deal with forbidden subjects, books which, without describing, perhaps, any overt act of immorality, are occupied page after page with all sorts of immoral suggestions, Zola's works, for instance, De Maupassant's and those of other French writers, whose novels I should not care to advertise and whose popularity outside of France is due entirely to a sensuous appeal.

Among such books there are others published in America and in England that are too indecent to find their way into our libraries. Once more I prefer not to advertise them, but I saw many of them among the piles of books gathered for the soldiers. They make no pretense to be literary, artistic or biologic; they were written solely to make money by pandering to man's lower nature.

In one large city—let me hasten to add at once, so as to avoid misunderstanding, that it was not New York—I ventured to inquire whether there was to be any censorship exercised over the books destined for the soldiers. The lady who was occupied in receiving them assured me in what I suppose was her finest acid tone that she "hoped not." Her own attitude, she went on to say, was that "censorship of books did more harm than good." And then she gave me the principle that is supposed to be the guide in this matter. "The thing to do is to let young folk read whatever comes into their hands and depend on their own personalities to assimilate the good and eliminate the evil." The well-balanced sentence and the settled air of the reply made me feel that this question of censorship had come up and been determined in the negative by people who like polysyllabic words.

I ventured further to ask my librarian collector-friend, if I may call her so in spite of the acid tone, whether she believed in that same policy with regard to children's food, that is to say, whether she would advocate children being allowed to eat anything and everything with the assurance that their own nature would assimilate what was good for them and eliminate what was bad, and whether she could pursue that course with grown-ups. I was rather proud of being able to use her own polysyllabic words. She seemed rather surprised at the retort but far from being nonplussed, assured me without the slightest hesitation that she thought there was a great deal of fussing over children's food that did more harm than good. She believed that it would be better to let them eat more miscellaneously, and that as for herself, that was what she did. Fortunately she had a companion who occupied a chair near her in the collection department, who said to me at once. "Don't mind her. She hasn't any children!" and then after a pause, "She hasn't even a husband."

In spite of the determined views of the lady in question I sincerely hope that a sane censorship will be exercised over books destined for the soldiers. As a means of enabling them to practise self-control, we have banished from the vicinity of camps the more obvious sources of temptation. Logic and good-sense point to the necessity of eliminating the incitements to excess so luridly paraded in many of the books provided for their amusement. If this lesson were taken to heart and put into practice, not merely during the war, but later, in peace, it would be reckoned not the least among the profitable by-products of the war.

Roman Holidays

JOSEPH F. WICKHAM, M.A.

ROME will claim you a long time before she yields to you all her secrets, all the many fortunes that have been hers, all the glories and all the humiliations that centuries have heaped high upon her seven hills. But you will not spend many days in the Tiber city before you will catch glimpses darkly as through a cloud of the mystery and reverence and magnificence and enduring grandeur that cling to her monuments. Many a late afternoon you will go down to the Forum, and sitting at the base of some lonely column, you will grow weary trying to reconstruct Roman grandeur and re-awaken the choice and master spirits of a republican age or weave purple fabrics of a day when great Octavius passed through among the temples with the awed crowd parting the ways before the lictors of his train. You look about you amid the waste and wreckage of the centuries and try to imagine ancient Romans near the Temple of Concord and all the togaed figures passing in and out of the senate hall It is all not very clear now when the train of fancy is intercepted by a broken pilaster and the pitiful fragments of a once beauteous portico. But stay a moment, and you can hear the greatest orator since Demosthenes pleading for Roman honor, and the scornful tones of Mark Antony ringing down the colonnades of the centuries while the eager, sorrowful, vengeful, poverty-clad Roman mob views the dead body of its uncrowned king. The film dissolves, and there rise the ghosts of Pompey and Cataline and the blood-streaked faces of Alaric and the terrible Hun. And ever a throng of thousands troop back and forth in your dream, patricians or plebeians, Romans or barbarians. Gaul or Goth or Hun or Vandal, the background and foil of the glory of a single leader. Sometimes the master is Sulla, sometimes Titus, often the despised figure of the barbarian. Down by that saddened pillar you may see Horace arm in arm with friend Mæcenas, scanning to him the measures of a new ode or rehearsing the story of a ninth satire. You may be facing the Capitol, and you think of all the good and bad men who have climbed and descended the slopes. You think of Tarpeia and the Sabine men; and of Manlius and many another cast from the fateful rock to their deaths. Then you look in the direction of the Mamertine prison where Jugurtha languished, and all those Rome hated and reviled and persecuted.

For hours you may watch the procession of the past file by, while the sun sinks lower and lower, and the shadows of evening lengthen, and the stars and the moon beam forth in the blue Roman sky in all the glad loveliness of heaven. For it is down here that old Rome clusters. Then in the quiet night-time, when in some not distant piazza Italian song is filling the air, you will go down below the Forum, past all those sorrowful ruins, and see the grim old amphitheater, the Colosseum, bathed in whiteness and still with the stillness of death. The once marvelous building is an empty grey and brown shell now, shorn of most of its grandeur, the stone being used in the Middle Ages for the palaces of Rome. It was partially restored by the Popes of the nineteenth century, but as you look upon it now in the moonlight, you are glad that the old days are not restored when thousands of human beings died in its sands to delight the jaded senses of Roman civilization. As the moonlight works its magic with the past you can see across the centuries a huddled group of those who have chosen the Christ, waiting with eyes to Heaven the approach of the fierce beasts. Not long do they wait, but bravely breathe forth their lives to God amid the placid and indifferent smiles of Vestal virgins and the leering glance of a Roman emperor and the roaring jeers of half a hundred thousand citizens of Rome. Then you see the high tiers of seats gradually empty themselves, as the immense throngs, the blood-lust sated for the day, in steady stream pour out the gates and separate on the many roads leading away from the amphitheater; even now they have forgotten the white face of a tender maid and the holy resignation of an old man, whose broken and bruised forms yet lie on the blood-wet earth behind. You watch lordly patricians enter gilded litters and move away; and see haughty maidens passing merry banter with senators' sons; and all the multitude gayly dispersing to the Forum or the baths or the cool shades of a waiting home. Over against the high walls of the Colosseum a pitiful little band will gather, come in, perhaps, from along the Appian Way, a group of Christians weeping for a friend, poor martyrs-elect wailing a martyred fellow. You dispel the mirage and go away, and wonder how long the old pile will rear its majesty in the ages and ages to come.

So it is that you try to call to life the atmosphere of dead days and breathe the aroma of departed dynasties. One day you will visit the palace that knew Augustus, and on another will look upon the Circus Maximus and wonder where the chariots used to pile up in a tangled mass of steeds and men, groaning and quivering in the throes of death. And again you will stand near the crumbling walls of Servius Tullius wishing that you could win the confidence of the old heap of bricks and hear from them all the strange tales of laughter and tears that they have heard and told to their mother earth. A varied story it would be, of virtue and simplicity and wealth and oppression, and death at the last. And then when you have seen it all, all the monuments left by the followers of that old-time little band of shepherds from Alba Longa, and have contemplated long enough the ashes of the imperial torch that flamed in splendor, that for a space flickered and fitfully gleamed, that finally burned itself out in passion and pagan desire, when you have seen it all, and paid your tribute to Cæsar, you will feel a strange satisfaction. For you have gathered up the memories and tangled bits of chronicle and have woven for yourself the tapestry of the centuries; and have strengthened poetic fancy with the sight of the forlorn wreckage of long ago. All the better will you now appreciate the charm, the fascination, the romance of the nineteen Christian centuries that meet you today across the old yellow Tiber upon the gentle slopes of the Vatican hill. For imperial Rome is but half the story. Rome is as well the City of the Popes. And it is on the Vatican hill that Rome gives you from out her heart of hearts her fullest expression and the purest beauty of her eternal soul.

COMMUNICATIONS

Letters, as a rule, should not exceed six hundred words

Mother Seton's Baptism

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have received from the Rev. Dr. C. L. Souvay, C.M., of Kenrick Seminary, the following communication concerning the missing records of Mother Seton's Baptism and formal reception into the Church:

> Your communication in the issue of AMERICA for April 6 about the fact and date of Mother Seton's Baptism in the Catholic Church came most timely for me, just the day after I received a request to clear, if possible, several difficulties.
> The root of one of these difficulties is that Ash Wednesday can never come later than March 10, and, as a matter of fact, in 1805, Ash Wednesday fell not on March 14, as Dr. White wrote, nor even on March 13, as you seem to believe, but on February 27, Easter being, that year, on April 14. My authority for this is the "Ordo Perpetuus Divini Officii juxta Ritum Breviarii ac Missalis Sanctae Romanae Ecclesiae," by a Benedictine of St. Maur, issued at Dijon in 1759, and giving the ecclesiastical calendar for the years 1758-1900.
> You say in the communication referred to above: "Dr. White quotes Mrs. Seton twice in recording this event as happening on Ash Wednesday, March 14, 1805." This is putting it excellently, for whilst, on the one hand, Dr. White records the event as happening on Ash Wednesday, March 14, 1805, Mother Seton, in the quotations which he adduced never says so much explicitly. She tells indeed in a sentence which you quote after Dr. White, how she went to St. Peter's Church on Ash Wednesday; again on page 156 (tenth edit., 1904), she informs Father Cheverus that, on March 14 her soul "offered all its hesitations and reluctancies a sacrifice on the altar . . . and the next day was admitted to the true Church of Jesus Christ"; but it is remarkable that she does not say in the first place that Ash Wednesday was March 14; nor does she in the second place say that March 14 was Ash Wednesday; and, moreover, the inscription written by her on the copy of A-Kempis presented by her to Anthony Filicchi whilst bearing the date, March 14, makes no reference to that day being Ash Wednesday. The identification of the two days seems to be therefore Dr. White's: and it is visibly an unfortunate slip, which all historians have since repeated slavishly.
> The date of Ash Wednesday, 1805, being kept before the mind, and the statements of Mother Seton, as given by Dr. White being given their full value, here is how I would be inclined to sum up briefly the events of that momentous period of her life:
> Shortly after January 6, 1805, she unsuccessfully sought an interview with Father O'Brien (White, p. 148); Jan.-Feb.: letter to Father Cheverus, and reply of the latter (White, p. 149); letter of Bishop Carroll to Filicchi (White, pp. 149-151; Feb. 27 (Ash Wednesday); goes to St. Peter's (White, p. 152); March 14-15: abjuration and profession of faith (White, p. 153, note); a few days before March 25: Confession. Speaking of Confession, she says: "It is done—easy enough. . . . (White, p. 153); and of Communion: "I count the days and hours. . . ." (p. 154). March 25: First Communion.
> It seems to me to stand to reason that Father O'Brien could not receive her abjuration and profession of faith on the very day she definitely and irrevocably made up her mind to become a Catholic (Ash Wednesday, February 27). A few days must quite naturally intervene; and, as I read Dr. White (leaving aside, of course, his mistaken chronological identification), I find just two weeks, a reasonable period. The above inferences, based on the correct dating of that Ash Wednesday, and Mother Seton's unimpeachable statement she was "presented to the Church the 14th of March," seem to impose themselves. Well deduced as they appear to be, I should like, however, to see them confirmed by some text of Mother Seton or of her correspondents, and do not despair to find sooner or later such texts in existence.
> Was she baptized in the Catholic Church? Your careful examination of St. Peter's baptismal register was not, in my view of the event, a fruitless task. For the silence of that register finds its natural and adequate explanation, I think, in the regulations of the first Synod of Baltimore (1791). Mrs. Seton was apparently not baptized in the Catholic Church, nor were even the ceremonies of Baptism supplied. Such was the practice with regard to converts whose Baptism in an heretical sect was considered valid. That the Protestant Episcopal Baptism was then regarded valid by Church authorities, I find two warrants in Dr. White's work. The first is in Bishop Carroll's letter, quoted on pages 149-150: "Her great business now should be . . . to revive in her heart the grace of her Baptism" (page 150). No one who did not believe in the validity of Mrs. Seton's Episcopal Baptism could write this sentence. The second warrant, perhaps still stronger, is in Father Cheverus' letter of January 26, 1806, about Cecilia Seton's sickness: "Your beloved sister has been made by Baptism a member of the Church" (p. 185); and so strong was his persuasion of the validity of Miss Seton's Baptism, that he opened the suggestion of her receiving "the Sacraments," meaning, as his words on pages 184-185 unmistakably indicate, Holy Communion and Extreme Unction. No Baptism, nor even the supplying of the ceremonies, having taken place, there was no call for any entry in the register. It is somewhat disappointing to learn that no baptismal entry has been found in the Trinity Church (Protestant Episcopal) register. But is it certain that Eliza A. Bayley was baptized at Trinity Church? Why not at St. Paul's or St. George's? For is it known in what (Episcopal) parish the Bayleys lived in August, 1774? Is it certain even that she was baptized in New York?
> I trust, dear sir, you will kindly pardon this lengthy communication, for the sake of the saintly person whom we both so much admire. Further research, however, will be needed, both in Mother Seton's letters and in the church registers: v. g., ascertaining the silence of these registers on the Catholic Baptism of Cecilia Seton, of Harriet Seton later on at Emmitsburg, and of Mrs. Seton's own children: also hunting up the entry of the Baptism of them all in the Protestant Episcopal Church.

No doubt further investigation along the lines suggested by Dr. Souvay will bring to light the required data concerning this important chapter of Mother Seton's career.

Prohibition, the Constitution, the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Your issue of December 29, 1917, in which you refer to my work, "American Civil Church Law" has come to my notice. What you say there is absolutely correct. My attention has just been called, however, to the fact that some other Catholic paper has broadened what I have said, and this cannot but lead to error as applied to most Western States. As I do not know the name of this other paper I take the liberty to take this matter up with you.

Ever since the days of the Civil War Congress in passing "enabling acts" has imposed as a condition precedent on the conventions called to formulate the Constitutions of the new States to provide by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of the new State, that "perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and no inhabitant of said State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship." With such a compact Arizona, Idaho, Nevada, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Washington, Wyoming, Colorado, Montana, Oklahoma and Nebraska have come into the Union.

The cause has to my knowledge never come before the courts for decision. It would seem, however, to admit of no doubt that the use of wine for sacramental purposes is a "mode of religious worship," on account of which no inhabitants of the States named can be molested in person or property. Such use would further seem to be embraced by the term "religious sentiment" whose perfect toleration is secured by the clause. It would follow that if one church desires to use wine for sacramental purposes while another prefers grape juice, the perfect toleration secured for the States named would prevent the authorities from allowing use or importation in the one case and disallowing it in the other.

I notice that the Bishop in connection with whom this matter has arisen lives in Oklahoma. His case may therefore well present an opportunity to get this matter before the United States Supreme Court for decision. It would probably be worth while since not less then twelve States are involved.

Chicago. CARL ZOLLMANN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The discussion that has been going on in AMERICA concerning the Mass and prohibition has been of such timely interest to my class and to myself that we have been interrogating one another in words somewhat like these: Am I a citizen of Massachusetts or a citizen of the United States who lives in Boston? Mr. Wilson in his "State and Federal Governments of the United States," on page 49, section 84, answers the question thus:

> Whoever possesses citizenship in this country is a citizen both of the United States and of the State in which he lives. He cannot be a citizen of the United States alone, or only of a State; he must be a citizen of both or of neither: the two parts of his citizenship cannot be separated.

If, then, I am a citizen of both the State in which I live and of the United States, which citizenship is superior? The book quoted above, on page 50, supplies me with matter that throws some light on this second question:

> Only Federal law admits to formal citizenship, and only formal citizenship can give to anyone, wherever he may go, a right to the privileges and immunities of citizenship. . . . In transferring his State citizenship a citizen does not, of course, at all affect his citizenship of the United States.

So from the formal cause of my citizenship, the Federal law, and from the right which citizenship under the above law gives to exercise the privileges of citizenship in any State of the Union, subject, of course, to the State laws, governing length of residence, etc., I am right in concluding that my citizenship in the United States is superior to my citizenship in any State of this Union.

But as I still retain my twofold citizenship no matter where I go in the United States am I under double responsibilities? Hear Mr. Wilson, again:

> The responsibilities of citizenship, too, are both double and direct. . . . Every citizen must obey both Federal law and the law of his own State. His citizenship involves direct relations with the authorities of both parts of the government of the country, and connects him with the power of the marshals of the United States as with the power of the sheriff of his own county.

If, then, I am bound by the laws and the Constitution of both the United States and the State in which I live and there should arise a conflict between the claims of one and the claims of the other, which must I obey? Article 6 of the Constitution of the United States tells me:

> This constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and judges in every state shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any state to the contrary notwithstanding.

Suppose there was no such provision as Article 6 of the Constitution, is there anything in the Federal Constitution that would embarrass me were I to go to Oklahoma? Yes, there is. Article 4, section 2 of the Federal Constitution reads: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States."

At present I may go to Mass in Massachusetts, but could I enjoy the same blessing in Oklahoma?

Now from what has been said above may I not conclude that to put even a straw in the way of anyone who wishes to practise his religion, in a manner in keeping with his rights as a citizen of the United States, is unconstitutional?

Senator Poindexter and the American Patriots

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have a letter from Mr. Joseph Forrester, counselor-at-law, 35 Nassau Street, New York City, calling attention to an article in your issue of April 13 in which a certain society publishes my name as one of its Vice-Presidents in connection with certain resolutions which it is said to have adopted against the Catholic religion.

I repudiate utterly any connection or sympathy with any such movement. It is utterly abhorent to me and in that connection I ask leave to enclose herewith copies of letters I have just written on the subject which you are at liberty to make use of in any way you see fit.

United States Senate. MILES POINDEXTER.

Congressman Crisp and the American Patriots

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have received several letters, stating that in the issue of your paper for April 13, there was a statement that I was Vice-President of a Society called "American Patriots." I am not a member of the society, and never authorized my name to be used as a Vice-President. I would be glad for you to make this correction.

House of Representatives. C. R. CRISP.

[The item in which Senator Poindexter's and Congressman Crisp's names appeared was taken from the Buffalo Union and Times under date of March 21. The "American Patriots" held two meetings in Buffalo, under the leadership of Jay W. Forrest, a well-known anti-Catholic lecturer. At the second meeting Forrest read to the assemblage the name of the Vice-Presidents of the association. The name of Senator Poindexter is twenty-first on the list, that of Congressman Crisp, twenty-fifth. It gives AMERICA great pleasure to be the instrument for the removal of their names from the dismal litany. Only Mr. Jay W. Forrest can explain how their names were used in such a connection.—Ed. AMERICA.]

Human Respect

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of April 6 a complaint is made by T. M. M. of an apparent incivility on the part of a member of the Fold, who "is also a Knight of Columbus." I think I can readily explain the action, or inaction, of this particular Knight. When T. M. M. crossed the street, as he seems to have done, the battle-light was in his eye, and this ignited the fighting spirit in the soul of the other, so there was no salute. This explanation is based on my own experience with some students of Catholic colleges. Whenever I have met them with a challenging scowl, I have usually been paid back in kind. As the old saying has it, "Scowl and the world scowls with you." Or, it may have been that the uncivil Knight had not paid his pew rent, and he thought that a forcible collection was threatened.

The Chapel at Annapolis

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Permit me to supplement my letter to AMERICA of April 6, "The Chapel at Annapolis," with a word of explanation. "Just where the blame lies is hard to say," may lead some to a misinterpretation of actual conditions or of my meaning.

There was no intention of blaming the authorities at the Naval Academy. Catholics have no grievance whatever against them. I have learned also, lately, that his Eminence Cardinal Gibbons has experienced only the utmost liberality and courtesy from the local authorities at Annapolis, towards the Catholic midshipmen, in the matter of the exercise of their religion.

My real purpose in writing my last letter was to arouse, if possible, Catholic benevolence in behalf of the erection of a chapel. I should be very sorry indeed if what I wrote were regarded as in the least degree disparaging to the excellent spirit of fair-play shown us by the naval authorities at Annapolis.

The Celt in America

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a letter for your issue of April 13 Mr. M. J. O'Donohue shows that common-sense is wholly compatible with the treatment of Irish history and Irish-American social problems. Would that the "high Irish" throughout the country understood their possibilities as he presents them!

Heartily endorsing his assertions to the effect that self-respecting, cultured gentlemen of Irish blood are ornaments in any social gathering, I beg to make a few observations on the contents of his communication. He writes: "Those who crawl on all fours to gain an entrée into 'society' are not Irish and their influence can never interfere with the spread of Catholic ideals, one way or the other." Perhaps Mr. O'Donohue meant that such persons are not true to the Irish ideal. If he had heard a few of the humiliating stories that have been bandied about Eastern cities of the social exploits of a certain type of poorly educated Irish-Americans he would, I think, emphatically insist that some Irish do crawl on all fours to gain an entrée into non-Catholic society and by their readiness to compromise all that is Catholic and Irish have won the disdain of many American society people for the race which could lead American thought. Irish have made a sad show of themselves at Harvard and other vestibules to non-Catholic society.

If Father Ryan meant that Catholic Irish without education are better off without money, he merits no contradiction. He has had example enough in New York of boors from the bogs of Ireland riding on horseback. In New York and Philadelphia the bulk of the well-to-do Irish-American families are not educating their children in classical Catholic colleges. The leaders of the Sein Fenn movement in Ireland itself have commanded respect because they possessed the education expected of gentlemen. There is no sense in talking culture to men who do not understand the meaning of the word. And the majority of the descendants of the Irish peasant class in this country will not know the meaning of the word until they have received a thorough classical education. Then, those who now have the woful ability to let all the world know that they are Irish will be able to employ other criterions in their social intercourse than the gold standard. I agree with Mr. O'Donohue's assertion that social position should be gained by blood and culture. But, we should face the fact that the Irish who are making the most noise are decidedly lacking in culture. One of the first missions of the modern American Celt should be to teach some of the moneyed Irish that although money talks, it is not always respected. Then, they might think it worth while to educate their sons and daughters in Catholic colleges and not make themselves a mockery by forcing the children into non-sectarian establishments while they flaunt their vulgarities before the society editors of newspapers and the lackeys of fashionable clubs.

British War Aims

To the Editor of AMERICA:

After reading Mr. Culeman's able commentary upon the Lenten Pastoral of the Cardinal of Westminster, in a recent issue of AMERICA, the impulse was strong to write to you. For simultaneously with the arrival of that issue of AMERICA there came to hand some long delayed copies of the little Chestertonian journal, the New Witness, in one of which, the number of January 31, the war aims of the able body of men who edit the paper were stated. Like the Cardinal they recognize the causes of the social upheaval which threatens; but the remedy they suggest is more far-reaching and more radical than the demands of the British Labor party as stated by Mr. Culeman.

Their war aims are sixteen in number; eight tending toward freedom in Europe, and a like number toward freedom in England. It is with the latter that I am concerned. The idea underlying their aims might be said to be the thesis of Mr. Belloc's book, "The Servile State." They recognize that England, by a mass of social legislation passed immediately before and on the pretext of the war is fast tending toward that condition of society which Mr. Belloc has called servile. They aim at defeating this tendency by restoring personal property to the poor and personal freedom to the family. And for the attainment of their object they aim at the repeal of all this mass of obnoxious legislation; at the restoration of the rights of the trades unions in which they see the germ of the old gild system; and at the destruction of the trusts. They favor moreover a policy of protection of small property which they think should be given artificial assistance like an infant industry.

To Mr. Culeman, "It is becoming increasingly evident that the really big and permanent results of the war will be social rather than political": so to the editors of the New Witness "Victory is chiefly valuable in order to strip the present approximate model of servile State of its huge prestige of success."

Their program of reform is probably less likely to be adopted than that of the British Labor party. It is inevitable that the legislators, concerned only with devising momentary remedies for difficulties as they arise, will attempt a compromise. But that in no way affects the excellence of the policy they advocate, which at heart is really an attempt to restore the Catholic tradition to England.

Prior McNabb has seen fit to encourage and follow them. Would our own Catholic sociologists be willing to go as far? We are inclined to think so. Ten years ago, when Dr. Ryan advocated a living wage and an eight-hour day, there were those who sniffed and thought they smelled Socialism, but the outbreak of the war found the Doctor declaring himself for "the direct ownership of . . . the instruments of production by the workers themselves by such methods as copartnership schemes and cooperative societies." And it is only a few weeks since Father Husslein sang the praises of the gild system and ended with a prayer of hope for its return.

Christ's Cross in France

IT is one of the bewildering reversals of human plans that the very country which tried to banish the Cross from its midst, not at the instance of its devoted people, but by the impious decree of an unrepresentative Government, should in the event have become the instrument to restore that Cross to its ancient place of honor and to impress its image indelibly on the mind of the entire world. Not only has France summoned the nations who love Christian principles to resist on the soil of St. Louis the tide of oppression which threatened to sweep over the earth, not only has France inspired others with her own characteristic recklessness of the cost and her own passion to die for Christian liberty, but she has lifted, these three years and a half, the eyes and the thoughts and the hearts of many millions of men of many nations to the symbol of man's redemption and the figure of the desolate Christ dying that others might live. This fact is strikingly attested by an eye-witness in the April number of the Atlantic Monthly:

> The war on the Western Front has been fought in a Roman Catholic country, where crucifixes are erected at all the chief cross-roads to remind us that, in every moment of doubt as to the way of life and on whichever road we finally decide to walk, whether rough or smooth, we shall need the Saviour and His redeeming love. We have seen a cross so often when on the march, or when passing down some trench, that it has become inextricably mixed up with the war. When we think of the great struggle, the vision of the cross rises before us; and when we see the cross we think of the processions of the wounded men who have been broken to save the world. Whenever we have laid a martyred soldier to rest we have placed over him, as the comment on his death, a simple white cross which bears his name. We never paint any tribute on it. None is needed, for nothing else can speak so eloquently as a cross—a white cross. White is the sacred color in the army today, and the cross is the sacred form. In after years there will never be any doubt as to where the line of liberty ran that held back the flood and force of German tyranny. From the English Channel to Switzerland it is marked for all time by the crosses of the graves of the British and the French soldiers.

Since these words were written our own brave boys have taken their place in the line and by the shedding of their blood in the cause of humanity have earned their right to be laid to rest in the same glorious line of heroes and to have their graves marked by the same sacred symbol. American soldiers no less than the British and the French are finding strength to "carry on," to the very end, in the contemplation of the supreme self-sacrifice of the God-man. They, too, like their brethren in arms are being silently taught the correct interpretation of life and the difference between the sordidness of selfish indulgence and the sublimity of self-immolation; to them no less than to others the Cross of Christ is telling its compelling lesson of nobility. Wherever they are, the crucifix rises behind their lines, meeting their eyes at dawn, soothing them at night, and guarding the heroes of No Man's Land. Doubtless they are growing familiar with it, as the British with the Cross at Neuve Chapelle:

> For three years, night and day, Christ has been standing there in the midst of our soldiers, with arms outstretched in blessing. They have looked up at Him through the clear starlight of a frosty night; and they have seen His pale face by the silvery rays of the moon as she has sailed her course through the heavens. In the gloom of a stormy night they have seen the dark outline and caught a passing glimpse of Christ's effigy by the flare of the star-shells.

No doubt one of the keenest regrets of the British in abandoning Neuve Chapelle during the recent German advance was the loss of this well-loved and familiar companion of their vigils and struggles. It was not hard to stifle their groans when they looked up through the gathering mist of death at the brave Christ: with His promise of Paradise they could laugh in their hearts in spite of the anguish; it was a glorious thing to think that like Him and near Him, laying down their lives for their friends, they were going to the Lord whom they knew so well and in whose Kingdom pain and sorrow are no more. God grant that soon they may win back their Cross and that our soldiers may be with them, and learn, both at Neuve Chapelle and elsewhere, something of the Cross's mystery, its tenderness and its glory.

The Mother and the "Middy"

AMONG the communications which appeared in the last issue of AMERICA one signed by the simple initials A. C. M. should not pass unnoticed. It comes from the mother of a "middy" at Annapolis. In a few heartfelt words she earnestly pleads for greater spiritual advantages for the Catholic boys now preparing themselves for their country's service in the Naval Academy. In every word of the short letter, together with the pride which a mother feels in giving her boy to the country, we read the deep and tender concern she feels for the soul of the young "middy." Speaking for herself and for the Catholic mothers who like her have offered the best they have, their sons, to the land which in the hour of trial needs their pure and sturdy manhood, she says:

We are second to none in the love of our country. We are proud to have our sons, all our sons, in her service; but our duty does not cease here. We have still to see that they come out of Annapolis, where they receive a splendid technical education and a discipline that spells character and manhood, with a religious faith as undimmed as the faith they had when they entered.

The heart of a devoted patriot and a true Catholic mother reveals itself in these lines. Two of the noblest emotions that stir the soul, patriotism and religion are admirably expressed. Her just pride in her boy's self-dedication to the land of his birth and the traditions of a navy that boasts of such honored names, as Barry and Lawrence, Decatur and Farragut, Preble and Perry, is equaled, surpassed, even, as it must reasonably be, by her anxiety for his spiritual needs and welfare. She expects that while serving his country he may have every just and reasonable opportunity to practise the lessons of his Faith and to serve God.

To every Catholic mother the words of the unknown mother of the Annapolis "middy" should make their eloquent appeal. Like her they should value above all things the faith of their sons. That faith should be their first concern. It should be the first thing they look to when they decide on the school or the college where their boys are to be trained for the duties, the sacrifices and the heroisms of life. The faith of their sons, the preservation of their purity and innocence, and of the high standards of virtue taught them by the religion of their fathers should take precedence of everything else. Rank, social prestige, wealth, success, such as the world understands it, must give way when there is question of preserving that which is their noblest heritage and treasure. Unconsciously the "middy's" mother has driven home a salutary and important lesson. It must be added with regret that the lesson is sometimes unheeded. But it is never neglected without the most disastrous results. It is to prevent these that a truly Catholic mother has so earnestly pleaded that the son whom she has so far lovingly trained in the teaching of his Faith may have every opportunity of practising it in a great national institution. She realizes also that the better Catholic the young middy is the better officer will he be of the gallant navy of the United States.

Slang's Eloquent Intonations

"I LOVE that American word, 'sure,'" remarked an English officer engaged in war work over here. "There is something so intimate, so encouraging about it, even if nothing happens." To give a hearer the feeling of comfort and security which that observant soldier received from the word, "Sure" must be uttered, however, with a certain unmistakable intonation. We have all heard the term used in this way a thousand times. "Will the 12.50 be on time today?" we ask the railroad official apprehensively. "Sure!" he answers, with such an air of heartiness and finality that even the fact that the train in question eventually arrives some forty minutes late hardly ruffles our peace of soul. The official's "Sure!" was so full of certainty.

"All right" is another Americanism into which the intonation can throw a world of meaning. "John Smith is a-l-l right!" when said by an expert wielder of slang is as good as a patent of nobility for John, and seems to be equivalent to a solemn oath that he possesses all the Christian virtues. A certain Muscovite who has as yet but an imperfect grasp of our idiom, nevertheless has learned to use the slang phrase "Good-night!" with such a wonderful variety of intonations that he can express with it every ripple of grief, disappointment, surprise, discouragement or chagrin that ruffles his soul. When an American soldier-boy speaks of his sweetheart as "Some girl!" there is really nothing more to be said in praise of her beauty, wit, accomplishments and virtues. For in their fondness for expressing the highest commendation by means of understatement Americans resemble the English tourist, who on beholding for the first time Chamouni at sunrise, remarked deprecatingly, "Not so bad," whereat his fellow-countryman turned on him fiercely and said: "Well, you needn't rave about it like a bally poet." "What do you know about that!" is another exclamation which, when used by a really amazed or astonished American seems to be equivalent to the medieval "Odds Bodikins!" the Homeric "O Poppoi!" or the "Mediusfidius!" of the Romans.

The more limited and impoverished a person's vocabulary is, the greater, as a rule, is his dependence on slang as a medium of expression. Among the unlettered a current slang phrase is forced to bear in the course of the day a thousand different significations, and it is chiefly by the effective use of intonations that the speaker's meaning is conveyed to his hearers. Even men and women of reading and education, however, who have at their command the store of synonyms and antonyms the English language is so rich in, are sometimes tempted either from sheer laziness or out of an immoderate love for picturesque and vigorous neologisms to make quite as free a use of slang in conversation as do their less literate fellow-countrymen, whose varied way of stressing a dozen slang phrases serves sufficiently well for them the purposes of human intercourse. But something more, surely, than the skilful use of slang is to be expected of those who are supposed to have trained and cultivated minds.

"Ali Babette"

THE war has worked wonders not wrought in blood; it has written other hymns than those of hate; it has lifted up souls where it has beaten down bodies; in spite of its slimy trail it has purified those who were less than the dust. Scribner's for May illustrates this by a story remarkable for its artistry but more so because it reaches to the very heart of truth.

The scene is a barracks somewhere in France. The soldiers, the rank and file, are rude men with rude amusements, chief among them being a ribald phonograph record sung by a girl whose name is a public scandal bandied over the wine cups of the world. They have little use for religion and less for their chaplain; but with innate chivalry they respect the purity which is a stranger to themselves, and reverence with a reverence akin to worship, the very path of a modest Sister, who goes through the streets with her flock of orphans, chastising by her presence their unguarded tongues to silence.

One day the curé, an aged recluse, a strange relic of a departed civilization, calls on the major to make a request. Sister Thérèse is his interpreter. The old priest spies the phonograph and with the childishness of age begs to hear it. The first chance record is put on to the horror of the officers, who, recognizing it at once, spring to stop it. But the curé, not understanding the words, insists on its being finished, and listens as one rapt. The reason for his delight is soon made clear. "Why, daughter," he cries with joy, "it is your voice that sings from the wood." "Yes, Father," she answers. The officers begin to protest, but Sister Thérèse interrupts: "No, gentlemen, it is I who sing those words." And then, by way of explanation not of excuse, she adds with the eloquence of simplicity: "It was before the war."

There were no Pharisees among the officers, and no sanctimonious Simon, and their respect grows rather than diminishes. They saw, even without the assurance of Christ, that many sins had been forgiven her because she loved much, and they remembered that the one who stood closest, after the Blessed Mother, to the Cross on Calvary, was she out of whom seven devils had been cast. It was the horrors of Louvain, as of old the coldness of Magdala, which first purged her soul of its dross in the crucible of sorrow. Then she came back to Christ, bringing her love, not always innocent, but washed clean of its stains in the blood of the Lamb. The story is only fiction, but fiction, could the truth be told, less strange than fact. So it is that God knows how to draw good out of evil.

Our Vital Farm Problem

THE existing scarcity of food has been accentuated, but can hardly be said to have been caused by the war. It is due in great measure to our almost criminal neglect of the farming population of our States. We have been paying extravagant prices for farm products, but too often little more than an infinitesimal portion of the profit has gone to the farmer. Dr. Frederic C. Howe points out that the lettuce on our table may sometimes have cost us 2,900 per cent of what the farmer received for it. There were many causes which conspired to bring about these results. One was the natural tendency of the railways to favor the longer hauls. Thus Dr. Howe tells us:

> Apples, which the farmers of New York are ready and eager to sell for $2.50 a barrel, rotted on the ground fifty or a hundred miles from the city, while carloads of Western apples are sold at prices prohibitive to the poor. Peaches, pears and other fruits find the city markets closed against them, while Florida, Maryland and distant producers secure cars and buyers in abundance.

While farmers were driven from their farms in the East, the transportation agencies held the same power of life or death over the more distant cultivators, not to mention the grievance of the consumer and the intense suffering caused to the poor. Favoritism likewise could be shown by side-tracking cars, or neglecting entire sections of farming lands. Many of these evils have been remedied, and all, it would seem, could be set aside by an ideal government control or even government ownership of the railroads. The danger, however, always remains that such control and ownership may be far from ideal. No one can question its wonderful success in Germany before the war, nor its absolute failure in France at the same period. Yet government supervision of some kind there certainly must be. Simply to leave the farmer to his fate is to leave the country to destruction.

We have to some extent met the abuses of railroads, storage combines and middlemen which threatened to make of farming, in some portions of the country, an almost impossible means of livelihood. Much still remains to be done in these regards, but we must likewise offer positive encouragement and assistance to the farmer if we wish to consult not his advantage alone, but the welfare of the entire community. Thus Denmark and Australia have set an example by lending money to him at reasonable rates. Had America done this in the case of the great immigrant population that has yearly entered her ports, while not neglecting to secure for our farm produce the proper transportation and distribution, there would have been no food scarcity to be dreaded. Laudable efforts have been made in this direction, but we were very late to enter upon the way of progress, while Reiffeisen banks and excellent credit systems, so essential to agricultural development, had been long ago established in other countries.

The inadequate provision made for the farming population of the United States has helped to augment the yearly emigration of thousands of them to the neighboring Canadian farm lands.

The fear of insufficient returns from their labors has of late deterred men from seeking to make arable the still untilled lands of our country. To remedy this condition the State of California has set itself the task of preparing a number of farms, erecting the necessary buildings and constructing upon each a modest modern dwelling house. When completed the entire estate is to be offered at cost price. Nothing more is asked in cash payment than an installment of one-third of the outlay. The remaining two-thirds can then be paid after twenty-five and thirty-six years, respectively. If an adequate credit system is at the same time developed, a deserving immigrant, who has come to us from the farm lands of Europe, endowed with skill, strength and industry, but without material means, can thus be offered a pleasant and comfortable home. In place of adding to the industrial confusion on the return of peace and swelling, it may be, the ranks of malcontents and revolutionaries, he will have a chance to become of the highest service to the commonwealth.

Daughters of France

ACCORDING to a statement made by Dr. Lyman P. Powell, president of Hobart College and chairman of the committee on War Problems of the Association of American Colleges, fifty institutions of learning in the United States have offered to furnish scholarships to young women sent to this country by the schools and colleges of France. The United States Bureau is co-operating with the Association of American Colleges in the furtherance of the plan.

The United States cannot do too much for the daughters of France. Like their fathers and brothers who bore the brunt of the fighting at the Marne and at Verdun and are now with their Allies holding back the onrolling tide of German invasion on the Lys and the Somme, like their mothers, who have so cheerfully faced the privations and the sacrifices of the last four years, they have been the admiration of the whole world. They have been the worthy daughters of these heroic fathers and mothers. But if they have given to the world the example of devotion, loyalty and complete forgetfulness of self, it is because they drew their inspiration from the Catholic Faith in which they were bred.

We are proud to open to these daughters of the land of St. Louis and Jeanne d'Arc the gates of our universities and schools. There is nothing in the United States that is too good for them. They will be welcome and honored guests. Every genuine American will consider himself their champion and their knight. Every facility will be gladly given them to train their keen minds and their generous hearts in the sciences, the arts, the industries of the country.

But these daughters of heroic France are Catholics. The Catholic Faith has been the glory and the pride of their fathers in the past. If at times those fathers seemed to forget it, now in the midst of the smoke and fire and blood of the battlefield they realize that the old Faith is the one thing that nerves their arm and steels their heart in the titanic struggle. These French girls need the lessons and the restraints of that Catholic Faith. They are generous, high-minded, mercurial, emotional, enthusiastic, bright, pleasure-loving and gay. Under the sure guidance of the Catholic Church their souls reach a height of devotion and idealism, a spirit of sacrifice seldom surpassed. The Catholic Church brings out to perfection all the inherent nobility of their nature. The Catholic Church alone can curb their defects and their shortcomings. She alone can successfully tame their impulsive and high-strung souls. It is in the Catholic Church alone that the French girl and the French woman feel at home. The Catholic Church alone satisfies the noblest and the purest yearnings of her soul.

It will be a gross injustice, therefore, if, when these Catholic maids of France come to the United States, they are debarred from the benefits of a Catholic education. It would be unfair to them. It would deprive them of the one educational advantage they need most, the teaching of the Faith in which they were baptized, and whose lessons they learned in the little hamlets of Normandy under the shadows of old cathedral walls now perhaps a mass of tragic ruins, by the banks of the Loire or on the hillsides of Burgundy. It would be a grievous insult to the Catholics of our country should they have any reason to suspect that any effort was made to ignore Catholic academies or colleges when there is a question of selecting for our welcome French guests the institutions where they are to be educated and trained. Only there will these daughters of France feel themselves thoroughly at home. Only in Catholic schools and colleges will they develop to full bloom the noble qualities of their race. The future mothers of Catholic France must not by any measure countenanced by the Catholics of the United States be deprived of the benefits and the blessings of a Catholic education.

KEATS'S "ANNUS MIRABILIS"

"I THINK I shall be among the English poets after my death," was the prophecy John Keats once made regarding his own future renown. He was right and the place he attained is a high one, for Matthew Arnold and other keen critics do not hesitate to place the author of the "Ode to a Nightingale" near Shakespeare himself. It is the work of the year 1819 that did most to win this "Cockney poet" his deathless fame. For between January and September of that year, when he was only twenty-four, and had but a year or two left to live, Keats wrote the seven perfect, completed poems that have given him his place among English bards. January, 1819, marks the date that the graceful poem entitled "Fancy" was composed. "The Eve of St. Agnes" seems to have been finished soon after the preceding, and the coming of spring helped to inspire Keats with the three incomparable odes "To Melancholy," "To a Grecian Urn" and "To a Nightingale." That perfect lyric "La Belle Dame Sans Merci" was also written in the spring of 1819, and September of the same year saw the beautiful "Ode to Autumn" completed. Keats wrote other fine poems, of course, during this period and before it, but the seven named above, composed during 1819, are all so complete and so free from imperfections that they prove that he was a poet of almost the first rank.

The careful biography of "John Keats" recently published by Scribner's shows that Sir Sidney Colvin has mastered every detail of the poet's life which tireless labor and research could discover and he gives besides so much valuable information regarding the circumstances under which each of his subject's poems was written, that every admirer of Keats will doubtless read the biography with keen interest. During his youthful days John Keats thoroughly steeped himself in the spirit of the great Elizabethans. Spenser opened to him the gates of fairy-land, a perusal of Chapman's Homer drew from the young man his first fine sonnet, Jonson, Fletcher, Milton, etc., were his familiars, and Shakespeare his marveling study day in and day out.

The set of heptasyllabics entitled "Fancy" is the best of the poems in a lighter vein that Keats wrote. Colvin is of the opinion that a passage in Fuller's "Holy State" gave the poet the idea he elaborates in the lyric, and from Ben Jonson he caught the tricks of meter and rhythm that characterize the poem.

> "O sweet Fancy! let her loose; > Everything is spoilt by use;"

he sings and then describes the beautiful pictures his own fancy shows him. The "Ode on Melancholy" which, as Sidney Lanier thought, "reaches the highest height yet touched in the lyric line," perhaps owes its inspiration partly to Keats's passion for Fanny Brawn, and to the depression caused by the death of a brother of his whom he had nursed through a long illness. Melancholy, he truly says,

> . . . dwells with Beauty—Beauty that must die,
> And Joy, whose hand is ever at his lips
> Bidding adieu.

But of all Keats's pieces, Catholics like best perhaps "The Eve of St. Agnes," his finest narrative poem. Written in perfect Spenserian stanzas with the concluding Alexandrine used effectively, the poem, from its very beginning when "The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold" till its end when

> "The Beadsman, after thousand aves told
> For aye unsought for slept among his ashes cold" wonderfully suggests its medieval atmosphere. The admirable description of how the moonlight, shining through the painted window on Madeline as she knelt in prayer threw

> ". . . on her silver cross soft amethyst,
> And on her hair a glory, like her saint."

is equaled only by the banquet that Porphyro sets forth for his lady love. Those > Lucent syrops tinct with cinnamon;

> Manna and dates, in argosy transferred
> From Fez; and spiced dainties; every one
> From silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon would ravish the ear and tempt the palate even of a fasting anchorite.

In the "Ode on a Grecian Urn" said Bryant, "there is not a word we would be willing to part with." The pictures in the poem seem to have been suggested to Keats by some paintings of Claude's and Poussin's and by the marble from the Parthenon frieze. Without Shelley's crude pantheism, there was a great deal of the pagan about Keats. Like a Greek, he made passing earthly beauty his religion, and found his delight in the experiences of the senses, seldom penetrating to the moral significance of what he perceived. As Sidney Colvin well remarks regarding this fine ode's second and third stanzas, they "express with full felicity and insight the differences between life, which pays for its unique prerogative of reality by satiety and decay, and art, which in forfeiting reality gains in exchange permanence of beauty, and the power to charm by imagined experiences even richer than the real."

To the April of the year 1819 belongs that haunting lyric "La Belle Dame Sans Merci," "the most complete and enchanting English pure romance poem of its time," and according to Palgrave, "probably the finest lyric" in our language. Keats's biographer calls attention to the fact that much of the poem's charm lies in the metrical secret of shortening the last line of the stanzas from four feet to two: "And no birds sing." The inspiration of the poem was probably Fanny Brawn who certainly had Keats "in thrall" when it was written.

The "Ode to a Nightingale" Keats wrote in a few hours as he sat under a plum-tree in the May of 1819. The bird had been singing nightly near the house where the poet was living at the time, and the sorrow the death of his brother brought him seems to have been another source of the poem's inspirations. Stedman considered this ode "the nearest to perfection" of all our shorter English lyrics, and Colvin finds Keats's genius "at its height" here. Burton and Milton are probably the two literary influences perceptible in the poem, but the lofty flights of imagination and the "fascinating felicity" of phrase and cadence are all Keats's own. The wretchedness of man's lot in this vale of tears has never been more beautifully described than in the third stanza of this marvelous ode and the lines in the seventh, especially the three:

> Perhaps the self-same song that found a path
> Through the sad heart of Ruth, when, sick for home,
> She stood in tears amid the alien corn, are scarcely surpassed by anything in literature.

The "Ode to Autumn," the last of the immortal poems this wonderful year of Keats gave us, was written at Winchester in September. It is more faultless perhaps in execution than any of the other odes, and is remarkable for the pure objectivity of its treatment, for the poet, for once, is not at all introspective. His gift for describing the scenes of nature as if he were beholding them for the first time and of giving his reader a vivid impression of their beauty is nowhere more striking than in the "Ode to Autumn."

This poem completed, Keats's work, it may be said, was done. On his way to Italy in search of health during the fall of the following year he wrote his famous "last sonnet" with its lines of deathless beauty:

> Bright star, would I were steadfast as thou art,
> Not in lone splendor hung aloft the night
> And watching, with eternal lids apart,
> Like Nature's patient, sleepless Eremite,
> The moving waters at their priestlike task
> Of pure ablution round earth's human shores, but after that, nothing more. The dying poet reached Rome in November and died on February 23, 1821, tenderly cared for to the last by his faithful friend Arthur Severn, who at Keats's own request read to him each day from Jeremy Taylor's "Holy Living and Dying." The last words of John Keats, "the doubly dead, in that he died so young," were "Thank God, it has come!" He lies buried in the Protestant cemetery at Rome and on his tombstone, at his own request, are engraved the words: "Here lies one whose name was writ in water," a mysterious epitaph which our Father Tabb has properly interpreted in the following sonnet:

> Upon the tomb 'tis graven, "Here lies one > Whose name is writ in water." Could there be
> A flight of fancy fitlier feigned for thee,
> A fairer motto for her favorite son?
> For, as the wave, thy varying numbers run—
> Now crested proud in tidal majesty
> Now tranquil as the twilight reverie
> Of some dim lake the white moon looks upon
> While teems the world with silence. Even there,
> In each Protean rainbow-tint that stains
> The breathing canvas of the atmosphere,
> We read an exhalation of thy strains.
> Thus, on the scroll of Nature, everywhere,
> Thy name, a deathless syllable, remains.

WALTER DWIGHT, S.J.

DOMUS DEI

It stood in Nazareth of yore,
  Half hidden in the narrow street,
The little house unto whose door
  Came every day Emmanuel's feet.

Thither He came at end of day,
  Not for an hour, a passing Guest,
But taking an accustomed way,
  A weary Householder to rest.

He passed unheeded through the throng,
  Their Townsman well-beloved and known,
Nor sound of timbrel or of song
  Told when the Lord was with His own.

Men could not see about the door
  The myriad prostrate Cherubim,
Nor know that low unto the floor
  His Mother bent the knee to Him.

King Herod's palace lies in dust,
  Dank is the Golden House with death,
But Angels keep in holy trust
  The Holy House of Nazareth.

When I, familiar with Thy grace,
  Am heedless of Thy glance, Thy word,
That my soul was Thy dwelling-place,
  Keep this for my remembrance, Lord.

Then for no deed, no meed of mine,
  Who am forespent with futile things,
But that this body was Thy shrine
  Bid Angels bear it on their wings.

REVIEWS

Shepherd My Thoughts: Verses by FRANCIS P. DONNELLY. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $0.75.

The World and the Waters. By EDWARD F. GARESCHÉ, S.J. St. Louis: The Queen's Work Press. $1.00.

The numerous readers of Father Donnelly's ascetical works, who have been eager to see his fugitive poems and songs gathered into a volume, will find in "Shepherd My Thoughts" his happiest tribute to the Muse, and Father Garesché's admirers will doubtless agree that "The World and the Waters" contains some of the best poems he has written. The sonnet which gives a title to Father Donnelly's book deservedly holds its place on the first page. He is an observant lover of the trees and flowers and repeats in melodious lines the lessons taught him by "The First Flower," "Whitlow Grass," "Hepatica" and "The Golden Rod." Among his "Songs" will be found the now famous "What an Irishman Means by Machree" and "The Service Flag," but every old Woodstockian will doubtless agree that the finest poems in the volume are the two sonnets written in memory of "Samuel H. Frisbee, S.J.," the well-beloved "Spiritual Father" of the scholasticate. The second one must be quoted entire:

The bond that bound us in true brotherhood
  Of song and joyance over plain and hill
  Is snapt. The heart of all our hearts is still,
And a sharp pang has chilled the circling blood
That warmed from it. Must we by field and flood
  Wander no more or quaff the distant rill
  No more? Hark! Heard you not the warning shrill
To meet our guide ahead within the wood?
Alas! too far ahead! The woodland springs
Have lost their sweetness; gloom our way bedims,
And laughing song is hushed to a sad moan.
Oh guide along the path to higher things,
Revealing living streams and angel hymns,
You are ahead with God, and we, alone.

A striking characteristic of Father Garesché's new volume is the wide range of his inspiration, "Hills and the Waves," "Humanity," "In City Streets," "The World of Books" and "Christo Victori," being some of the appropriate captions under which his poems are printed. The book's lines of dedication, "To the Virgin Mary" are as full of poetry as of devotion. "To a Working Girl" is a well-expressed tribute to her stanch virtues. "First Communion" feelingly describes a priest's emotions on administering the Holy Eucharist to a flock of white-souled children. Some of the sounding stanzas of the ode on "Niagara" have already been quoted in these columns, and the following lines, "To Rose in Heaven" are taken from the poem which most readers of "The World and the Waters" will probably consider Father Garesché's highest flight:

Tell me, Rose,
Unto what bright and peaceful morn
Thy petals did unclose
When thou wast borne
Into this heavenly garden close,
Who took thee hence ere thou hadst made a thorn?

Tell, O, sweet,
The rapture of the hurrying feet
Of those white angels who are sent to bear
God's roses there,
And set them blooming by the Golden Street.

Tell me—thine eyes
Have seen the Great Surprise;
Thy innocent, tender eyes upon His face.
Have fed, this bitter while
That we have missed thy smile—
Tell me some tidings of the Holy Place. . . .

Then Mary blest,
Queenly and tenderly, in Celestial blue,
With roses at her breast
To mind her of that budding Rose she knew,
Did she haste loving at her Son's behest,
To welcome tiny you? . . .

Sister Clare. By M. REYNES MONLAUR. Translated from the French by M. E. ARENDRUP. New York: Robert M. McBride & Co. $1.25.

Men in War. By ANDREAS LATZKO. New York: Boni & Liveright. $1.50.

Here are two war books quite dissimilar in character but painting such striking pictures of the horror and devastation of modern war that after German militarism has been crushed forever by a decisive Allied victory, the volumes will supply strong arguments for the formation of a league of nations that will make a recurrence of the present madness a practical impossibility. The author of "Sister Clare" avers that though the book is in fiction form "no slightest thing" in it has been invented, and the Austrian officer who has written "Men in War" merely presents in chapters of "artistic realism" scenes and incidents that must be occurring every day just now in Europe.

"Sister Clare" is an aged French Franciscan of imperturbable faith whom the German invaders drove from her convent in Dinant to the precarious safety of Rheims, and the book is the story of what she saw and suffered on the way. There are vivid descriptions of the Sisters' flight from their convent and of the hardships they endured on the road, and the lofty supernatural motives that enabled them to bear up so bravely and patiently are beautifully expressed. It is a pleasure to find the Robert M. McBride Company publishing so unmistakably Catholic a book as "Sister Clare."

In "Off to War," "Baptism of Fire," "The Victor," "My Comrade," "A Hero's Death" and "Home Again," the six chapters of Andreas Latzko's merciless indictment of militarism, he gives unforgettable portraits of the Austrian soldiers and officers who are fighting on the Italian front and contrasts the dreadful tortures they endure with the honor and affluence enjoyed by the high command and the home-staying profiteers. Here is a specimen paragraph from his book:

> Front—Enemy—Hero's death—Victory—the curs rage through the world with frothing mouth and rolling eyes. Millions who have been carefully inoculated against smallpox, cholera and typhoid fever are chased into madness, millions, on either side, are packed into cars—ride, singing, to meet each other at the front—hack, stab, shoot at each other, blow each other to bits, give their flesh and their bones for the bloody hash out of which the dish of peace is to be cooked for those fortunate ones who give the flesh of their calves and oxen to the fatherland for a hundred per cent profit, instead of carrying their own flesh to market for fifty cents a day.

So many passages in "Men in War" are written quite as forcibly as the foregoing, and the pages describing the carnage of trench-warfare are so realistic, and the way the soldier's mind reacts to the horrors he sees and bears is so accurately pictured that it may safely be predicted that Andreas Latzko's terrible book will long outlive the war that produced it.

La Terre D'Occident. Essais sur la Formation Française. Par ADRIEN MITHOUARD. Paris: Perrin & Co. 3 fr. 50.

Adrien Mithouard may be called the apostle of "occidentalism." He believes that the best of western civilization, the noblest of its inspirations and ideals had their origin in France and that they sprang from what may be considered the very core or heart of the French nation, the Ile de France. He wrote several volumes to prove his thesis. The essays gathered in this volume are taken from his larger works, especially the "Traité d'Occident," the one book in which he most clearly and thoroughly exposes his theory. In the "Traité" Mithouard defines and describes the ideals and the tendencies of the West, and especially of the Ile de France. From the Ile de France came the splendid vaults and arches of the old cathedrals, the spires that told of the faith and the hopes of a whole people and all the customs and the social structure that made France so great in the past.

The book is the work of a poet, a mystic, a patriot. It is written with the enthusiasm that comes to those only who are deeply in earnest about their subject and believe in it with all their heart. Now and then there is a subtilty of thought and an apparently labored search after the striking and the unusual in expression which take away from the real artistic value of the work and give it a tinge of dilletanteism and artificiality. But Adrien Mithouard brings a sincerity and zeal of no common kind to his task and carries his readers with him. There are splendid pages in praise of the old and simple life of the past, hymns that spring from the very heart to the old land, to the fields, the farms and the homes where the forefathers dwelt. These will remind the reader of the pages where Pierre l'Ermite sings the love and the tenderness of that "Mighty Friend," the fair land of the Franks. In writing these pages Adrien Mithouard did good and patriotic work. If France is to be saved her salvation can come only through a return to the ideals and the faith of the past. These are again brought before us in these fine pages. Among the gems to be found in the book the prayer to the Saints of the France of the good old days of faith, whose granite statues crown the belfries and the portals of her cathedrals may be considered a summary of the whole book. It is an inspiring page. It is also a fine piece of esthetic criticism.

The Mythology of All Creeds. In Thirteen Volumes. LOUIS HERBERT GRAY, A.M., Ph.D., Editor. Indian. By A. BERRIEDALE KEITH, D.C.L., D.Litt. Iranian. By ALBERT J. CARNOY, Ph.D., Litt.D., Volume VI. Boston: Marshall Jones Company. $6.00.

The ordinary reader will marvel at the erudition and scholarship of this volume. The book carries him into strange lands and initiates him into the most startling mysteries of religions centuries old and in obedience to which millions of human beings are living today. From an ethnological and mythological point of view the book makes interesting reading. For there is nothing more captivating to the scholar than to learn what other men think of God, of nature and man, and when this knowledge extends itself to the millions who have lived in the past and have been influenced by strange beliefs, the pursuit becomes something of a fascination. The philosopher and the moralist cannot derive the same amount of pleasure from the perusal of these volumes. That, of course, is due to the subject itself, not to the editor or the writers who everywhere have admirably done their work, and who, as specialists in their field are masters of the intricate and exceedingly complex matter they deal with. The philosopher and the moralist will wonder how the human mind could ever come to believe the silly, absurd and monstrous tales of the Rigveda, and the aberrations of Buddhistic and Jainistic mythology. But these are facts and the writers have set about recording them.

Messrs. Keith and Carnoy carry the reader over the whole field of Indian and Iranian mythology. In the learned treatise of Mr. Keith we find such interesting chapters as the period of the Rigveda, the period of the Brahamanas and the Puranas. There is also a splendid discussion of the mythology of Jainism and modern India. The Iranian traditions and legends have been treated in the same scholarly spirit by Mr. Carnoy. The two sections of the work give a fair account of what is mythological only and all that is strictly religious, historical or archeological has been purposely omitted. The book sheds a great deal of light on the life and the thoughts of that mysterious East which exerts such a fascination on the mind of all students but which is so little understood west of Suez.

Mexico: From Diaz to the Kaiser. By Mrs. ALEC-TWEEDIE. With 36 Illustrations. New York: George H. Doran Co. $3.50.

The author of this volume appears to be a professional maker of books who is not much concerned about the lack of order and logic in her "copy," provided a certain number of pages are filled with reading matter. She seems to have been quite intimate with the late Porfirio Diaz and his family and gives a good description of his sad departure from Mexico; she attests that "It is absolutely certain that Huerta was not a direct participator in the crime" of murdering Madero, though he failed to take proper precautions to prevent it; avers that Huerta was not a drunkard; is of the opinion that he "was not only a strong man, but persona grata with a fair proportion of the Mexican people," and that he should have been recognized by our Government. Mrs. Alec-Tweedie does not miss the easy openings she has for making satirical remarks about our whole Mexican policy. She shows how we were more disturbed about one Englishman's violent end than over the fate of all the Americans Villa plundered and murdered, and she compares the situation in 1914-15 to a comic-opera plot: "Wilson refused to acknowledge Huerta in any way. Huerta offends, and then Wilson demands an apology from him as 'representative of Mexico.' Gilbertian, verily!"

The latter part of the volume, in which the author undertakes to describe the recent progress of German intrigue in Mexico, seems to be written at a safe distance from there and is not convincing. Mrs. Alec-Tweedie's information regarding the Kaiser's influence below the Rio Grande is more accurate, let us hope, than the news she gives the world in the following passage:

> At this time [1917] the influence of the priests had become very great in Mexico. . . They had once again risen to power and were doubtless a strong ally for the Kaiser, in Mexico as elsewhere. . . The Kaiser had found them useful in Ireland where priests and Jesuits had done much to foment the rebellion, and in Russia where revolution was brought about through the intrigues of Rasputin, a German Jesuit.

Poor Mrs. Alec-Tweedie! She has Jesuits on the brain. It would be difficult to gather together in an equal space a rarer collection of absurdities and misstatements than the author has crowded into those few lines. The "influence of the priests" was "very great in Mexico" last year? Why, the Catholic religion was practically proscribed then in that country! The priests "were doubtless a strong ally for the Kaiser in Mexico, as elsewhere"? In France, for instance, where 3,000 out of the 30,000 priests who were fighting the Kaiser have been slain in battle? What proofs does the author offer that "priests and Jesuits" did much to foment the Easter rebellion in Ireland? Absolutely none. But as for this careless scribbler's making a "German Jesuit" out of the highly "Orthodox" and notoriously dissolute Russian monk, Rasputin, that is too absurd for words. But what was the official reader of so reputable a publishing house as the George H. Doran Co. thinking of when he let Mrs. Alec-Tweedie put into her book such consummate nonsense as the foregoing? BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Those who are interested in "close-ups" of the men, women and children who make the "movies" will enjoy Rob Wagner's entertaining book entitled "Film Folk" (Century, $2.00.) He takes his readers to Los Angeles and shows them how the "film favorite," the "movie queen," the camera man, the director, the "extra man," the "extra girl," the publicity man and the scenario writer all unite their forces to produce the modern moving-picture play, traces the development of the industry from its crude beginnings up to its present-day perfection and holds out hopes of the film eventually becoming an artistic success, now that men of taste are interested in the enterprise.

Neither "The Real Front" (Harper, $1.50), by Arthur Hunt Chute, or "Over There with the Australians" (Scribner, $1.50), by Captain Hugh Knyvett, is a technical history of the war; neither follows the ebb and flow of mighty battles; neither studies the grand strategy which brought about the clashes of arms in Flanders or the dash for Constantinople. They paint not the war, but the warrior. "The Real Front" is the story of the Canadians, "Over There" is the story of the Australians, and both are the story of loyal, single-minded, reflecting, human fighting-men. Mr. Chute is a psychologist as well as a chronicler. His narrative of young Hallam's ride through "the valley of death" is thrilling, his description of the rivalries of Batteries B and D is amusing, and his analysis of the soldier's thoughts and emotions cannot but increase the esteem every American heart has for the boys in the trenches. The late Captain Knyvett, on the other hand, is less pretentious, but his pictures of scouting expeditions in No Man's Land and his reflections on the heroism of his comrades show that the spirit of self-sacrifice is living still.

Could all married couples practise the lessons of mutual tolerance taught in the interesting story, "Making Her His Wife" (Doubleday, $1.35), by Corra Harris, the divorce courts would have little work and the world would be a happier place to live in. The book is an instructive story of a wedded life, which was begun under difficulties arising from different stations in life, but ended happily. The natural law is cleverly wôven into the plot, and the God-inspired promise of married life, "Until death do us part," is faithfully kept. The hero, John Arms, while perhaps too strong in his own ideas is well drawn, and Olive, the heroine, is likable from the first and manifests the sterling qualities a good wife should have.——Amanda Benjamin Hall's "The Little Red House in the Hollow" (George W. Jacobs, Philadelphia, $1.35), which seems to be the author's first novel, centers round Daphne Haggin, the fair daughter of a neer-do-well Irishman who goes to meeting. Bridget, the housekeeper, who takes care of "Daffy" and the other orphaned children, never lets on that she is a Catholic. Daphne's and Nancy's love affairs are described after the conventional fashion.——Louis Edwin Theiss's "A Champion of the Foothills" (Doubleday), is an interesting and helpful story for boys, in which the industry and ambition of a youngster react upon his shiftless father and a companion of his own age. Exciting incidents of encounters with wild animals and the like, make the book one that most lads will find attractive.

Father Arthur Barry O'Neill, C.S.C., whose "Clerical Colloquies" and "Priestly Practice" are so favorably known, has again made all priests his debtors by a new volume with another alliterative title, "Sacerdotal Safeguards" (Notre Dame Univ. Press, Indiana, $1.25). In it he discourses on such questions as the relations of the priest to social problems, the foreign missions, the school, his table, vocations, housekeeper, income, etc., and his views are always interesting and sound. There is a discussion on "Rubrical Odds and Ends" and the Dors Club in another paper "swaps stories" and sayings. Father O'Neill's ideals are invariably high and eminently sensible, he talks fearlessly and plainly when occasion requires, while on a disputed question he is sure to be moderate and open-minded. The books ends with a warm tribute to that great priest, Father Sorin, founder of Notre Dame University and the Ave Maria.

Father Th. Mainage, a French Dominican, who has already written two valuable books on the psychology of conversion and of apostasy, has just published a collection of accounts of conversions among the intellectual élite of France, written by the converts themselves, and entitled "Les Témoins du Renouveau Catholique" (Paris, Beauchesne, fr. 3.00). Such men as Claudel, Lotte, Georges Dumesnil and Louis Bertrand tell how the great grace came to them and with keen analysis depict their own intellectual and emotional states, while Father Mainage sums up and draws his conclusions. The value of the book lies in the fact that it shows the infinite variety of the ways God speaks to man, and the power of the Catholic religion really to satisfy every type of mind and temperament. ——Jean Thorel, another French convert, is made the special subject of a little book, "De l'Art à la Foi" (Beauchesne, fr. 1.50), by his friend, Father A. Bessières, S.J., who writes his preface from the Chemin des Dames. Thorel was a naturalistic dramatist of the Zola school, but in 1910 was stricken with paralysis, suddenly flooded with love for the religion of his boyhood, and gradually won back his faith. He died hard at work for the spread of the Christian drama.——A third recent book from Beauchesne, is Father de Tonquédec's splendid "L'Oeuvre de Paul Claudel" (fr. 2.00), which appeared in the Jesuit periodical, the Etudes, in 1917. It is complete in every detail, a sympathetic study of the leading ideas of the great Catholic poet, and a searching analysis of his poetic form, judged from the standpoint of a sane classicism. The author, who is already well known for his valuable work on pragmatism, gives an excellent résumé of the principles and methods that have made Claudel stand out as one of the intellectual leaders of the day.

When Brinnaria, the heroine of the "Unwilling Vestal," by Edward Lucas White (Dutton, $1.50), exclaims in one part of the story that she looks "like a guy," and the Emperor Commodus says that he is "rattled," and that somebody "lambasted" old Bambilio, and such ultra-modern slang is freely bandied about, it is a little startling at first. The Romans, of course, had their slang, but the author of this tale of imperial Rome has forced the note in an attempt to be lifelike and vigorous. The story of the unwilling but faithful Vestal, who, after her thirty years of service in the Temple marries the Roman to whom she had pledged her troth is interesting, and dramatic in movement. But Brinnaria is not altogether a convincing character. She is a "tomboy" disguised as a Vestal, and is never done with her pranks until she is falsely accused of the one crime which, if proven, doomed the guilty priestess to be buried alive. Brinnaria proves her innocence by carrying water in a sieve as the Vestal Tuccia of the Roman legend is recorded to have done. But the "miracle" is no miracle at all. It is to the credit of Mr. White, who has unmistakable gifts as a story-teller, that in a story that easily might have lent itself to unsavory plot and incidents, no such taint is to be found.——"Secret Bread" (Doran, $1.50), by F. Tennyson Jesse, is a long-drawn-out, desultory pessimistic story, tracing the life-history of a man of Cornwall, which begins in sordid disgrace and ends in bitter disillusionment. The novel has power but is irretrievably marred by a pervading atmosphere and many instances of what the French call brutal frankness. It is unwholesome throughout and has not even the excuse of working out a theory.

The following stanzas called "The Foster Mother" make up one of the poems that give Francis Carlin's "My Ireland" (Holt, $1.25) its fine Celtic quality:

Old Mother Ireland, waiting for me
  With a star in your soul and a song in your breast,
I shall come when the calm is abroad on the sea,
  As a seeker of rest.
And when I am bound for you, Motherly One,
  May the star and the song be the light and the sound
That shall guide me between the green sea and the sun
  To a grave in your ground!

Old Foster Mother who blessed me at birth,
  With the Faith and the Music still mine, as my breath,
I shall come when the calm is abroad on the earth
  As a dreamer of Death
And when the poor dreamer at last is at rest,
  May the Gift that he kept and Gift he would keep,
Be a Star for his soul and a Song for his breast
  When he rises from Sleep.

In "Quelques Héros" (Paris: Librairie Militaire Berger-Levrault, 3 fr. 50), a gallant French officer, Captain Delvert, a hero himself, for he has been four times wounded in the war, writes a series of stirring tales of valor and chivalry gathered from the countless fields of battle where most of the daring deeds he records in crisp and soldierly fashion came under his personal observation. These brief but affecting stories came from the trenches, from listening posts out on No Man's Land, from Verdun and the first struggles on the Somme, and from the glorious records of the armies of France. All teach lessons of devotion to duty, of sacrifice and faith.——Henriette de Vismes completes the picture with her "Histoire Authentique et Touchante des Marraines et des Filleuls de Guerre" (Paris: Perrin, 3 fr. 50), in which she places before us a few of the letters which passed between the women of France and their adopted godsons who are fighting their battles at the front. The most interesting of these strange epistles are those which come from the unlettered but brave soldiers, many of whom can scarcely spell, but who know how to express deep gratitude for the brave women who by their kindness and generosity endeavor to lighten the burdens and the trials of the fighting man.

PACIFIC SCHOOL

EDUCATION

Catholic Schools for Rural Catholic Children

WHAT are we doing to give a Catholic education to our Catholic children living in the country? Separate Catholic schools, where our Catholic children may be thoroughly grounded in their faith, have, at all times, been considered a matter of paramount importance. We are constantly reminded of the vital need of Catholic education for our children. We are continually calling the attention of the public to the millions we are spending and the sacrifices we are making for this sacred cause. But, while millions are at hand to educate the children of our cities, the few hundred dollars that would suffice to educate our poorer children in the country are lacking. In our cities splendid buildings equipped with every modern comfort may everywhere be seen. The cost of a single one of these would partially endow two or three country schools for many years to come. But the modest little frame building, to which our poor Catholic children would gladly walk for miles over rough and muddy roads to find the priceless pearl of a Catholic education, is frequently not to be found.

The City and the Country Child

THE Catholic children of our cities have as instructors men and women consecrated to the service of God, by the vows of poverty, chastity and obedience; men and women of refinement, trained in the art of teaching; while too often, unfortunately, the only teacher available for the country lad and his little sister is untrained for the work, sometimes thoroughly unfit for it.

Why is this? Is it because the children of the field and the farm have no souls to save? Is it because the Catholic children in our rural districts are not in as much need of Catholic education as those living in the city? The reason advanced for the need of Catholic schools for city children are just as urgent, if not more so, for those in the country. The children of our cities enjoy many more spiritual advantages than the children of the country; the former generally live near a Catholic church, easily accessible all the year round, and in all kinds of weather. The latter seldom live near a church, and very often on account of the inclement weather and the impassable roads they can attend neither the church, nor the school. City children have what might be termed spiritual luxuries, in daily Mass and Communion, Sunday schools, public devotions, novenas and sodalities, which children in the country usually do not enjoy, or if they do, only in a very limited way. Usually one priest in the country has several stations. He is in one place on one Sunday and in another the next. Because his people have not been educated in Catholic schools, he has not that intelligent lay help which his brother priests in the city can so easily call upon. On account of the poverty of his missions, much of the valuable time which he should consecrate to spiritual work and to his children is spent in providing for material needs. For these and similar reasons the children are deprived of countless spiritual and educational advantages.

A Consoling Sign and a Warning

RECENTLY an excellent article bearing on this subject appeared in AMERICA. Every priest struggling on mission work in the country must have been greatly consoled on reading it. Attention at last is being called to one of the most important needs of the Church in the United States: Catholic schools for our Catholic children in the country. It is perhaps the beginning of a "drive" that will bring about for our children the accomplishment of what the First, Second and Third Plenary Councils of Baltimore ordered done—the erection of Catholic schools near every Catholic Church, not only in the cities, but also in the rural districts, in the United States.

In forcible and eloquent words the Fathers of the Second Plenary Council of Baltimore declare that loss of faith, the corruption of morals, the blight of indifferentism and the many other evils to which our Catholic youth is exposed, are due to the influences of non-Catholic schools. It is fifty-one years since that Council was held, yet thousands of our Catholic children living in the country have been compelled to frequent these schools which the Council so strongly condemned.

The Unheeded Warning

HOW long are we going to tolerate a system which for the past fifty-one years has failed to provide for our children those parochial schools, which, in the judgment of the First and Second Plenary Councils of Baltimore, are the only means of saving them from the most serious evils and dangers? The only excuse we can offer is that for the past fifty-one years we could not do better. Yet it seems strange that the Fathers of the Council should have decreed what was then an impossibility. Can we suppose that they would have taken the pains to point out the dangers and evils that threaten our youth, and suggest that Catholic schools be provided to obviate these dangers and evils, if in their opinion these schools were then an impossibility and that fifty-one years thence ninety per cent of our Catholic children in the country would be without Catholic schools? Or can we suppose that the Fathers were thinking only of children living in the cities, where there would be greater wealth and more abundant means to provide for their spiritual needs?

The Third Council of Baltimore, after pointing out in a preamble the dangers to faith and morals for our Catholic children frequenting non-Catholic schools, says: "Having seriously weighed all these things, we decree and order that within two years from the promulgation of this Council, near every church, where there is not yet a parochial school erected, one be erected and provisions made for its continual maintenance, except in cases of very grave difficulties, where the Bishop judges, a delay may be granted."

It is now thirty years since the promulgation of this decree; that is fifteen times the number of years assigned as the limit within which a parochial school should be built near every church in the United States. What has been done during these thirty years to carry out the provisions of this decree?

Results in Country Parishes

IN the cities, generally, as will appear from a study of the "Catholic Directory," its provisions have been gradually carried out. There may be exceptions, but, generally speaking, schools have been built and will be erected as needed; but in the country, as also will appear from a study of the "Catholic Directory," little has been done to provide Catholic education for our children. Just how many Catholic children there are in the country districts who are deprived of a Catholic education we cannot say. If we can believe the statistics referred to in Father Kirby's excellent article, there are over 500,000. Assuming this to be true, it would mean, according to the figures given in the "Catholic Directory," (1917) that approximately 745,882 Catholic children in our rural districts are deprived of the opportunity of getting a Catholic education. There are, according to the "Directory," 1,537,644 children in the parochial schools. If we suppose this to be two-thirds of the number of children that should normally be enrolled in these schools, the total number would be 2,237,646, one-third of which is 745,882. It seems incredible that there should be 745,882 Catholic children deprived of a Catholic education. But if we consider the number of rural churches with no schools attached to them, the estimate of the statisticians cannot be much out of the way. According to the "Catholic Directory" (1917) there are in the United States 10,190 churches with resident priests and only 5,687 parochial schools; that is, only a little over fifty-five per cent of the churches with resident priests have parochial schools. If you examine the "Catholic Directory" you will find that the majority of churches outside of the cities and large towns with resident priests have no schools. There are, moreover, 5,330 missions with churches, making the total number of churches 15,520 and the total number of churches without schools 9,883, thus lowering the number of churches with schools to thirty-seven per cent. It is evident that very few of those 5,330 mission churches without resident priests have schools attached to them, and they are, as is evident, mostly rural.

If you allow an average of 100 children for each of the 9,883 churches without schools, the total number of children of schoolless churches would be 988,300—almost 1,000,000 Catholic children without Catholic schools. There are many country missions with less than 100, some less than fifty children, but there are many again with numbers ranging up to four and five hundred, and even more. Close to my parish there is a group of missions, attended by two priests, with over 600 children; other adjoining missions have even more. Suppose you allow fifty children for each of the schoolless churches, you will have a total of 494,150, or nearly 500,000; suppose even you allow an average of fifty children for 5,330 mission churches, which are mostly rural, you will have 267,500.

A Painful Fact

THOUGH we cannot definitely say how many of the 9,833 schoolless churches are rural, yet this much is certain, that, although there are some rural churches with schools, as a class rural missions have no schools; though we cannot say how many children are, by their rural environment, deprived of Catholic education, yet this much is certain, that the number is shockingly large and most probably over 500,000; that year by year, for the past fifty years and more, thousands of our rural Catholic children have been passing from boyhood and girlhood to manhood and womanhood without the Catholic education and training so necessary for the preservation of their faith and morals.

If even in the near future, or for that matter in the distant future, there was a well-grounded hope that these schools were forthcoming we might patiently live in hope, but the future offers us no hope; the future is as dark and hopeless as has been the past. Unless there is a radical change, unless the present system, which leaves provision for these schools dependent upon the unaided efforts of the poor country priest, is dropped and some more efficient system is substituted in its stead, the present situation will remain as it is indefinitely, and the next fifty years will be as the past fifty; the majority of our rural churches will be without schools, and thousands upon thousands of our rural Catholic children will be deprived of their inalienable birthright—a Catholic education.

ECONOMICS

National Finance and Surplus Wealth

THE first two pillars of the British Labor program were discussed in the preceding article. The two remaining pillars call for careful discrimination. The first of these is described as "The Revolution in National Finance." Herein the British Labor party stands for:

> Such a system of taxation as will yield all the necessary revenue to the Government without encroaching on the prescribed national standard of life of any family whatsoever, without hampering production or disorganizing any useful personal effort, and with the nearest possible approximation to equality of sacrifice.

Tariffs are repudiated, direct taxation of all incomes above the national minimum, and excess profits are to meet current fiscal needs, whereas the gigantic war debt is to be canceled in a comparatively short time through graduated direct levies on fortunes, large and small, both during life and at death. Taxation of inheritances should leave only "a quite moderate amount by way of family provision."

The Question of Taxation

THE principle that taxes should be so levied as to make the "nearest possible approximation to equality of sacrifice" is but another version of the principle taught by Catholic moralists for centuries, that men should be taxed in "proportion to their ability to pay," based on their current incomes. I have previously outlined for America the economic and moral aspects of war finance, in which I developed the justice and expediency of financing a large part of the war's costs by income and excess profits taxation. I believe that this phase in the revolution of national finance can be endorsed. Whether we favor free trade or no is a matter of economic orthodoxy. The justice of inheritance taxes is a matter of degree, whereas taxation of private fortunes, not current income, accumulated with the implicit sanction of society, would approximate confiscation of private property and hence be morally unjustifiable, at least, so it seems to me. In general, however, the system of taxation outlined above, with the exception noted, would constitute a far more equitable system than formerly prevailed. Income, profits and inheritance taxation should hereafter definitely provide the vast majority of funds needed for fiscal purposes.

Surplus Wealth for Common Good

IN proposing the fourth pillar, "The Surplus Wealth for the Common Good," British Labor aims to place misappropriated wealth, formerly going to private individuals, and accruing from the "riches of our mines, the rental value of lands superior to the margin of cultivation, the extra profits of fortunate capitalists," in the national treasury to provide for sick and infirm funds, social insurance, public improvements, parks and playgrounds, etc. This program, indeed, already finds British Labor in Utopia. In the first place, there is absolutely no guarantee of a resultant surplus to be credited to the common good under the government-ownership plans proposed under their second pillar; secondly, confiscation of income from land above labor and interest on improvements would approximate the single tax, there being numerous arguments against such a procedure; and thirdly, the State in all probability will be so enamored of the public good that it will completely forget the private and individual rights it was fundamentally ordained to guarantee.

Notwithstanding, the British Labor party has sensed the distinction between economic and political democracy, and has presented a creditable program to secure the equitable participation of every one in the fruits of production, according to his contribution. The Russian Bolsheviki were loud in their idealistic proclamations, but did not deem them worth fighting for. At present they are professedly erecting their Utopian regime under the military heel of Germany—a contradiction in terms.

The President's Mediation Commission

I HAVE said little of the recommendations of President Wilson's Mediation Commission, although these are of the extremest significance. Representative government is, indeed, accorded in our democracy, yet industrial unrest is widespread. The agitations of the I. W. W., strikes and strike hearings, the Bolshevist sentiment, universal complaint against profiteering, and the disalignment of wages and cost of living increases, all serve to call attention to the fact that America has not achieved economic democracy in the same fulness it enjoys political democracy. In reporting its recommendations, the Mediation Commission has emphasized the utmost importance of eliminating profiteering during the war as an indispensable prerequisite to the best morale of industry; pointed to the lack of knowledge and cooperation between employer and employee which comes from personal contact only and which is wholly precluded under our present corporate fabric of industry, and finally, cautions that "uncorrected evils are the greatest provocative to extremist propaganda, and their correction in itself would be the best counter propaganda."

The serious application of the "National Minimum" would largely meet the third evil mentioned, whereas cooperative ownership and direction of industry and a drastic revision of our tax laws with emphasis upon income and profits taxes would largely remedy the first and second shortcomings. A more general recognition of the principle of collective bargaining is imperative. Emphasis must be placed upon the further and wider extension of private property, whether in land or capital, so that the vast majority of the workers may receive income other than that gained as the result of their toil. Withal, as Dr. Ryan suggests, "no conceivable method of distributing the present national product would provide every family with the means of supporting an automobile." Without question, as our natural resources decrease, we, as Europeans have done before us, will have no other alternative but to reduce the number of our economic wants.

Finally, let no one minimize the seriousness of distributive "injustice." A refusal on our part to consider these social problems will be met by even more dangerous agitations later on. Uncorrected evils accumulate progressively, supporting such dangerous states of mind as syndicalism and Bolshevism, which would not alone occasion the loss of whatever industrial democracy we already possess, but at this time would even render us helpless before the greatest menace to our political freedom. It is high time that we make America safe for economic democracy and the world safe for political democracy.

NOTE AND COMMENT

A Student Thrift-Stamp Campaign

NO more wise and generous thrift-stamp campaign has come to our notice than that described in the Loyola Prep of St. Ignatius College, Chicago. Fully to carry out the idea of thrift in which the campaign centers, the money gathered is to be the result of personal acts of self-sacrifice. The stamps are then turned into a common fund where the growing amount will constantly stimulate the zeal of the students. The interest accruing from the capital thus collected will be devoted to the foreign missions, where it can be productive of the greatest good for souls while at the same time promoting at home a true apostolic spirit. The principal itself, at the end of the five years, willl be applied to the foundation of scholarships at St. Ignatius. The final aim is to collect sufficient money to enable each year five deserving boys to obtain a Catholic higher education. "Thus," says the youthful reporter, "in supporting this campaign, we are engaged in a great work. At one stroke we are helping our country, our religion and our school."

Appealing Against the New Zone System

THE Christian Herald issues an earnest appeal to its readers, asking them to perform a real service to their country at the cost of just three cents to themselves. It calls attention to the new postage law which threatens to divide the country into sections separated by dollars and cents and explains that there is no question of a war tax but of a permanent legislation which would make the man in the East alien in thought and interest from the man in the West.

> The magazines that come to your home every week or month are facing a very unpleasant necessity through the action of Congress at the last session. The necessity is this: Either they must stop coming to your home or they must cost more postage for every copy. Moreover, and here is the unjust feature of the law, they must cost more in proportion as you live farther from the place of publication. The postage increases run from 50 to 900 per cent. As most magazines are published in New York, this means that all who live in the Middle West or the Far West or the South are penalized by Congress under this law.
> If you believe it is unfair to lay a penalty upon people because they live at a distance from New York, why not assert that belief where it will do good? If you believe in the right of every citizen to have his mail delivered at the same rate, why not say so in a way that will be effective? If you believe that no section should be discriminated against in the cost of their reading matter, why not use your influence?
> Write to your Congressman and one or both Senators. Do this now for your own sake and for the sake of keeping the national periodicals really national and keeping the nation solidified. Your postmaster will give you the names of your Congressman and Senators. Simply write to them that you believe the zone system of second-class postage to be wrong in principle, that it will be unjust in practice, and that Congress ought to reconsider the matter. We urge you to do it without delay.

The new zone system for mailing magazines is already a law and will go into effect July 1, if not repealed. It all came about, says the Christian Herald, "because a small group of politicians threatened to delay the passage of the entire War Revenue bill unless the section referring to an increase in second-class postage was retained.

Catholic Chaplains Under Fire

THE staff correspondent of the International News Service singles out our American Catholic chaplains for special distinction. Their bravery and self-sacrifice, he says, formed "a big feature in the battle of Seicheprey." He then offers the following details:

> The Rev. William J. Farrell, thirty-nine years old, of West Newton, Mass., administered the last rites to dying soldiers during the height of the artillery duel and saved several wounded, dragging them out of the danger zone. Moreover, he carried ammunition for several barrages. Four men had been killed and several wounded at one American battery, so Chaplain Farrell personally kept the gun firing until he himself was wounded in the arm by shrapnel. Though exhausted from hours of excitement and strenuous work, Father Farrell carried Private Myron Dickman, nineteen, an artilleryman of Bridgeport, Conn., on his back to the dressing station.
> He was cited officially for bravery and offered a commission by the commanding officer, who said: "You are too good a fighter to be in the clergy. Let some one else do the sky-pilot work." Our men call Chaplain Farrell "The Fighting Parson."
> The Rev. Osiah J. Boucher, of New Bedford, Mass., is the first American chaplain to receive the French War Cross. In the recent fighting he attended the wounded under fire in No Man's Land. Chaplain de Valles, also of New Bedford, assigned by the Knights of Columbus, has been mentioned by the commanding officers for "conspicuous bravery under fire in the last few weeks' fighting." The Rev. M. J. O'Connor, of Roxford, Mass., suffered a slight attack of chlorine gas Saturday, but this did not interfere with his duties.

The Knights of Columbus have rendered an invaluable service to our soldiers in promptly sending their first chaplains at the time when they were most urgently needed. Our priests at the front will add a new page to the glorious record of the Catholic Church in America, and at the same time they will teach some commanding officers that though Catholic chaplains can fight as well as the best soldiers, yet their first work is to serve the dying and console the suffering.

War-Savings Societies

THE latest agencies devised to aid the Government in the speedy prosecution of the war are the War Savings Societies. Members of these companies pledge themselves to avoid competition with the Government in the vital matter of labor, materials and transportation, by buying only what is needed, and at the time it is needed. They agree furthermore to invest weekly or monthly a specified amount of their savings in war-savings stamps. Companies of savers may be formed in factories, offices, colleges, churches or any other organizations, as well as in private homes. Volunteers who wish to assist in establishing such groups are invited to correspond with the War-Savings Bureau, 51 Chambers street, New York City. They will there be referred to the headquarters of their respective States. The secretaries of the societies thus formed see to it that members are provided with the necessary stamps, and that the promises are regularly fulfilled. They can themselves be made sales agents on application to the War-Savings Bureau. Their reports of the total savings and the number of members are sent in weekly or monthly to the central bureau. Regular or occasional meetings may be held by the war-savings societies and interesting programs prepared. The main fact insisted upon is that any dime spent unnecessarily may handicap the Government in the prosecution of the war by the work it causes to be done in factory, mine or on the farm; by the raw material consumed and the space occupied in freight-car or ship that might else be utilized for Government purposes. The money thus saved is lent to provide clothing, ammunition and food for the men starred upon our service flags. The last but not the least effective motive to stimulate interest is that for every $4.00 and a few cents now invested in savings stamps there will be a solid return of $5.00 in January, 1923.

Chaplains' Office at Headquarters

THE publicity service of the Federal Churches of Christ in America brings an important item of news. It announces that General Pershing has appointed Bishop Charles Henry Brent, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, as Senior Headquarters Chaplain. The entire chaplain forces in France will be under the control of Chaplains' Office at General Headquarters, through which it will be represented to the Commanding General and his staff. This office will consist of three chaplains, appointed by the Commanding General, to be known as Headquarters Chaplains. One of these is to be designated as Senior Chaplain, and this position has been assigned to Bishop Brent, with the rank of Major. He has two aides, one a Catholic, the other a Protestant. Their duty is to keep in touch with every sector occupied by the American forces, provide for ministrations wherever needed, and exercise a general oversight over the commissioned chaplains. Bishop Brent was connected with the Philippine Islands, was prominent in the anti-opium campaign, and for several years, served on the editorial staff of the Churchman. The Bishop must have brought the persuasive powers of his well-known diplomacy into play to secure the directorship of all the chaplains: certainly the number of Episcopalians in the service does not warrant leadership of chaplains on the part of a member of the sect.

Two Catholic War Correspondents

THE London Universe recently called attention to the fact that Philip Gibbs and Hilaire Belloc, the two "free-lance journalists in England, who have during the war won a supreme position as military writers," are both Catholics. Mr. Belloc's contributions to Land and Water have greatly multiplied that journal's readers and his luminous books on the war have made the mysteries of strategy intelligible to the general reader. Mr. Gibbs, who has twenty books to his credit, was a war correspondent with the Bulgarian army in 1912, and since the present conflict began he has been continually sending graphic war news from France. As the Universe well observes:

> No one else has provided the British public with the same constant flow of illuminating despatches, telling how the troops fared from day to day and in what conditions they were living. The mind which remains still fresh and unexhausted after three years spent in continual observation of the war, which finds all the zest of a good story in the little happenings day after day, is not less than genius. His dispatches on the Cambrai battles were masterpieces of war correspondence. He has enabled us at home to realize, as no one else could, all the sufferings, and the excitements, and the passing gleams of joy that make up the life of those whom they love who are living under the shadow of death in France.

Mr. Gibbs's vivid descriptions of the German drive that began in March are especially noteworthy and have been eagerly read by millions of Americans.

The German Language and the German People

THE following communication from United States Commissioner of Education P. P. Claxton clearly defines his attitude towards the teaching of German in our schools:

> I do not think our present relations with the German empire should affect in any way the policy of the schools in the United States in regard to teaching the German language.
> The United States is now at war with the Imperial Government of Germany and not with the German language or literature. The President has tried to make it plain to all the people that we are not at war with the people of Germany as a people, and that we have in our hearts no hatred or bitterness toward them. When the war is over we expect to be friends again and our commercial and political relations will be re-established. Indeed, we shall probably have much more intercourse with the German people then than ever before, as we shall have with most of the nations of the world. The great German republic may become one of the leading nations for the preservation of the peace of the world. For practical, industrial and commercial purposes we shall need a knowledge of the German language more than we have needed it in the past. We should remember also that there are many millions of German speaking people outside of Germany, and the number of such persons will probably increase rapidly after the war regardless of the way in which the war may end. Some years ago we were at war with Spain. And more recently we were almost at war with Mexico, whose people speak the Spanish language. The need of a knowledge of the Spanish language for commercial and industrial uses has been greatly increased.
> The culture value of the German language and literature and the writings of Lessing, Goethe, Schiller, and a host of other poets and of novelists, historians and essayists remain the same as they were before the war, and it is too great for us to lose out of our life, national and individual. The value of the scientific and technical writings of the German people will no doubt continue to increase. To rob ourselves of the ability to profit by them would be very foolish. The kinship between the English and the German languages is the same as it was before the war, and the value of a knowledge of the history and philology of the German language for an understanding of English remains the same.
> Last of all, we cannot as a people afford to put ourselves in the attitude of regarding as evil everything about any people with whom we may happen to be at war. We cannot afford to assume this attitude toward the German people simply because they happen now to be under the control of an autocratic militaristic government with purposes and aims that have brought us into conflict with it. The fewer hatreds and antagonisms that get themselves embodied in institutions and policies the better it will be for us when the days of peace return. We can easily see how this has been true of our times of war with England, Mexico and Spain, and among ourselves.
> I sincerely hope that school officers and teachers everywhere will take the broad and sane view of this subject. To do so can, I believe, in no way be interpreted as a lack of loyalty to the United States, nor can failure to do so in any way strengthen our position in the war or enable us to bring it to a successful end more quickly.

It is incumbent upon Catholics, above all others, to assume the attitude of Christian charity demanded by the nation's Chief Executive and to banish from their hearts all sentiments of bitterness and hatred. This, however, is perfectly consistent with condemnation of German atrocities and a burning desire for a complete and final American victory.

The War.—On the western front the beginning of the week was marked by a serious setback of the German offensive, the latter part by a comparative lull.

Bulletin, Apr. 29, p.m.-May 6, a.m.

On April 29, the Allies flung back the Germans with tremendous losses before Ypres in what is considered the greatest attack the enemy has made since the opening of the Flanders offensive. After several hours of intense bombardment with gas and high explosives General von Arnim, acting under the supreme command of General Ludendorff, sent his troops forward on a front of more than fifteen miles. His object was to crush in the Ypres salient from the north, east and south. From Meteren, near the western end of the German Lys salient to Zillebeke Lake just southeast of Ypres, the French and British positions were fiercely attacked, while at the same time heavy forces were thrown against the Belgian lines north of Ypres. Everywhere the Allies stood their ground. The French defending the sector between Scherpenberg and Mont Rouge, where a frightful struggle raged about the village of Locre, after giving away slightly, counter-attacked. As a result Locre, which had changed hands several times, was finally held by the French and the Germans were driven back for about a mile in the direction of Dranoutre on the very edge of the plain from which they had started their latest offensive. In a further attempt of the enemy to cross the Oise River east of Varennes he was driven back by the French with heavy losses. Not since the war began have the Germans suffered a more serious repulse than in the three days' fighting in which they tried to gain the heights beyond Mount Kemmel.

Since the middle of the week when the fury of the German attacks was spent, no action of major importance took place on the western front. The rest of the week passed in preparation for a further attack and defensive and in a few local actions. The more important of these were two advances made by the French on the front east of Amiens where the Americans are cooperating with them. The French communiqués announced that Baune Wood, near Mailly-Raineval, northwest of Montdidier was taken and the line moved forward in Hangard Wood, between the Luce and the Somme Rivers. Between the Luce and the Somme, near Thennes, the Germans attacked in force but their columns were broken up by a heavy barrage fire before they could reach the Allied trenches. Americans are stationed near all the points named. On May 4 the Allies' official reports stated that they had appreciably improved their positions on the front east and southeast of Amiens, the sectors where military observers expect the next German blow to fall. Just south of the Avre River where they had previously captured Senecat Wood, the troops of General Pétain took Hill 82 and a wood bordering the Avre between Hailles and Castel. These positions were the closest to Amiens held by the enemy and of strategic importance, Hill 82 being but three miles from the Paris-Amiens railway. North of the Luce the British and French fought a spirited engagement with the enemy a little south of Villers-Bretonneux and captured more of the high ground between the Luce and the Somme. South of Locon, on the southern flank of the Lys and three and one-half miles northeast of Bethune, the British repulsed heavy assaults on their lines. They also made some progress near Meteren. In the region of Locre, west of Kemmel, the French made some slight advance. Von Arnim's attacks at Hinge, northwest of Bethune, were beaten off by the British who also improved their positions east of Sally-le-Sec, east of Amiens and north of Albert, in the neighborhood of Hebuterne.

On the Italian front only local actions of minor importance took place, but Austrian troops are being massed in the Trentino and Tyrol, which are the highways to their trenches in the southwest. In Palestine the British forces east of the Jordan River attacked the enemy holding the foothills south of Es-Salt, and the mounted troops were within two miles of the town on April 30. An official bulletin stated that the British advanced along a line of one mile in the vicinity of Mezreh (Mesraesh-Sherkiyeh?) on the line of the British advance northward from Jerusalem, and that they later captured that village.

In Mesopotamia the British again resumed the offensive, with Mosul, the most important of the Turkish bases, as its goal. One of the British columns marching northward from the Tigris River advanced twenty miles towards that city, while another operating on the Euphrates made considerable progress towards Aleppo.

The Berlin official report on operations in Finland says that Finland was cleared of the enemy. German troops in cooperation with Finnish battalions, attacked the enemy between Lakhti and Tevasthus in an encircling movement, and in a five days' battle, in spite of bitter defense and desperate attempts to break through, overwhelmingly defeated him. The Finnish forces cut off his retreat in a northerly direction. He was subsequently closed in on every side and 20,000 laid down their arms. The Finns, it was asserted by the Helsingsfors correspondent of the Svenska Dagbladet, do not intend to attempt the conquest of Russian Karelia, since Germany will not support such a demand. Karelia is a region in the northwest of Russia embracing the southeast corner of Finland and including parts of the Government of Petrograd, Olonets and Archangel bordering on the northeast on the White Sea. The Karelians belong to the Finnish stock. The White Guards, or Finnish forces, captured Viborg, seventy-five miles northwest of Petrograd, after killing almost the entire force of Red Guards.

War in Finland

A revolution has occurred in the Ukraine. From what may be gathered from a very obscure situation, a meeting of several thousand peasants from the entire Ukraine took place on April 29, at which dissatisfaction with the whole course of the Government was forcibly expressed. The most important of these meetings passed a resolution calling for the overthrow of the Government, the closing of the Central Rada, the cancellation of the Constituent Assembly convoked for May 12 and the abandonment of land centralization. General Skoropauski was proclaimed Hetman, or Commander-in-Chief. The Rada, at first weakly supported by Government troops, continued to sit, but it yielded when the troops were persuaded to retire for the sake of avoiding bloodshed. According to the Kölnische Zeitung, there was fighting in Kiev. Before the Main Committee of the German Reichstag Friedrich von Payer, Imperial Vice-Chancellor, speaking for the Chancellor Count von Hertling, made a statement concerning the Ukrainian situation, dealing first with the decree issued by General Herman von Eichorn relative to the sowing of crops; second, the arrest of the members of the Ukrainian Government, and third, the overthrow of the Ukrainian Government and the construction of another. Two German papers, the Vorwaerts of Berlin and the Berlin Tageblatt sharply criticize the conduct of the German Government with regard to the Ukraine. The Tageblatt says: "We cannot deny that we have not succeeded in winning the affection of the population under our military rule of Lithuania, not to speak of Poland. It is the same in the Ukraine. Even optimists may see that the Eastern structure stands on a very unstable foundation. It was always clear that the Ukraine would at the earliest possible moment seek union with Russia."

Crisis in the Ukraine

Germany has served an ultimatum on Russia demanding the release of all German prisoners of war who are in good health, and threatened to take Petrograd in case of a refusal. A German commission is soon to start for Russia to present the ultimatum from the Berlin Government, and the fact that this commission will consist of more than a hundred members and will go to Russia merely to demand the release of German soldiers is accepted as an index of the importance which Germany sets upon her demands. It has been asserted that there are 1,000,000—some say as many as 1,500,000—German prisoners in Russia and Siberia. The German demand is supposed to have a very close relation to the plans of Hindenburg and Ludendorff in their western offensive, and indicates almost conclusively the use to which the released prisoners are to be put, either to be again incorporated into German regiments or to take the place in munition factories and other war industries of other men who can be drafted into the German armies.

The Russo-German Situation

Belated dispatches state that Germany protested to the Bolshevist Foreign Minister against the landing of 6,000 Allied troops at Murmansk, declaring that permission for such landing was a violation of the Brest-Litovsk treaty, which stipulated peace with Finland and non-interference in its internal life. It was denied in the protest that Germans had participated in the raid of the Finnish Guards upon Kem, and the presence of Russian troops between Petrograd and Finland was objected to on the ground that they threatened to cross the frontier. Mediation of the Russo-Finnish conflict was promised if the Government prevented violations of the treaty. Meanwhile, German troops are continuing their advance into Russian territory. They are now reported to be in the Government of Kursk.

Emperor Charles of Austria has empowered the Austrian Premier, Dr. von Seidler, to adjourn Parliament. A statement published in Vienna indicates that the closure of Parliament is due to the seriousness of the food question. The statement says: "The Government will devote its entire strength to the economic problem and will try to create conditions required to enable the population to hold out." At a conference of party leaders, Dr. von Seidler declared that the serious economic and food situations made it imperative for the Government to be spared Parliamentary criticism. He therefore demanded that the sitting of Parliament be postponed, adding that unless the Parliamentary leaders took the step the Government would forcibly oppose its sittings. In spite of much opposition the postponement of Parliament was agreed upon. The Parliament is composed of 233 Germans, 108 Czechs, 92 Poles, 33 Ruthenians, 42 Jugoslavs, and 19 Italians. One of the burning questions it has to solve is that of the creation of the long-discussed Jugo-Slav or southern Slav state.

Closure of Parliament

The production of the American shipyards for April is estimated at 240,000 tons, an increase of 50 per cent over that of March and three times the amount turned out in January. Although the launchings in April do not reach the total hoped for, the progress is favorable and it is hoped that the total production of the year may reach 4,000,000 tons. Ship construction is not as yet fully under way in the yards owned by the Government. The crop outlook points to a harvest of from 800,000,000 to 900,000,000 bushels of wheat. The Allied countries in Europe promise also large wheat crops. The situation therefore is much better than last year. In spite of this it will be still necessary to ship large quantities of wheat to Europe. This is due in great measure to the greater durability and "wearing quality" of wheat over other grains. The Third Liberty Loan drive ended at midnight, May 4, a complete success. Officials are confident that when all the sources of subscriptions have been officially heard from the over-subscription will be as high as $1,500,000,000 bringing the total of the Third Loan to approximately $4,500,000,000.

War Measures at Home

Ireland.—The Irish situation is as far from solution as ever. The British Parliament has so far utterly failed to deal with it satisfactorily, and the discontent in Ireland is paralleled by a similar feeling in England. Lloyd George has blundered seriously and there seems to be little prospect of unraveling the tangle. The New York Evening Post in an editorial of May 2 summarizes the situation as follows:

Home Rule and Conscription

> Conscription in Ireland has been postponed by an Order in Council. Home Rule for Ireland, a bill for which the Government was pledged instantly to introduce and enact, is also postponed. The Cabinet is divided. The public is irritated. Many are calling upon the Ministry to drop both Irish conscription and Irish Home Rule. To do that would be a confession of weakness and folly amounting to suicide. But as the case stands, Lloyd George is convicted of gross mishandling of both parts of the Irish question. If an Irish Government had muddled the thing up as badly as the English Government has done, we know what Englishmen would have said. The incurable levity of Irishmen would have been harped upon, their lack of cool heads and long views. But Irish impetuosity and imprudence would certainly have been put to it to get into a worse quagmire than the one into which Lloyd George has rushed.
> The pledges given by the Government on the floor of the House of Commons have not yet been fulfilled, and after the lapse of more than two weeks from the time when the Cabinet declared it would resign if Home Rule were not given to Ireland, the first draft of the proposed measure has not even been introduced at Westminster. Newspapers and members of Parliament are indignant, and British statesmen seem unable even to initiate plans for a settlement. According to the Evening Post, it has been suggested that "President Wilson be called in as umpire to decide both what form of government should be given to Ireland and what the Irish should do in the way of furnishing soldiers to the armies fighting Germany." The suggestion is perhaps chimerical, but it has been seriously advocated. Bernard Shaw, with his recognized skill at feeling the pulse of the English public, has put himself on record in a letter to the Manchester Guardian as follows;
> I have no doubt that if the Presidents of the French and American Republics were to claim from an Irish Parliament, as the payment of a debt for sympathy and for military and financial aid in the past, that the Irishman shall accept the common lot of the Frenchman and American in the general democratic struggle and make common cause with him in the field, the war fever would rage in Ireland as it has not yet raged in England. It is, therefore, useless for the Government to try and convince the world that it is Ireland that stands in the way of Irish reinforcements. There is no question between Ireland and the Allies. The Allies want the help of the Irish, and the Irish are, according to all their spokesmen, perfectly ready to recognize their responsibility and give it. But the English Government first refused Irish help out of pure fear of an Irish brigade, and now that a reverse on the west front frightens it out of its wits it insists on ordering the Irish into the English regiments as a dog is called to heel.

Mr. Lloyd George, in a letter acknowledging the receipt of a memorial signed by 60,000 Irish men and women resident in Great Britain, said that the re-establishment of concord in Ireland itself and between Ireland and Great Britain was the chief concern of British statesmanship. He continued:

> A real settlement not only will bring peace, but new prosperity and new strength both to Ireland and the Empire. There is no object which I have more closely at heart than to assist in composing this ancient controversy. I am bound to say, however, that the difficulties, which as you well know are sufficiently great, have not been rendered easier of settlement by the challenge to the supremacy of the Parliament of the Kingdom in that sphere which always has been regarded as properly belonging to it by all advocates of Home Rule which recently was issued by the Nationalist party and the Roman Catholic Hierarchy in concert with the leaders of the Sinn Fein.

Mr. Andrew Bonar Law, speaking in the House of Commons on May 1, declared that he did not know when the Home Rule bill would be introduced, a statement which was taken in some quarters to mean that the bill had been indefinitely postponed. Sir Edward Carson, writing to the secretary of the Southern Unionist party in Ireland, outlined his position very clearly.

> In the present condition of Ireland it seems to me little short of insanity for any Government to reopen the question of Home Rule. . . . This, indeed, is statesmanship manufactured out of panic and founded on broken pledges in breach of trust. If we have to go down, let's us do so with the flag flying and not in alliance with those whose object is to gain a vantage ground for enforcing further separation policies.

Ulster is more firmly fixed in its opposition to Home Rule than ever before, while the Nationalists and Sinn Feiners are equally opposed to conscription. On April 30 the national directorate of the United Irish League elected John Dillon chairman, to succeed the late John Redmond, and later passed unanimously a resolution of protest against the application of conscription to Ireland, which, it is declared, would be certain to end in failure and disaster. The resolution also called on the members of the league to "strengthen and extend its organization, with a view to co-operating effectively with the Mansion House conference in resisting conscription."

For a short time, it is said, the impression was current in Ireland that the Government intended to abandon its scheme of conscription. What gave rise to the impression was the appointment of Edward Shortt as Chief Secretary, a home ruler, elected by the Irish of Newcastle to Parliament, and on record as having voted against the application of conscription to Ireland. This impression, however, has been dissipated, partly by the announcement made in the Daily Mail that immediately on returning from the meeting of the Supreme War Council in France the Premier conferred with the committee in charge of the Home Rule bill, "with the result that there is reason to believe that a basis for the adjustment of the clauses dealing with Ulster and the customs and finance has been found." The same authority states it is now expected that the bill will be ready for presentation in Parliament by May 19. On May 5 it was announced that Field Marshal Viscount French has been appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that the Government will now pursue a "strong and firm Irish policy," offering Home Rule first and then calling upon Ireland to do its duty in the war.

Japan.—Baron Goto, Japan's new Foreign Minister, at a meeting of the chiefs of departments, held on April 27, announced that there would be no change in his country's war policy. He said that Japan would continue to give "encouragement, assistance and support to the work of reorganization in Russia," though "malevolent propaganda" in Siberia has been trying to estrange Japan and Russia by magnifying out of all proportion the importance of the landing of a few British and Japanese marines at Vladivostok. With regard to China, Baron Goto protests that Japan seeks nothing but "the friendship, cooperation and assistance" of her neighbor. "We ask China to disentangle herself from the old prejudices and maze of intrigue planted and fostered by the enemy." But in the first number of the Shanghai Gazette, its editor asserts that the Chinese Government has agreed to new demands that virtually hand over the country to the control of the Japanese. The Gazette declares:

War Policy Unchanged

> It may be stated safely that the following is not far from the true terms of the agreement: Chinese expeditionary forces sent to Siberia shall be commanded by a Japanese. Chinese police shall be organized by Japanese officers. Japan shall control all of China's arsenals and dockyards. Japan shall have the privilege of working mines in all parts of China. Special privileges shall be granted to Japan in Outer and Inner Mongolia and the whole of Manchuria.
> Other articles include provisions for financial control and educational assistance.

An earlier dispatch from Peking stated that the negotiations between the Chinese and Japanese Governments "were intended to refer solely to cooperation against the enemy, and that the agreement would lapse as soon as the European war terminated, without infringing on the political or territorial integrity of China."

Russia.—The latest news from Russia indicates that the country has reached almost the last stages of political and economic chaos, for such significant facts as the following are reported: At Kiev in a single day 1,048 officers were massacred by a Bolshevist mob, and numerous murders are committed in Petrograd but there are no convictions for them, as the courts have practically been abolished, and "rump" trials where anybody may testify or make a speech are common. In the streets of the capital generals in uniform sell papers and richly dressed ladies shovel snow while the Bolsheviki stand by and laugh. The formerly well-to-do now work as menials and noblewomen beg their bread from door to door. The officers on Russian ships have been murdered by their men, a skull and crossbones banner flies over the fortress of Sts. Peter and Paul and "The lower classes are simply making a prolonged spree of it."

Political and Economic Chaos

Frederick M. Corse, an American who recently arrived here from Petrograd, paints this gloomy picture of conditions in Russia:

> At the present time practically the whole Russian army has, of its own initiative, demobilized, and if the country could express the horrors of the present condition the world would be treated to one of the most harrowing recitals of human suffering ever recorded.
> Having demobilized the army, the Council of Laborers' and Soldiers' Deputies proceeded systematically to lay the foundation of a social revolution. Class hatred is now the dominant note in Russia. Banks and credit institutions have been nationalized; that is, merged into the State Bank. Industrial plants have been taken under the control and management of the laborers, the owners thereof being deprived of their property rights without compensation.
> All equities represented by stocks or bonds in credit institutions or industrial plants are canceled. Factories, mines, etc., under labor control and management are rapidly approaching collapse. Values in these properties have been so persistently destroyed that the stocks of private banks, whose value was chiefly represented by holdings and control of industrials, have become practically worthless.
> The private banks of Russia are bankrupt. The State Bank, into which the private banks have been merged, honors its own checks only for paying the excessive wages of labor. The ordinary depositor can realize on checks drawn up to a limited amount by paying a commission, or blackmail, to some banking official from 5 to 20 per cent of the amount drawn.
> Wholesale confiscation of private property, real and movable, is practised at the present time. Life is safe nowhere in the country. When I left Petrograd the intelligent and property classes were openly soliciting Germany to come and establish order. The proximity of German troops to the town was far less disquieting than the growing anarchy within.

Mr. Ray G. Knickerbocker, a metallurgist who has lately returned from Russia, gives a similar report, adding: "Germans who were taken prisoner are allowed to roam about the country at will, and have even been able to arm themselves."

The Genius of Sinn Feinism

JOHN F. FOGARTY.

FOR a true appreciation of the quality of Sinn Feinism as it now exists in Ireland, it is necessary to revert to but a few years ago, when it was not even an issue. The new political party is wielding such a mighty power today that the impression is abroad that it has now arrived at the culmination of a healthily developed movement. As a matter of fact, Sinn Feinism was a comparatively negligible force, politically considered, before Easter week, 1914, and it obtained its impetus not from the rising itself, but from the aftermath of the rebellion. Of course, there are many rhetorical enthusiasts of the cause who claim that the principles represented by Sinn Feinism are as old as the English invasion of Ireland. The contention makes better rhetoric than argument. Any Nationalist can advance a similar claim for his party. There are few newly discovered national principles, and political parties are but different interpretations of national purpose.

Following out the principle of the self-determination of nations, advocated by President Wilson, the destiny of Ireland ought not to be considered in the hands of Sinn Feiners or Nationalists, but of the Irish people at home as a nation. The Irish very clearly demonstrated through the Nationalist party what they wanted just before the outbreak of the war, so clearly, indeed, that Sinn Feiners are extremely shy of referring to it. They looked for a settlement that fell short of absolute independence. To explain the revulsion of policy in Ireland today it is not complimentary to the people to regard them as a kind of Shakespearian Roman mob ready to be swayed by every species of Mark Antony who comes their way. This seems, however, to be the general impression. Briefly, Sinn Feinism among the people is a purely artificial condition created by very untoward circumstances. Sinn Feinism now is a creation of the excesses of militarism in Ireland.

During the agitation for Home Rule a number of incidents occurred which clearly indicate that Ireland's present restlessness is a very consistent and natural result of the senseless shuffling of England. The English Government hesitated, in the first instance, to "coerce" the Orange element of the North, regardless of the right of majority rule, and regardless of the fact that in hesitating to force into line the Orange portion of Ulster it was in reality coercing what remained of Ulster as well as the rest of Ireland. There was the case of Sir Edward Carson, whose lawlessness and treason were condoned to a farcical extent. There was the case of men in high military command who refused to carry out government orders at variance with their politics. There were numerous other happenings combining to irritate the Irish sense of fairplay and justice. In view of these facts and in the light of the lenity meted out to men who were engaged in a similar revolution in South Africa, the Irish people smarted under discrimination. Then came the disastrous affair in Dublin. The revolution could have been turned to the greatest advantage by England had she so desired. The Government could have disarmed the Irish by a little kindness. Had the leaders of the insurrection been imprisoned, or even deported: had the pound of flesh been extracted with less disgusting avidity: had the people who had no connection with the affair been spared the objectionable obtrusion of military and police: had the extended system of prosecutions been halted at a logical time, Sinn Feinism would not have affected the body of the people. The stage was set for the magnanimous act of the Government, which was not forthcoming.

The inevitable ensued. Ireland's pent-up resentment exploded. The people grasped at the nearest thing at hand and the most effective weapon to register their protest. It is not that they assimilated the principles of Sinn Feinism; they simply seized on the most aggressive method of displaying their contempt of the way in which England had been handling their destinies. The movement became an attitude to them, not a conviction, not even an affiliation in the same sense that men in America are Republican or Democratic. Sinn Feinism grew apace with military operations carried on in Ireland at a most ill-omened time. As a noted Nationalist explained it: "What the Sinn Fein leaders had failed to do during all their years of work, the military authorities succeeded in doing in the course of two weeks, and for every Sinn Fein recruit that the Sinn Fein leaders made, the military authorities made thousands."

To anyone who appreciates this and had been in touch with Ireland when she bore the evidences of prosperity and content, the present crisis through which that unhappy land is passing is heartrending. It all seems like a terrible dream. Before the outbreak of the war there was nothing in the aspect of the country which could lead one to imagine the possibility of a revolution in Dublin. Now her present restlessness is the despair of those who knew her before Easter week, 1914, just as her wonderfully improved condition then was the admiration of exiles returning after years of absence. What really has happened needs a more logical explanation than that discontent has been camouflaged under the guise of content and prosperity. The explanation must take cognizance of the traditions, the sensibilities and human character of the Irish people. The English press is delivering the impression broadcast that Irishmen are adopting a policy of soreheadedness and irreconciliation at an inopportune time. That so many of the sons of the old land have already been sacrificed to German tyranny seems clear proof that the heart of Ireland is in the cause of justice and humanity. If conscription is being opposed now it is because the people feel that England is interested in Ireland only in so far as that interest regards her own welfare. And everything is conspiring to confirm the suspicion. There are thousands of worthy Irishmen who beheld in the work of the Liberal party the dawn of Ireland's delivery. They believed that England had at last discovered the secret of conciliating Ireland. In view of what has intervened they can hardly be censured for allying themselves with the milder Sinn Feinism of the kind which bespeaks their sense of indignation for trust betrayed.

A nation, like an individual, can be disappointed only to a certain stage. Beyond that point, if the offending party turns to harshness, however just, there is danger of lasting estrangement. Technically considered, the execution of the leaders of the Dublin uprising was possibly justifiable: but in analogous cases the processes of justice were stayed. Justice which discriminates is injustice. Once a precedent had been created it left the treatment of the Sinn Fein leaders a matter of expediency, and reduced to such a plane, the case of Ireland was clear. The hundreds of years of mismanagement and misunderstanding, the senseless parrying of the English Government when the course to pursue was clear and unmistakable, the endless shifting and shuffling were reason sufficient to induce clemency and consideration for a country more sinned against than sinning. But the conciliation of Ireland was once again subordinated to the demands of the law-and-order element, who, in the words of Lord Morley, "are responsible for at least as many of the fooleries of history as revolutionists are," and once more the unhappy country was left with an inheritance of discontent and, incidentally, of Sinn Feinism.

Such is the genius of a movement raised over-night from academical insignificance to a position of mighty prominence. It explains why worthy members of the Irish Hierarchy and priesthood who denounced the rebellion are themselves of Sinn Fein sympathies today. It proves that the present attitude of the Irish is as logical, consistent and human as an attitude can be. Indeed, it demonstrates how a man can be Nationalist and Sinn Feiner at the same time without being said to forego his Nationalist policies by adopting the principles of the other party.

"Catholic Parsons Battle's Heroes"

L. F. Happel

"YOU are too good a fighter to be in the clergy. Let someone else do the sky-pilot work." This was the remark addressed to the Rev. William J. Farrell, recently curate of St. Bernard's Church, West Newton, Mass., now a chaplain with the American Expeditionary Forces, by an officer of high rank, when the latter tendered the priest a fighting command. The offer was the result of the heroic conduct of Chaplain Farrell in the engagement at Seicheprey, Saturday night and Sunday morning, April 20 and 21. Among the few details touching this battle, which gave America its first lengthy casualty list from France, particular mention was made of Father Farrell's conduct. The chaplain went to the assistance of a battery after four of the American gunners had been killed, and carried ammunition, keeping the gun in action all night and finding, in the meantime, opportunity to discharge his priestly duties. Later, though wounded, he refused attention until he had first carried an injured lad to security. For this conduct, the press said, Father Farrell was officially cited for bravery and received the offer of a commission in the fighting line.

The same press dispatch mentioned, in the list of heroes of the same battle, the Rev. Osias J. Boucher, formerly assistant at St. Anthony's Church, West Bedford, Mass..; the Rev. John B. de Valles, formerly assistant at St. John the Baptist Church, in the same city, previously mentioned in dispatches for his valorous conduct and later decorated with the Cross of War, and the Rev. Michael J. O'Connor, formerly of St. Francis de Sales Church, Roxbury, Boston, now chaplain of a Massachusetts infantry regiment attached to the famous Rainbow Division of guardsmen. This honor roll of the American Catholic clergy comes from but a single, actually the first serious, engagement of the American troops in France.

The night at Seicheprey had no dearth of heroes. The troops that fought there were mainly those whose appreciation of the duty of patriotic service was keenest and who had few ties of responsibility that would hold a man back in the critical hour. For the most part they were men who leaped forward in response to the country's first call for defenders. Why then, when heroes manned every gun and defended every shell-hole, did the news correspondent pass by all except the chaplains? Possibly because the priest's duty, capably performed, is the more striking; as perhaps, too, for some people, the more surprising.

Meager as are the details that are offered in the cabled report, there is one deduction that can be drawn with absolute certainty. That commander who suggested that Father Farrell was too valiant to wear the sacred Cross was not a Catholic. His attitude is typical of that displayed by a large element of the non-Catholic world, since the days of August, 1914, when priests again entered the battlefield in one capacity or another. Had that commander been a Catholic, Father Farrell's conduct would possibly have passed wholly unnoted; at best, it might have been commented upon as an instance when duty was well done and an expectation was fulfilled. One thing is fact. No chapter of the war's record shows more glorious achievement than that which tells the history of how the priesthood of the Catholic Church behaved on the various battlefields of the world during these last four years. Catholics, of course, expected nothing else. The early message from the field of Seicheprey was one that they awaited with certainty.

Still, about much that is written concerning the priest and his services in trenches and hospitals, there is a tone suggestive of surprise, as though the writer had witnessed a marvel, absolutely opposed to his previous conviction, and which he hastens to tell to what he fears will be a skeptical audience. Nowhere is this tone of amazement more pronounced than when it touches upon the French clergy. Two wholly satisfactory explanations suggest themselves: First of all, the surprise is great because, plainly, her priesthood owed little to France. A world, fast returning to the old law of an eye for an eye, could not appreciate why the exiled clergy of France should leave the peace and security of foreign lands, hasten back to the shambles of Europe, and fight for a country that had persecuted them and persisted in that course even in the face of their loyalty. But if anyone knew the pulse of France, it was her priesthood. The exiled clergy were well aware that the unsightly, repulsive eruption which was festering in Paris was only skin-deep, and that the blood that coursed through the veins of France could be easily purged and made wholesome again. When the German invader crossed the frontier the priests did not return from a hundred lands of exile at the cry of alarm of a traitorous Caillaux or a persecuting Viviani, but in response to a message sent over the wires of love from the hearts of their own people, their former pupils, parishioners and penitents.

There is yet another reason why the clergy of France are the most frequently mentioned of all heroes in the annals of the war. The anti-clerical control of France put into the hands of the priest the rifle and bayonet instead of the sacred oils. Actually, this gave the priests a greater opportunity to distinguish themselves; for the world will always see first the man who leaps forward determined to die rather than halt, while only second sight reveals the stretcher-bearer who follows in his wake, facing the same rain of shells but merely giving succor to the wounded. That is why the heroism of the priesthood of France is touched on by virtually all who have written the record of their experiences in dugouts and trenches and shell-holes. These praises, too, the clergy of France deserve; but not the suggestion of surprise that often lurks about the words that tell of their valor.

I wonder what those Catholic boys of Massachusetts, who fought at Seicheprey, thought of Fathers Farrell and Boucher, of Fathers de Valles and O'Connor? Was there one of them who stumbled and fell, with the whole, firm flesh of the previous moment torn and bleeding, surprised when he opened his eyes to meet the bronze Cross on the khaki collar? Rather, would he not have been surprised if his eyes had failed to see that Cross, knowing as he must that there was a Catholic chaplain attached to his battery or regiment? When we have that all too rare thought of our own last hour, does not the picture that flashes through our mind invariably include the purple-stoled priest with his hand raised in absolution? Is it not an innate conviction with us that this grace shall be ours, provided our last breath is mercifully deferred till the nearest priest has time to hasten to our side?

If the lepers of Molakai had their Damien, who was ready to enter their living tomb, where death, lingering, revolting, agonizing, but certain, awaited him, shall there be none of God's anointed mindful of the men who fall on the field of honor, though it be the most shell-spattered field of all Picardy?

"My wife, my children, are dearer than life to me." Often are these words heard from the lips of husband and father, and history has given proof that they are not empty words. Yet, will a man who has closed his heart forever to the love of wife and child, as a sacrifice that would make him more perfect in a higher calling, hesitate to give what is much less, his mortal life, in the performance of the most sacred duty of his vocation? The certainty that, if circumstances make it at all possible for a priest to come to us when we are on the borderland of eternity, a priest will be at our side, is a conviction that is deeply engraved in our hearts. It was put there possibly by his pledge to us; a pledge valued by some indefinable, nevertheless positive, light in the clerical eye. More probably it was a personal experience that gave birth to the conviction; or the reading of some incident, the details of which we may have forgotten, but the purport of which is with us still.

It may be that the mention of Nashville will stir the memory. It was half a century ago when the country was sated with sorrow, suffering and death. Americans too had had their heroes. Men who had not flinched on the bloodiest fields of the "sixties" were marching the streets of every city ready to be acclaimed valiant warriors. Pestilence followed war in Nashville, Tennessee. The days were among the direst the Southland has ever known. The Bishop of Nashville was the late Mgr. P. A. Feehan, subsequently first Archbishop of Chicago. When the plague fell on the city, and all who could, no matter what their responsibilities, fled to security, the Bishop sounded a call to his priests to remain, every man, at his post. They did. They anointed fevered brows and yellow hands, brows and hands that it was death to touch. The only reward was the consciousness that another's hour of anguish had been eased and probably a soul saved; that a duty had been well done and death faced. Death was met, too. Mound upon mound was added to the row in the Catholic cemetery. In all thirty-three of God's servants in the priesthood laid down their lives in the performance of their great duty, their duty to the dying.

Such incidents as that just narrated, what are they to a world that expects a hero to scrape the skies in a battleplane? There were wholly lacking in plague-smitten

Nashville the luring music of batteries and the onward-spurring, soul-gripping glamor that even a battelfield of today has. So a world, given to placing a higher value on the stage-setting than on the acting, passes by Bishop Feehan and his priests. Yet Catholics, when they meet this incident and a hundred like it, though they may only pause momentarily, yet they do pause long enough to draw from it another prop to support the conviction that leads the dying men in Flanders to open their eyes in the expectation that they will meet the bronze Cross on the khaki collar.

No, there is no Catholic who would at all minimize the nobility of the chaplains' services at Seicheprey, or on any other field where the American Expeditionary Forces will fight. Let that tale of heroism be told as often as there is an ear bent to hear it, for the greater is the chance then that some small impression will be left on the indifferent mind of the world. But we Catholics when we open our morning paper and read the black-lettered head, "Catholic Parsons Battle's Heroes," do not know a moment's surprise. Truly, there is a thrill of satisfaction; but it is that of an expectation realized at the earliest possible moment.

A Great Irish Prelate

LAURENCE P. MURRAY

THE death, on the eve of St. Patrick's feast, of the Most Rev. John Healy, Archbishop of Tuam, has left a gap in Irish ecclesiastical scholarship which it will not be easy to fill. In the long line of Archbishops of Tuam we find the names of many illustrious saints, scholars and patriots, Jarlath, Catholicus O'Duffy, Florence Conry, Malachy O'Queely and John MacHale, but the latest occupant of the sea of St. Jarlath has left a name that must always remain prominent among the greatest of those who adorned the episcopacy, not merely of Tuam, but of all Ireland. The announcement of his death caused profound regret throughout the whole English-speaking Catholic world, in every portion of which his writings are well known.

Ballinafad, on the picturesque shores of Lough Arrow, in County Sligo, has the honor of being the birthplace of this distinguished churchman. Educated at the diocesan college in Sligo, and at the National Seminary of Maynooth, he numbered among his class-fellows four men afterwards destined to be his coworkers in the Irish episcopacy, Edward Thomas O'Dwyer, James Browne, Joseph Hoare, and Robert Browne. His contemporaries in Maynooth also included the present Cardinal Primate of Armagh, Archbishop Walsh of Dublin and the late Archbishop Carr of Melbourne. Even among such able students, Healy was recognized as the leader, and when he was ordained in 1867 he left Maynooth with the reputation of being its most brilliant student since the time of John MacHale.

From 1867 to 1879 he labored in his native diocese of Elphin, chiefly as assistant priest in the parishes of Ballygar and Grange. In 1879 he was appointed to one of the chairs of theology in Maynooth, and in 1883 he became prefect of the Dunboyne Establishment, the post-graduate seminary of the Irish priesthood. During the greater part of his time at Maynooth he was editor of the Irish Ecclesiastical Record, and it can safely be said that, with the possible exception of Studies of our own day, no Irish publication ever attained such a high standard as did the Record under Dr. Healy's guidance. In 1884 he was appointed Coadjutor Bishop of Clonfert and titular Bishop of Macra, and in 1896 he succeeded to the See of Clonfert. In 1903 he was endowed with the crozier and mitre of the historic archdiocese of Tuam. It was on St. Patrick's Day, 1903, that Dr. Healy was installed in the Cathedral of St. Jarlath, and fifteen years later, almost to the very day, on the eve of the feast of the great Saint whose life he had done so much to make known, he passed to his eternal reward.

Here in America the deceased prelate is best known and will be remembered by the many learned and scholarly works that he produced, works which no student of Irish history can afford to neglect. All his leisure time was devoted to the patient study of the history, literature and antiquities of his native land, and his output of works on these subjects was amazing. His vacations he usually spent in Ireland, traveling on foot over each county, collecting the traditions that had gathered around the holy wells, the ancient castles, the ruined abbeys and the famous battlefields, and tracing the footsteps of saints and heroes who in bygone days had made Ireland famous. A complete list of the articles which he wrote for various magazines and for the booklets of the Irish Catholic Truth Society would fill several pages of this journal. He wrote most of the important articles on Irish history in the "Catholic Encyclopedia," and in few of the volumes is his name missing from the list of contributors. The "History of Maynooth College," a gigantic work of over a thousand pages, shows wide and varied research. But the two books by which he will always be best known, "Ireland's Ancient Schools and Scholars" and "The Life and Writings of St. Patrick," call for a more extended notice.

The first of these books was published in 1890, and was so successful that within a few years it reached five editions. It deals with a period which is admittedly the most important as well as the most interesting in the history of the Irish race. It would be impossible to mention in even the most summary way the contents of the twenty-four chapters which make up this volume. Having acquired from ancient manuscripts and annals an intimate knowledge of the lives of the different actors in the brilliant drama that he was to describe, the author perfected and corrected that knowledge by visiting every place of historical interest in Ireland. Calm judgment and well-balanced deliberation are everywhere in evidence; and rarely do his conclusions outstep the limits warranted by the premises at his disposal. But the chief explanation of the extraordinary success of the work lies in its order of treatment and its elegance of style. The writings of O'Donovan and O'Curry are probably more erudite, but their contempt for the loftier graces of style repels all but the professional historian. Modern taste in literature is so refined that even the writer on technical subjects who ignores the accepted principles of composition is certain to be left behind in the race for success.

Dr. Healy had at his command a better medium than the lumbering style in favor with the majority of learned historians. His warm imagination and his elegance of diction enshroud even the commonplace with the glow and brilliance of romance. At one time he moves rapidly, carried along by the impetuous torrent of his own eloquence and gradually communicating to the reader the enthusiasm which he himself feels; at another, when he leisurely moralizes on the rules of human action and of moral obligation, his language assumes the solemnity and the impressiveness of the inspired text. By its vivid descriptions, its judicious grouping of incidents, its dramatic development of character and its deeply religious tone, the book, throughout its whole length, holds the unwavering attention of the reader.

From the point of view of scholarship, the second volume, "Life and Writings of St. Patrick," is not so satisfactory. Ireland's Patron Saint has always exercised a wonderful fascination over biographers, and more than two-hundred works dealing directly or indirectly with his life and teachings are known to exist. Unfortunately, many of these biographers, by a judicious process of elimination and addition, have tried to shape the Saint's teaching according to their own tenets. Episcopalians trace from him an unbroken episcopal succession; Presbyterians claim that he antedated Knox by centuries; Methodists and Baptists can each prove that he was an upholder of their respective creeds; while Catholics are mildly amused at the insanity of all the others. The presence of this much-claimed apostle was too much for German rationalist lore, and Zimmer outdid them all when, by sheer force of philological criticism, he proved to an astonished world that Patrick had never existed. It was a daring thing for his Grace of Tuam to enter this arena, and almost rash was the gage of battle which he threw down in the opening sentence of the introduction. "Our chief purpose in writing this new life of Patrick, when so many lives already exist, is to give a fuller and more exact account of the Saint's missionary labors than any that has appeared since the Tripartite Life was first written."

In a question of this kind the claim of fulness and accuracy depends entirely on the authenticity of the sources used. Dr. Healy based his whole narrative upon the lives preserved in the Book of Armagh, the Epistle to Coroticus, and the seven Lives preserved by the patriotic friar, John Colgan. In accepting all these works as genuine, he brushed aside most of the findings of the last fifty years of Irish scholarship, and substituted only his own personal opinions. Especially in regard to those lives attributed to Aileran the Wise, Secundinus, Probus, and Loman, there is not an authority on Irish history who would agree with his Grace. However, we have no desire to examine, in the light of recent historical findings, the many loose statements and assumptions in which the work abounds. It is sufficient to say that the great labors of such men as O'Curry, O'Donovan, Jubainville, Stokes, Zeuss and Zimmer were to the author as though they had never existed, and that, as far as scholarship goes, the work is such as might have been expected from the eighteenth century.

If the scholars were disappointed, it was otherwise with the wide circle of readers who cared little for textual criticism. The book immediately became the most popular work on early Irish ecclesiastical history, and by Irish Catholics generally it is considered the standard life of their Patron Saint. The reason is clear. The author is at his best in narration, and the account of St. Patrick's labors is consistently graphic and interesting. His trustworthy knowledge of Irish topography and of the legends that have gathered around the places hallowed by Patrick's presence gives to the work a vividness that is usually absent from biographical sketches. In addition, the author's frank acceptance of most of the miracles attributed to St. Patrick makes the volume a welcome one to many who are sick of the unbelief of modern scholarship.

In politics the Archbishop occupied a peculiar position between popularity and unpopularity. His attitude of studied neutrality sometimes attracted unfriendly comment, and by a small section of extremists he was regarded as little better than an English Tory. In his opposition to Socialism he was uncompromising, and it was due almost entirely to his efforts that the mushroom propaganda of the little anti-clerical Socialist clique in Dublin during the early years of the twentieth century collapsed almost more quickly than it had begun. On occasion, too, he told sharp social truths even to his own followers. In 1907 he bluntly told a meeting of the clerical managers of primary schools that their retention of their positions depended on efficiency, kindness and tolerance. "Prove yourselves intelligent, efficient, and tolerant. Visit the schools constantly, make things comfortable for the poor children, treat the teachers with consideration, and do away with domination and tyranny." He was forever warning the Irish priests against political entanglements and against intolerance on questions where religion and morality had no direct bearing. On one occasion, when a prominent Irish priest, in the course of a paper on Socialism, tried to warn his audience against many things which were not Socialism at all, the Archbishop bluntly interrupted him with the remark that it was the duty of the State, or the Government, or the community, to find work for everybody who is able and willing to work.

Universities and learned societies vied in honoring him. From the Royal University, of which he was senator, he received the degree of LL.D. He was also senator of the National University, as well as a member of the governing board of the Galway University. He was a member of the Royal Irish Academy, Vice-President of the Royal Antiquarian Society, founder of the Galway Archaeological Society, and President of the Irish Catholic Truth Society. As a member of the Robertson University Commission he handled some of the hostile witnesses in a way that could not be surpassed by an expert lawyer. As a public speaker he had no equal among Irish churchmen of his day. His varied and extensive knowledge, his power of intellect, his poetic temperament, the splendid voice, and the stately figure crowned by a noble head, with the kindly flashing eye, gave a surpassing dignity to his presence. In the administration of his own diocese he displayed a remarkable zeal in providing churches and schools. According to the testimony of his own priests, he was an ideal archbishop. In an address presented to him in 1909, on the occasion of the silver jubilee of his consecration, the clergy of his diocese declared:

> We have a deep admiration for your sense of justice, which should be the first characteristic of every bishop. We have confidence in the fearless courage, rising superior to every other consideration, with which you raise a warning voice whenever you see danger threatening the interest of our holy religion.

In his reply the Archbishop, probably for the first time in any of his public utterances, touched a personal and intimate note:

> With regard to my writings, I was certainly in earnest in all the literary work that I undertook, and, above all, I was inspired with the life-long purpose of doing the best I could for the honor of God and the glory of Erin. Since I began my missionary life as a poor curate, I have devoted all my leisure time to the patient and loving study of the history, the literature, and the antiquities of ancient Ireland. I found it to be a mine of untold wealth, and I sought to make known as clearly as I could to others the marvelous lives and achievements of the saints and scholars of ancient Erin. I sought to trace their footsteps over hills and through valleys. I visited their little oratories in the wildest and remotest islands round our coasts. I once rode through a midnight storm until morning's dawn, to get an opportunity of visiting the holy island of Lough Derg, and I visited every place where Patrick was reputed to have sojourned, not only here in Ireland, but in Scotland, Wales, France, in the islands of the Tyrrhene Sea, and through the deep valleys of the Italian Alps. There are some people now disposed to regard me as a West Briton, if not something worse, because I cannot fit myself into the rigid mold they have been kind enough to cast for me, but I am sure that thinking men, both now and hereafter, will judge me by my acts and writings, rather than by such wild statements, and I am prepared to abide by that test.

The test is altogether in favor of the great Archbishop.

Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

AMONG the decisive determinants of the question whether prohibition of sacramental wine is constitutional stands the great Ordinance of 1787, which, in order "to fix and establish . . . the fundamental principles of civil and religious liberty . . . as the basis of all laws, constitutions and governments which forever hereafter shall be formed" in our new territory, ordains as "forever unalterable except by common consent," six organic "articles of compact between the original States and the people and States in the said territory"; and it lays down as first of these: "No person . . . . shall be ever molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments . . ." The First and Tenth Amendments, considered by themselves alone, might not preclude a State, as Bryce and some others infer, from establishing or proscribing a religion; but read together with this Ordinance, which was enacted in its final form of 1790 by the same Congress that proposed and proclaimed these Amendments, they cannot be held to yield any such construction. Least of all may they be construed to permit any Catholic to "be molested on account of his mode of worship," which then as now was, and was known to be, essentially the Mass. Then, even more than now, Protestants had a vivid consciousness of what Mr. Birrell has crystallized in the dictum: "It is the Mass that matters." They had proscribed it on their advent to these shores, and kept on proscribing it till the colonies became by the Constitution chemically compounded into the United States. Catholics were penalized in most colonies and restricted in all; but the essential of our "mode of worship" most specifically proscribed was precisely that which had been so proscribed in their motherland. Elizabeth and her persecuting successors had made the Mass treasonable to celebrate and felonious to attend, and hunted, banished or executed "Mass-priests" as traitors to the realm. The Protestant colonists brought hither the same bias. Occasionally some of them bore hard on one another, but invariably all of them bore harder upon Catholics. Whatever else was tolerated, the Mass was banned and its celebrants and hearers were always civilly and often physically molested. Mass had to be said covertly in even the Catholic manors of Maryland till 1770, and its semi-public celebration in Philadelphia elicited storms of protest against the "Popish Mass."

Now, Madison and Jefferson and Washington and the other founders of the Constitution who procured or inspired the enactment of religious liberty in Virginia and nine other States prior to 1790 were thoroughly cognizant that the Catholic religion would be its chief beneficiary and that Catholic worship was distinctively the Mass. They had seen Mass proscribed in colonial days and during the War of Independence they had witnessed its celebration. Benedict Arnold also knew its significance, and issued a proclamation making such attendance a justification for his treason: "The eye which guides this pen lately [May 4, 1780] saw your mean and profligate Congress at Mass for the Soul of a Roman Catholic in purgatory." (Miralles, the Spanish Envoy.)

Hence, (1) when President Washington and the First Constitutional Congress ratified a few years later the fundamental Ordinance restraining any State from ever molesting any person on account of his mode of worship they knew both that it was chiefly Catholics who were subject to molestation and that the characteristic Catholic worship was the Mass. (2) When the same Congress proposed to the States and the same President signed the First Amendment, they were simply putting on themselves and their successors the same restraint they had already laid down for all future States. It matters not that legislatures and people did not always rise in practice to the high level of the standard so suddenly set. That three States retained for a while, and others occasionally imposed, religious restrictions does not prove they had constitutional warrant therefor. It takes time for the full appreciation of constitutional as well as doctrinal development to filter into clouded or biased minds; but the lagging trio gradually fell into the line of religious liberty with their elder and younger sisters and with every State and territory now under the Union flag. The Ulpian and Justinian maxim that "Long-standing customs approved by the consent of those who practised them take the place of law," obtains in all civilized communities. Its force is intensified when law itself is approved and consolidated by universal custom coeval with our national life.

The ordinances, compacts, treaties and customs of the United States under its own Constitution strengthen immensely the historical foundation of Justice Brewer, who has based mainly on pre-constitutional traditions and tendencies the Supreme Court judgment in favor of Trinity Church, that in this country every law must be interpreted as favoring, and none as denying, Christian beliefs and practices, and "no purpose of action against religions can be imputed to any legislation, State or national." (143 U. S., 465.) His further ground of judgment, weighted by many precedents,—that courts must interpret an act not by its letter but by the intent of the legislators, and that to find the intent courts must consider the evil to be remedied, contemporaneous events and circumstances, and all other extraneous aids to certitude—bears with closer pertinence and wider import on the right of a universal religious body to practise its essential worship than on the privilege of a congregation to import a minister.

Hence, to find the intent of the First Amendment, inhibiting Federal restrictions on religious freedom, courts must consider the special evils to be remedied thereby, mainly anti-Catholic discriminations; contemporaneous events, including the important Catholic contributions to our liberties so pointedly emphasized by Washington; and, above all, the extended value given to Section II, Article IV of the Constitution when in 1790 territorial ordinances came into force. This section reads: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States." Now, when the new States came into the Union they came under formal compact, irrevocable except "by common consent," to accept the principles of civil and religious liberty as the basis of all their laws and constitutions, and, definitively, to molest no peaceable person on account of his mode of worship. Therefore religious liberty and freedom of worship were among the "privileges and immunities" of such States; and hence, under Article IV, every citizen of all other States was and is equally entitled to them. Various sectional interests and antagonisms obscured the full implication of this constitutional provision; the first section of the Fourteenth Amendment brought it clearly to light:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the States wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States.

The writers who see in this section no protection against State restrictions of religious rights strangely overlook the clause defining citizenship as primarily national. Its immediate purpose was to protect the rights, not merely of the emancipated negroes, but also of the business men of New York State, who were appealing for congressional aid against invidious discrimination by other States. The response of Congress was, says Hannis Taylor, "the first positive definition ever given to citizenship of the United States as a primary and substantive thing independent of State citizenship"; and the Fourteenth Amendment, "by creating a national citizenship as the primary citizenship," merely carried the principle of Article IV to its logical conclusion: "That the sum of Federal power vested in the new Constitution should operate not upon States, but directly upon individuals," who "should be primarily its own citizens" (Science of Jurisprudence, pp. 459-461). Mr. Taylor has been cited as uncertain of what the Supreme Court will do in a given case, as all but prophets are; but he is quite certain of what it can do. Its jurisdiction being coextensive with the Constitution, which by intent and definition empowers the national authority to protect every citizen in his religious and other common privileges and immunities, the Supreme Court has power to nullify all laws prohibitive thereof.

That the Constitution should be such a national instrument was, in fact, the intent of its builders. In the Constitutional Convention of 1787, Randolph carried his motion, that the "authority of legislature, executive and judiciary must be supreme," on the ground that since "a confederacy is a mere compact, a national, supreme government must have a complete and compulsive operation"; and Wilson of Pennsylvania forecast the Fourteenth Amendment in his assenting statement: "A citizen of America is a citizen of the general Government, and is a citizen of the State in which he resides." Madison insisted that the new system was not a violable treaty between legislatures, but an inviolable constitution founded on the people and paramount to the States' individual authority; and he carried ratification in Virginia despite the eloquence of Patrick Henry, who vigorously opposed it precisely on Madison's ground, that it was "a consolidated national government." On the same ground the Constitution met strong opposition in most ratifying States; but in each the supporters of national government triumphed, and they also carried Madison's kindred contention, that ratification be absolute, and amendments be submitted as "declaratory truths not affecting the validity of the act."

The fact of primary and indestructible national citizenship, and of the consequent right and power of Congress to act directly on the people, who "as distinguished from a government . . . constitute the State," was embodied, 1868, in the decision of the Supreme Court in Texas v. White, on constitutional grounds antedating the Fourteenth Amendment (7 Wallace, U. S. 700). But this Article further emphasizes the full implication of "privileges and immunities" and the power of the national Government to protect every citizen therein. On the other hand, it makes the individual directly amenable to the national authority; and hence, should the prohibition amendment pass, every State and citizen, whether assenting or dissenting, will be legally bound by it, unless and until the Supreme Court declare it unconstitutional. Must the Supreme Court so declare?

Padre Serra and San Diego

J. J. MURPHY

THREE district squadrons of military airplanes, twenty-four in all, were simultaneously on the wing today over San Diego. Flying daily in the turquoise sky of this superb climate, air men indorse the choice of that very practical dreamer, Padre Junipero Serra. A Divine sense of humor that rainbows the clouds of life made him take in religion the name of that genial Brother Junipero, whose sweetness of character caused the blithe, human St. Francis d'Assisi to wish that he had a whole forest of such junipers.

The sun, as blue over San Diego as above that beautiful Italy, where the Apostle of God's open air caroled his joyous lay to Brother Sun, shone on a motley crowd that July 16, 1769, feast of the Triumph of the Holy Cross, when the mother country commemorates the victory in 1212 of Catholic Spain over the Moors on the fields of Navas de Tolosa. That day gave a foretaste of heaven to Padre Serra, whose patriotic idealism and passionate energy yearned for years to explore Alta California for faith and fatherland. Would that some artist would picture that scene on a hillside near our sapphire bay, in 1604, christened San Diego.

Representing royalty stands Don Gaspar de Portala, in the dress of a Spanish grandee, while Padre Serra, in rough habit, impresses one by force of character apart from all trappings of circumstance and state. Nearby are a few soldiers, weather clad, forerunners of the aviators that now loop the loop over the spot, together with a few servants, muleteers, and the cattle that filled the little ship, which took months for a voyage our airplanes can make in hours. The trees furnished a cross in front of California's first church of brush laid on stout poles. From another tree hangs the Spanish bells, that today ring the Angelus at "Old Town," the adobe cradle of modern California.

In a letter home Padre Serra describes the first families: "The men naked, the women and children honestly covered from the breasts down with a sort of fiber cloth." It did not require California's bright sun to make Padre Serra see big with unbounded optimism:

"The bravest are the tenderest,
The loving are the daring."

He so well set the example of being at the head when hardship or exploration called, that in the California Franciscan lexicon which fate reserves for eternal recognition, there was no such word as slacker. Padre Serra, suffering from a very sore leg, submitted to the treatment of a muleteer, who applied the only remedy he knew, that which healed the backs of his beasts, a plaster of herbs and hot tallow. While the Padre limped for life, "many a time and oft" did he walk between the Mission and the port, where today is coaling H. M. S. Lancaster, whose sister ship, the Monmouth, was sunk November, 1914, off the coast of Chile by the German Admiral von Spee's fleet. Up the King's Highway to Monterey did our Padre trudge to hold his own with the Castilian governors, who evidently did not leave the superior race above reproach. A believer in retributive justice, he warned the soldiers that "as you oppress the natives, another people will come putting their feet on your necks." With political wrangling and the daily struggle with ignorant and troublesome charges, life was not all sunshine, but God blessed our hero with a friend, Padre Juan Crespi. In the Mission's darkest hour of starvation, when the commandants ordered the return to Mexico, Father Crespi alone promised to stay with Padre Serra, who had so little idea of giving up that he sent by one of the sailors an order for a supply of holy oils. True-hearted Padre Crespi! Is it any wonder that Serra, who asked nothing in life, made the dying request to lie forever at your side? Kindred spirits were Serra and Crespi, whose journals even yet make good reading, cheery with the joy of adventure, and an ardent interest in plants, in Indians as Indians, in soldiers, animals, and the hundred and one things of a strange land where nature is so bountiful.

Though San Diego scored the first thousand Baptisms, many natives did not enter the fold, preferring the mountain to the mission. One old chief scorned friars, soldiers, white men in general, who he argued were nobody's superior, for did they not die the same as Indians? This red Douglas held his own in the camp of his enemies, where a fellow feeling for even a heathen with backbone made the Padre wondrous kind. When a savage inland tribe killed the youthful priest, Louis Jayme, Padre Serra would not allow the guards to punish them. The name of this proto-martyr who "fell asleep" a mass of wounds and blood from stoning, "only his consecrated hands uninjured," as an eye-witness tells us, should be a household word in the land which Serra gratefully predicted would be converted and civilized by the martyr's sacrifice.

The Padres never were self-advertisers, and the personal element in their written records is very meagre. Their monuments are the olives, the palms, the oranges, figs and grapes, the feathery pepper trees, the flower seeds brought from Spain, and best of all, the abiding faith of the Indians.

Padre Serra was the pioneer California "hustler," working as a common laborer among the natives, making adobes and lifting heavy pieces of wood. Very holy he was, too, and kind. In the first years when there was hardly anything to eat, he went hungry, but prosperous days see him delighting the little ones with brown sugar and chocolate, and their parents with beads of glass, which they regarded as diamonds. Anticipating present-day health foods, the big copper kettle of nourishing cereals was always accessible. The hospitality of the Missions became a proverb among the Yankees, English and Russians, who sailed the Pacific. Palon, Serra's biographer, has left us a picture of his last home, Mission San Carlos, Monterey, an adobe hut open to the chill ocean wind, where this true son of St. Francis lived without any other housekeeper than Lady Poverty. Here in pain and prayer were spent Serra's last days, and here, August 28, 1784, he went to the reward of his labors. His body lies beside that of Padre Crespi and others of that apostolic company that brought religion and civilization to this great State.

It seems not a far cry from Mission days to our own, when a short time since Padre Serra's cope, sent him from Avila in Spain by St. Teresa's daughters, covered the broad shoulders of an edifying Soggarth, carrying the Blessed Sacrament in a Corpus Christi procession under the graceful pepper trees planted by Serra's brethren. Manly José and Pablo bearing lillies aloft, black-eyed, straight-haired Dolorita and Ysobel scattering roses before Our Lord, preceded their swarthy parents in new suits and light shoes, carrying the candles of faith lighted by Padre Serra.

Letters, as a rule, should not exceed six hundred words.

Dr. Ryan and Mr. Neacy

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. T. J. Neacy's letter in AMERICA for April 27 shows that he still judges both employers and employees by their minority performances. Labor unions have occasionally done unjust things; therefore, labor unions are essentially evil. Some employers have been more benevolent than the civil law; therefore, all employers always treat their employees fairly. By this method one could readily show that atheism is practically superior to Christianity!

Mr. Neacy unwittingly does me an injustice when he asserts that the secondary boycott of the dealers in Buck's stoves had my "hearty approval." I do not recall that I ever expressed or even mentally assumed such an attitude. On looking over the article on "The Morality of Labor Unions," which I had the honor to contribute to the "Catholic Encyclopedia," I find this statement: "In practice, the secondary boycott is immoral, except in extreme cases." So far as I can recollect, this has been my conviction ever since I first gave the subject serious attention. Possibly Mr. Neacy applied to the Buck case some remarks which I made on boycotting in an address which he heard me deliver in Milwaukee several years ago. If so he certainly misunderstood me; for I am confident that I did not express approval of that particular boycott. One incident of that occasion I do recall clearly and with considerable satisfaction; it was Mr. Neacy's assurance to me, after the lecture, that I was "the sanest of all the labor defenders."

He finds fault with my book, "A Living Wage," because it did not exhort workingmen to give "an honest day's work for a fair day's pay." But I saw no reason to emphasize the obvious. Besides, the subject of that volume was not the rights and duties of labor, but the right of labor to a living wage. In 1906 this right was so far from obvious to the majority of employers, and to a large section of persons who are neither employers nor employees, that it seemed to demand my entire attention.

If Mr. Neacy thinks that I regard labor as always in the right and capital as always in the wrong, he is much mistaken. I am under no such illusion; for I realize that laborers have about the same kind of human nature as capitalists. The offenses of the two classes differ because of different circumstances. Mr. Neacy sees so vividly the crimes of loafing and violence committed by labor that his vision reflects only dimly, if at all, the crimes of sweating and extortion which lie at the door of capital. If I have given more attention to the sins of capital, it is because I have felt that they were on the whole more grievous and more injurious to helpless human beings than the sins of labor. If I have devoted most of my energies to the rights and welfare of labor, it is because these represent the weaker and more needy class. Pope Leo XIII declared that the poor and helpless have claims to special consideration from the State, because they "have no resources of their own to fall back upon, whereas the richer class have many ways of shielding themselves."

The attitude of opposition to labor unions and to collective bargaining, to which Mr. Neacy still clings, has become almost antiquated among respectable employers. In this connection I would invite his calm and prayerful attention to the principles and recommendations adopted a few weeks ago by President Wilson's Labor Program Board. The six employer members united with the six labor members and with Messrs. Taft and Walsh in unanimous approval of the right of labor to organize and to bargain collectively. The world moves.

Irish Death-Rate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The interesting article by Dr. O'Malley on the above subject, in your issue of April 6, omits one feature which, if known, might alter greatly the significance of the figures quoted, that is, the average ages of the populations compared. May not the higher Irish death-rate be due to age rather than to nationality? Dr. O'Malley tells us that the Irish, instead of being the most numerous among the nations represented, as they once were, are now in the fifth place. It is a fair inference that as the present-day New York Irish are mainly a remnant of the immigrants of long ago they must have on the average, a much higher age than the Jews and Italians, who are for the most part, recent arrivals.

The death-rate shown by the American table of mortality at the age of 55 years, is over 18 per thousand, while at the age of 35 it is less than 9 per thousand. If the average age of the Irish population of New York is, let us say, 20 years greater than that of the Jews or Italians, it follows that there must be a correspondingly higher rate of mortality in the former group, even though there may be present also, less ability to resist disease. If the comparative figures could be shown, age by age, or even for groups of ages it would probably be found that the variations on account of nationality would tend to disappear.

Prohibition, the Constitution, the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Father Kenny's article, "Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass," cannot fail to inspire amazement in every reader of your magazine who is a lawyer. Its effect will be harmful, as it will lull into security those who should be vigilant. Let me reiterate, what other lawyers have already asserted in your pages, that this is a matter over which the States have complete control, and that the State legislatures should be watched and enlightened. Of course, this statement must be qualified by a reference to Mr. Elder's able article on the Oklahoma Enabling act, but even this is an open question.

There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States that protects the individual's religious freedom as against the adverse action of the States. The first amendment reads: "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." There is not a shadow of authority for the opinion that the Fourteenth Amendment offers any guarantee in this regard. Father Kenny's reference to the famous Northwest Ordinance of 1787 is surprising, in view of the fact that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the provisions of this Ordinance cease to operate in any territory within its purview when such territory is created into a State (Pernoli v. Municipality, 3 How., 589). See also Strader v. Graham, 10 How., 82, which holds that as to Kentucky this ordinance was superseded by the adoption of the United States Constitution.

This whole question should be settled not by philosophic speculation, but by actual reference to the decisions of our highest judicial tribunals. Any impartial person, who takes the trouble to spend half an hour in such an investigation, will quickly discover that reliance on Federal questions in this matter is indeed leaning on broken reeds. So, please let us have no more talk of outworn theories of State rights and the like, unless such statements are buttressed by reference to authority more substantial than mere conjecture. And, by the way, if theological questions are to be left to theologians, to whom should legal questions be entrusted?

Tulsa, Okla. HORACE H. HAGAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A great deal is being said and written for and against prohibition. Extremists among Catholics and non-Catholics alike fairly revel in it. But there is a good deal of sanity among the people at large; the great majorities given to the anti-saloon issue at the polls are surely not altogether due to voters "with a yellow streak." The saloon is decidedly not the worst evil afflicting society. Yet, a wife with a drunken husband; a young man or woman whose father or brother is a confirmed tippler, making home a hell on earth, will invariably vote against the American licensed saloon as it exists today. So will every employer who finds that life and property are jeopardized by it. So will many men who themselves drink moderately.

That is the ultimate fact to face, and under present circumstances it is evident that all theorizing about the dangers of prohibition and the curtailment of our liberties fails to convince a large body of voters. The most rousing sermons on personal temperance and individual reform make little or no impression on the confirmed drunkard as long as the ever-present temptation of the wide-open saloon is there. Amongst boon companions, away from home and its safeguards, he quickly imbibes to excess. The saloon must be wiped out; such is the emphatic verdict of an immense number of Americans whose ballot makes law.

In enacting these drastic measures little heed is paid at present to the ultimate consequences of prohibition, and thus it has come about that our rights as Catholics are endangered, and very seriously so. From liberty run riot the pendulum is swinging back to unmitigated tyranny. In this connection it would be interesting to speculate on how we have heeded the authoritative warning of the Third Baltimore Council anent saloons and their keepers, and in how far our compliance or neglect in this matter is responsible for our present plight. But space is wanting. An appeal to patriotism to help in the conservation of grain urgently needed for food here and abroad, is an effective and plausible prohibitionist argument at present. It does not hold good, however, when applied to the manufacture of wine, even for beverage purposes.

No question is solved until it is solved rightly, and stringent statutory prohibition of all alcoholic products for whatever use intended is certainly not the right solution. When some of the fanaticism, now rampant, has abated, as seems inevitable, perhaps we may hope that a new conception of the whole liquor question will issue from the seething caldron of arguments, theories, opinions and laws that are fairly swamping us. The broad-minded, clear-visioned man who can view dispassionately both sides of this tangled and passionate problem, and get his sane ideas enacted into law, will confer an inestimable boon upon the country, whether it be at peace or war.

Advertising in Socialist Newspapers

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently I noticed that a prominent Catholic had contracted for considerable space in a Socialist newspaper, to advertise his business. We have been led to believe that this paper was the antithesis of all that Catholics hold dear, an anti-religious, unpatriotic, radical, discontent-breeding sheet. If it is true that most papers subsist mainly on the revenue they get from their advertising, is it right for our people to finance such publications?

Viewed from a strictly business standpoint, would it not seem that as against the few radicals thus catered to, there are thousands of readers of influential magazines like AMERICA who might feel slighted at our Catholic friend's choice of an advertising medium? If a dollar is to be spent where it will do the most good, I should imagine it would produce better business results, and incomparably better results for God, our Church and our country in the advertising columns of AMERICA than in any Socialist paper.

"Down with capitalists!" the Socialists say, and they get a capitalist's money. "Down with religion!" and a good Catholic helps pay for the paper? "Down with the Government!" and a loyal American's name stands there right alongside. Our friend's advertising manager is not doing him justice.

Reasonable Criticisms

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In several recent articles in AMERICA on "Teach Them What to Read," some comment has been offered relative to the reluctance of Catholics in general to criticize the teaching done in the Catholic schools. Some further comment might well be added concerning the reluctance of teachers, and others directly connected with these schools, to consider criticism when it is offered. I know an instance where a convent graduate later complained to the directress of that convent about the defects in teaching the correct pronunciation of English in that school. The directress, instead of giving consideration to the criticism, told the young lady rather tartly that she should have attended some other school. The criticism offered was purely constructive, the inference being that the teachers and students might profit by consulting recognized authorities on English.

In another instance, a non-Catholic superintendent of public schools called the attention of the local pastor to the fact that, in the parochial school, the teaching was done too exclusively along the lines of requiring the pupils to memorize the printed page and then to recite, by the question-and-answer method, the page thus memorized. The pastor, instead of considering the justice of the criticism, swept the matter aside with the statement that the superintendent was prejudiced. Now, I happen to know the superintendent in question and I am positive that he was in no sense prejudiced. He was simply able to recognize the defect in the children as they came from the parochial school into the higher grades of the public schools; and he felt justified in offering this criticism, because he had to deal with this defect in these children. Furthermore, he was offering a criticism that any qualified educator might offer against a faulty method used in any school. The superintendent of those schools was right and yet the pastor of the parochial school was not willing to see anything in the criticism but prejudice.

These are only illustrative examples. This seems to be the common attitude, as I have witnessed it, among the teachers and those directly connected with the Catholic schools. Yet it is difficult to understand why this should be. If there are defects in the Catholic schools, as there are, and sometimes glaring ones, why should they not be recognized? And why should not those qualified to criticize, offer criticism where it is due, and why should not this criticism be accepted and turned to the profit of the schools?

Patriotism and the "Menace"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am enclosing a copy of a letter recently sent to the Menace by former Supreme Court Justice, Arthur E. Sutherland, who retired from the bench a short time ago to devote his time and splendid talents to the practice of law and is now associated with Mr. Eugene J. Dwyer, a prominent Catholic attorney:

April 6th, 1918.

Proprietor of the "Menace," Aurora, Missouri.

Sir:—I received this morning through the mail a copy of your paper called the Menace, addressed to me at my residence, 105 Bellevue Drive, Rochester, N. Y. On previous occasions, copies have been sent to me and I have written your office requesting that no further copies be mailed to me or to my house. I regard the purpose and character of your paper as destructive of the American spirit which just now must be maintained free from such attack as you make in order that we may do our part in the war.

In this community there is no difference between Catholic and non-Catholic. All are working and sacrificing for our common country. Catholic and non-Catholic boys are in the trenches side by side. In every movement here for the advance of our cause, the Catholic Bishop of Rochester is a heroic leader. His priests are patriots and the people of his Church are doing their bit with as unselfish and devoted a spirit of patriotism as the people of any other religious faith.

At such a time and with such conditions to have some poisonous, damnable propaganda, such as you print, sent to American citizens, who are working side by side in wholehearted unity for our country's cause, constitutes a real menace. Your paper is rightly named. If more copies of your paper are sent to my house, I shall make a public protest. Such doctrines as you preach belong to a past age of ignorance and bigotry. Your enterprise ought to be suppressed as an insidious and ominous danger to this country in its hour of peril. ARTHUR E. SUTHERLAND.

This forceful and fearless letter, instinct with the best American traditions and true love of country, aside from its interest to the readers of AMERICA, is an object-lesson for all those who are subjected to similar annoyance and insult.

Rochester. J. F. O'HERN.

The "New Age" and the Church

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The New Age, the organ of the Supreme Council of the Scottish Rite Freemasons, continues to manifest hostility to the Catholic Church. The March number shows Emilio Aguinaldo, the leader of the Katipunan revolution against Spain in the Philippines, as a 32d degree Mason. It has a malignant article on "Rizal Social Cancer — the Union of Church and State in the Philippines." It quotes, editorially, with full approval, an article from the Methodist Christian Advocate, attributing the retreat of the Italian army to "the direct pro-Austrian and premature peace propaganda which emanates from the Vatican." The only aim of the Holy See, according to this article, > has been to put up a pious show of neutrality, while slyly maneuvering to save Austria, to establish Roman rule in the separated churches of the Balkan States, to reach out its crook into Russia to gather in any fragments of the Greek Catholic Church which the political revolution might detach, and to seize the protectorate of the Holy Places in Palestine, which British arms have wrested from the Turk. This is Rome, never-changing Rome. It is this against which we, the Methodist Advocate, and all liberty-loving people the world over, do cry.

The New Age accepts all this falsehood, and adds that it has independent sources of information in Italy and that its information tallies in all respects with the Christian Advocate's. The New Age's own correspondent writes that General Cadorna had as his nearest officer a man who was "under the control of the Jesuits," that it must not be forgotten that the present General of the Jesuits is a German, that he has removed to Switzerland, "and that thereby the Pope enjoys the benefit of secret correspondence;" that Cadorna made "the mistake of placing the priests in the army, in the hospitals, in the Red Cross, and elsewhere," and that in these priests the Jesuits had many eyes and ears.

Under the heading, "Bold and Extravagant Claims," the New Age prints a letter from Mr. Herbert M. Greene, 33d degree, to the Hon. Morris Sheppard, 32d degree, Senator from Texas, calling attention to the Literary Digest of January 5, 1918, which contains an article by Rev. Joseph H. McMahon, alleging that "American Catholics have furnished over one-third of the American army, though adherents of the Catholic Church constitute but one-sixth of the population." Mr. Greene asked the Senator to find out the denominational standing of the men in the army and navy, as shown by the official records. Mr. Josephus Daniels, on January 24, 1918, wrote to the Senator that "no record is kept of the religious affiliations of the personnel of the Navy." Adjutant General H. P. McCain informed the Senator on January 23, that > the records of this Department do not as yet show the religious beliefs of the men who have entered the military service, and, consequently, no comparative statement of the number of men in service of the various religious persuasions has been or can be made by the Department. However, the statistical sections in the various camps are compiling all useful information (including denominational statistics) relating to the soldiers, but that data has not yet been received in this Department.

Then says the New Age:

> The question forces itself to the front: Why are Roman Catholic chaplains being appointed to the Army in the proportion of thirty-seven per cent., or over one-third? Is it because officialdom has been made to believe the extravagant claims, boldly made by Romish priests and papers, that thirty, forty, and even a greater per cent. of the Army and Navy are of their faith?

It then states that Sergeant George C. Adriance is responsible for the statement that of the 353d All-Kansas Regiment of the 89th Division, 884 are Methodists, 413 Catholics, 381 Christians, 252 Presbyterians, 242 Baptists, 190 Lutherans, 149 are Congregationalist, Episcopalian and United Brtheren, 16 other denominations are "represented by a few," 91 profess no religion and 5 are atheists. The New Age goes on to say that at Camp Lee, containing 48,000 men, only 5,307 are Catholics, and that at Kelly Field in Texas, the Methodists lead with 1,630, and the Catholics come next with 1,625. From its statistics concerning these three selected places, the New Age concludes:

> So you see, brethren, in making these extravagant statements, the Rev. James H. McMahon, and other priests and Jesuits, members of the Roman Hierarchy, are, as is usual with them, talking through their hats.

William M. James, 32d degree, of Panama, R. P., writes that the Masons in Costa Rica and Guatemala "work even in the face of jail sentences, social ostracism, and all the power and influence that a bigoted and self-sufficient priesthood can bring against them." If the Freemasons are not made anti-Catholics, it will not be the fault of the New Age.

May and Mary

DURING the month of May from every part of the known world there will rise to the white throne of the Immaculate Queen of Heaven a grand chorus of praise and of thanksgiving in fulfilment of her own beautiful prophecy: "From henceforth all nations shall call me blessed." With sublime disdain for the vagaries of philosophers, the protests of rationalists, the aberrations of Modernists and the indignation of certain sects of Protestants, the great body of Catholics, learned and ignorant, priests and people, in the shell-swept regions of war and the pleasant places of peace, will be united in magnifying the Mother of God and the Mother of men, because He that is mighty has done great things to her, and she who is exalted has shown loving kindness to them.

They may not be fully conscious of all the dogmatic connotations of Mary's place in the Divine economy of man's redemption and salvation, but with a surety which makes the sense of the united Faithful like an echo of the truth of God, they are certain that to her who was gifted with the Divine maternity there is due a reverence far greater than the honor paid to angels and to saints and only less than the worship rendered to God alone.

Their realization of the Scriptural warrant of their belief and attitude, which runs like a golden thread through the word of God, beginning with the book of Genesis and culminating in the Apocalypse, may be somewhat vague and misty, their acquaintance with the teaching of tradition, clear and unmistakable even in the time of ante-Nicene Fathers, and growing with the later Fathers and doctors and theologians until today it has reached the fulness of the flood tide of glory, may not be very extensive, but for the simplest Catholic heart it is enough to know that honor to God's Mother is honor to God Himself, that it is an insult to Christ to deny reverence to her from whom he deigned to take His Sacred Heart, that it is consonant with the demands of reason to pay court to the woman of marvelous dignity who out of all God's creatures was selected by infinite purity to clothe the Second Person of the Blessed Trinity with her own untainted, regal flesh and blood.

Devotion to Mary, not the distorted, unreal and false devotion, condemned by ignorance, that hideous offspring of the reformers, but the true, solid and unexaggerated devotion practised by Catholics and non-Catholics whose heart is right with reason and with God, has the fullest and most emphatic approval of the Church. It is one of the most consoling, most appealing and most meritorious portions of our Christian heritage.

Forward in Death

IT was somewhere in France on the frontier of civilization and the ramparts of freedom. The French poilus were waiting for the order to attack. At his lookout in the trenches, his eyes peering into the darkness, a French officer kept his watch. He was not by profession a fighting man. When the bugles of war had sounded, he had left the seminary where he was preparing for the priesthood and answered the call which his invaded motherland was sending out to all her sons. He had exchanged a Jesuit's black robe for the blue uniform of the soldiers of France. As a Jesuit he had learned to obey. As an officer he knew how to command. He had the love, the confidence of his men. He was as gentle as he was brave. No sacerdotal unction had as yet been poured upon his hands, but the halo of the priesthood for which his soul longed, seemed to encircle his brow. He might not celebrate the Sacrifice of the Mass for his men or absolve them of their sins as they charged over the top, but every word he spoke, every gallant deed he performed flashed the lessons of faith, of duty and heroism into their souls.

Calmly at his post the Jesuit officer waited for orders. Down the line rang the command which the men of France ever welcome with a cheer. "Forward," cried their leader, and his right arm pointing to the German trenches, he leaped from his dugout at the head of his men. That instant he fell shot through the heart, his face to the foe, his right arm still raised in its sublime gesture of command. For a long time his body lay on that blood-stained field, and when the smoke of battle had disappeared and the French came to bury their heroic dead, they found the Jesuit soldier still facing the enemy, his right arm stiffened in death in its gesture of leadership and sacrifice. When his brothers in arms tried to lower that knightly arm for burial, they could not change its sublime and martial attitude. In that attitude they buried the Jesuit in his soldier's grave. Hand still raised in death he still faces the foe. Dead, he seems even now to fling out his battle cry: "Forward."

Victorious France will build monuments and statues to her blue-coated heroes. The world will kneel in reverence at these shrines of heroism. And when the traveler in later days will cross the fields of the Marne or the heights of Verdun a voice from the grave will seem to whisper in his ears: Sta, viator, heroem calcas: "Pause, wayfarer, thou treadest on a hero's grave." For the men who saved civilization are resting there in the last bivouac of the immortal dead.

Among the noblest of her national monuments France will keep an honored place for her soldier-priests, for the men who, destined for the altar, left the peace of village church and cathedral aisles and the solitude and calm of scholastic studies for the red murk of battle, the living death of the trenches, the roar of the bursting shell. The sculptor need not go far to seek his model. He has it in the figure of the Jesuit officer lying stiff and cold in death, his crucifix clasped in one hand and the other raised in its high gesture of command, his lips quivering with its heroic word, "Forward." The priests of France never had any other watchword. "Forward for Christ! Forward for France." On a hundred battlefields, to thousands of defenders of France and liberty they have sounded that martial call. Religion and patriotism! For these they have fought and bled and died. Their sacrifice has been a revelation, a lesson to the world. Before it we feel humbled. In the presence of such heroism we realize how puny are our sacrifices. But that heroism thrills and exalts. There is a holy contagion in it for France and the world. Both instinctively admire and will sooner or later follow the teaching and the example of men who know how to die for their ideals and their Faith.

The Small Farmer

THE one essential class of workers, as an editorial writer in a New York daily recently remarked, are the farmers. Civilization can exist without bankers, brokers and lawyers. It is even possible without minutely specialized trades and organized schools. A civilization of no mean degree existed in the early manorial days when each family-group produced all that it consumed, constructed the roof under which it dwelled, and spun from the wool of its flocks the garments that it wore. Even in our own time all human subsistence, as Pope Leo XIII wisely said, "is derived either from labor on one's own land, or from some industry which is paid for either in the produce of the land itself or in that which is exchanged for what the land brings forth."

Self-preservation, therefore, if no other reason, should urge a nation to consider first and foremost the interest of its farming population. This becomes more imperative, the more a nation increases in the development of its cities and the expansion of its industries. We are all familiar with the famous "Hooverism" that "Food will win the war."

But the farming problem is far more than a war question. It looms equally large in times of peace. It is only the clatter of machinery, the endless whir of revolving wheels, the cry of poverty and distress within the city streets and the constant stirrings of social unrest that can cause the city-bred economist to overlook the larger issues to be worked out upon the land.

The class of small farmers is the strength and support of the nation. Among them can still be found that economic independence of which industrialism has deprived so large a proportion of the city population. But to protect this class organized assistance must be given and organized protection extended. Above all we must teach the farmers themselves to organize if they would secure their rights and have their interests duly consulted in our legislatures. Nothing is truer than the statement, shrewdly made in a Hearst paper, that there are just two things that operate decisively upon the intelligence and the conduct of the average politician: "One is the secret whisper of the cunning corporation agent. The other is the power of a majority of the voters, massed in active organization, resolutely bent upon having their will performed."

But organization of our farmers is equally necessary for direct economic purposes. The invention of machinery has made cooperation among farmers imperative. "The factory type of estate will dominate in agricultural production unless signs fail," was the forecast made by a writer in the American Journal of Sociology. We should not permit this to come about. The independence of the small farmer must be preserved and can be preserved. He must not be absorbed into a system which will reproduce upon the farm the conditions existing in factory life. Yet there is but one means to prevent such a catastrophe, and that is organization on the part of our farmers, not merely to obtain the political representation to which they are entitled, but likewise to enable them to work cooperatively. It is thus alone that they can avail themselves, equally with the large capitalist, of the enormous and expensive agricultural machinery, with its time-saving and man-saving devices. Buying, stock-shipping, conducting of warehouses and elevators, and countless other branches of business can then be carried on through independent farmers' unions. Cooperation through organization is the economic solution, if not of all, at least of many of our farming problems.

Every Child a Warrior

THE 23,000,000 children in the United States have been called to the colors. Every boy and girl in the land has been enlisted to help America and the Allies win the war. For each child is urged to make himself a deputy food administrator who will prevent so much waste and save so much food in the home that there will be left no lack of supplies for the support of the soldiers in the field. Every young American who intelligently promotes this conservation campaign is a valiant little warrior and can justly claim a share in the glory that will be ours when the Kaiser's power is broken and his armies overthrown. To hasten the coming of that hour of victory Mr. Hoover asks each of the 23,000,000 children in the country to save every day half a slice of meat, two teaspoonfuls of butter or fat, two tablespoonfuls of sugar and two slices of white bread. In this way the boys and girls of America will be able to offer our soldiers and the Allies a large portion of the food needed for their support while fighting for victory. Therefore, every American child who practises at each meal an act of self-denial that will help conserve our food supply is an ardent patriot who is doing his part to strengthen the Allied lines in France and Flanders.

Though these generous sacrifices of the children will doubtless do much to rid the world forever of the demon of militarism, our young warriors have another thing to do which is quite as important as self-denial, and that is to pray. If all the boys and girls in the land would lift up every day pure hearts to God and beg Him to bring this dreadful war to an end very soon by granting to the Allied armies a decisive victory on the western front, our merciful Father in Heaven surely could not long resist the united appeal of His children. For it would seem that the world cannot be freed from the scourge of Prussian militarism till our armies at the front are reinforced here at home by their strongest reserves, the prayer and fasting of the innocent.

A Fighting Church

BEFORE the present war began the press was much given to praising for his "fearless independence of judgment," or his "courageous spirit of inquiry" every "liberal" or "enlightened" Catholic who chanced to confide to the sympathetic Protestant public just how unsupportable he had always found the yoke of his intransigent, obscurantist Church. In all the quarrels between the Modernistic Catholic and his hopelessly medieval mother, in the opinion of the secular press, the Church of the Ages was generally in the wrong, while her rebellious son was almost invariably right. Since the summer of 1914, however, we have heard much less than before from the Church's critics regarding the unreasonableness of her dogmas, the rigor of her discipline, the tyranny of the Index, the narrowness of the Roman Congregations, etc. For the drastic measures taken by all the belligerents to stimulate loyalty, root out treason, improve morale, have perhaps taught the more thoughtful enemies of the Church that her age-old policy is not so absurdly unreasonable after all.

In this connection Father Hull, in an excellent paper on "The Liberal Catholic," published in the current Catholic Mind, offers those who are restive under the restrictions Catholicism lays on them, the following striking analogy between the Church and the army:

> In this large national concern [the army] we find men of every rank and every qualification, of every higher and lower grade, of every temperament and variety of opinion taking their part, and on the whole trying to do their best according to their lights. Among even the officials themselves there will always exist divergences of view calling for compromise. Among the subordinates there will also exist divergencies of view: "Quot homines tot sententiae." Some of the subordinates may really be gifted with better insight than those above them; while some of them may be altogether wrong. To run the concern on democratic lines is altogether unworkable. We have to accept the whole system as it stands, cultivate a general spirit of confidence in those who have the responsibility, and accept the result as the only working possibility. If there happens to be something wrong in the administration, we can hope and trust that sooner or later it will be found out and things will adjust themselves. In this spirit we must throw ourselves into a situation over which we have no control, take it cheerfully, the thick with the thin, and make the best of it.
> This altogether human way of looking at things can to some extent at least be applied to the administration of the Church. Not every enactment of the Holy See pleases everybody. Some Catholics in Italy did not like the uncompromising attitude of Pius IX over the loss of the Papal States. Some Catholics in France did not like Leo XIII's compromising attitude towards the Republic. Some did not like the proposal to define the Pope's infallibility at least on grounds of prudence. Some did not like what they considered the aggressiveness of the Syllabus, while others hailed it with delight, Some did not like the condemnation of English Freemasonry, and so on. Coming to our own times, some perhaps may not like the decrees of the Biblical Commission; some perhaps may not like the new Breviary, etc., etc. It is all very human and natural. But we must put aside these personal predilections and take a broader outlook. We are not called upon to extend the prerogative of infallibility to the practical administration of the Church outside ex cathedra definitions, which are few and far between. We are free to recognize that the Church, though Divine in its origin and constitution, is human in its working agency. But we must at least cultivate a general attitude of confidence in the actual rulership, and accept it as an accomplished fact with loyal submission and cheerful co-operation, confident that at least on the whole it is what God Almighty in His Providence wants and is satisfied with. We must put aside all solicitude about concerns over which we have no control, and, taking the situation as it is, console ourselves with the thought that after all, whatever our particular views may be, the presumption is that those who are responsible for the management of the Church are probably much better "in the know" than we are. And even if they are not, our fussing about it will not mend matters but rather make them worse.

The larger portion of the civilized world is now practically a vast army, and every man, woman and child in each warring nation is a soldier who must submit to restrictions and make sacrifices that in times of peace would be quite intolerable. But the Catholic Church is a fighting, conquering nation that is always at war with her three relentless enemies, the allurements of the world, the wiles of Satan and the concupiscence of the flesh. The severe war-measures that each of the belligerents is now imposing only temporarily on her soldiers and civilians, the Church whose warfare will last till the day of Judgment, lays on her children permanently, and just as in time of war the State sternly represses "liberty of speech," curtails the "liberty of the press," and severely punishes disobedience and treason, in like manner the Church, whose warfare is continual and unremitting, strictly forbids her children to give the enemy any aid and comfort whatever but urges them to be loyal to their Divine Captain and fight valiantly for the triumph of His cause, the freedom and exaltation of the Church.

"The Home Service"

THE call and opportunity for personal devotion to social service is today clamorous and insistent as perhaps never before. The war has brought in its ubiquitous train so much disorganization in the domestic life of those who, even under the best conditions, found it difficult to cope with the struggle for existence, that a form of civilian relief, long practised unobtrusively in time of peace, has with our entrance into the struggle assumed far greater prominence and importance. This work is under the direction of the Home Service Section of the American Red Cross and deserves the hearty cooperation of all patriotic men and women who have leisure to devote to it. It makes its appeal principally to women of intelligence and education, and gives them an opportunity for translating their love of country from the sphere of poetic aspiration into that of grim reality. Volunteers in every part of the country are needed, Catholics as well as others, irrespective of religious beliefs.

The Home Service has for its field of operation, as its name indicates, the homes of poor families, and concerns itself with almost every phase of domestic assistance. Visiting persons who apply for help, discrimination between worthy and unworthy cases, study of individual problems with a view to affording each the aid which is most advisable, personal sympathy and interest which take off the chill of mere philanthropy, obtaining employment for those out of work, procuring expert nursing and medical advice for those who are ill, enabling children to go to school, advising mothers on the solution of difficulties, and securing legal and financial assistance where that is imperative—these are some of the forms of activity taken by this very laudable and necessary kind of war work, whose name is charity. That it has for its object the alleviation of the needs of the families of the heroic men who have already gone, or who will soon go, to the front stamps it unmistakably as unselfish, sensible, inspiring and practical patriotism.

Strange to say, however, Catholic women have not yet taken as active share in the Home Service as might rightly have been expected. The consequence has been that Catholic interests have suffered, not indeed from any bigotry or prejudice on the part of the higher officers, but through the narrowness of underlings, for here, too, as elsewhere a great cause is damaged by the littleness of petty officials. A very large proportion of the would-be beneficiaries are Catholics, but Catholics form a very small proportion of those charged with dispensing the benefits. This anomalous situation is due merely to the fact that Catholics have held aloof from the work and, whether from ignorance or some other motive, have failed to respond to the invitations cordially extended them by the local boards. If many women of our Faith are not actively engaged in the Home Service, it is not because they are excluded by the Red Cross, for their participation is earnestly solicited, but because, for some reason or other best known to themselves, they have neglected to ally themselves with the work.

In the boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx of New York City, especially, their absence has been keenly felt and deeply regretted, though in both places there are large numbers of graduates and undergraduates of academies and colleges, whose training, means and leisure fit them admirably to be active and efficient workers. Is their interest in social service merely academic? To say so would be a libel on our Catholic womanhood. It must be they are ignorant that this opportunity of "doing their bit" for their country is ready at hand, both in the great metropolis and elsewhere. Once they know of it, they will embrace it with the zeal and sympathy characteristic of their Catholic hearts. Applications made to Mr. Alexander Wilson, at 44 East Twenty-third Street, New York City, will elicit information for any one who seeks it. A great deal of work is to be done during the coming summer, and it is hoped that the generous response of our Catholic boys to the call to the colors will find its counterpart in an equally generous response, on the part of their Catholic sisters, to the call of the Home Service.

Literature

LETTERS WE NEVER GET

WITH the general run of mankind letter-writing has become so largely a matter of business only, that "Dear Sir: Yours received and contents noted," might be taken as the epistolary formula of the day. In consequence, if a letter is supposed to be a warm, personal thing, the average modern letter is about as warm and personal as a nice, friendly skeleton. What with the telephone and the capsule night-letter and the typewriter and the dictaphone, the old, rambling, chatty letter with which our ancestors compensated themselves for the absence of the "movies" is no longer met by the postman in his round through the town. Anyway, that official is too busy delivering magazines and form-letters to be bothered with the bulky personal correspondence of long ago.

Yet, lest letter-writing should become forever a lost art, it is carried on for us in the current fiction. I have been studying with keenest appreciation the letters exchanged by fictional characters, and I can confidently affirm that so long as the writers of the short-story and novel occasionally resort to the letter-form, the art of correspondence shall not perish from the earth.

Suppose, for example, that a son in a great city is writing to the mother he left behind him. Sons, you know, are notorious letter-writers; in fact, like this particular son out of a novel, when away from home they always write their mothers every day. "Mumsie, wumsie:" he begins. The reader at once notices the delightful intimacy of their relationship, an intimacy, withal, tinged with the fine courtesy and high regard of well-bred persons. "Having a ripping time," he goes on, "except for your beastly relations. Why did you insist on my hunting them up? Ducks and drakes, the lot of them! So unlike the dearest, ugliest, most conceited old Mother this side of Mars. Picked up a rare old necklace the other day, just off Fifth Avenue; hope you'll like it. I'm sending it to you C.O.D. Met a bully girl; she sings in a cabaret, but sweet and unspoiled as lace packed in lavender. There, there, grumpy old prude, don't worry. I've not married her yet. Give Towser a kiss on his cold nose for me." What mother receiving such a letter could fail to fling herself upon her knees and bless the dear, respectful son of her old age? What an admirable model it is for any youth whose love for his mother has not grown cold by too much exposure to the night air.

Or take the dashing heroine who rushes off to the seashore for the summer months. Does she fill her days with boating, swimming, tennis and dancing, like the normal maiden in real life? Not she! She seats herself in some quiet nook, with a pad on her knee and a fountain-pen dripping purple ink, and writes long letters to her absent girl-chum. Day by day, hour by hour, she lays forth her soul's budding affection as frankly as she would lay forth for her friend's inspection her closet of new gowns. She writes volumes, serial stories in fact, interspersed with such chapter headings as "Later," "Midnight," "The Next Day," "Afterwards." Now, what is more natural for a young lady worn out by a strenuous day at her tablets than to seat herself at the midnight hour and write 2,000 words, at ten cents a word, to her absent friend? Thousands of young ladies, of course, do just that. And what is more natural than for her toward the end of the summer—about page 303—to slip the wrong letter into the wrong envelope, thus turning a love affair which is dying of writer's cramp into a joyous rice and white-lawn wedding?

Then there is the letter from the irate father to his wayward son, every stroke of the pen heavy enough to make the desk beneath him quiver, every sentence bristling with his vigorous, dominant personality. "Don't be a fool!" he always begins, and we can see the very ink turn pale as he flings it across the paper. "I've stood for your poppy-cock [favorite word with irate fathers] long enough. Come back and give up this girl, or stay where you are and starve." How masterful he is! Does not his letter thrill one with its display of virility? But as for the son, strangely enough, threatening letters pass him by like the idle wind which he respects not. He marries the maiden, exchanges a page and a half of crisp, choppy telegrams with his father, and ends when the sire turns over the business and the family acres to his unbluffable boy.

Fictional letters generally fall into two grand divisions, very short and very long. The shorter the better; and if not the shorter, then certainly the longer. The first must be brisk, snappy, suggestive. Thus:

"Dearest Mumps:
"You're a dear old goose.
"Lovingly,
"Bacteria."

A letter like that must be as refreshing as a glass of ice-water flung in one's face; as full of meaning as an epigram in Spanish, supposing one not to know Spanish. And what a chance it gives the recipient to read between the lines!

The longer letter is usually the product of a very, very busy person. He may be a businessman who, after long hours in his office, always writes letters until the morning paper arrives to divert his attention. Your baseball player is another prodigious letter-writer, for his education has been of precisely the type to develop a tireless correspondent. Or the traveler after a weary day on the road and with the prospect of a mountain climb ahead of him, pauses, as it were, in midleap to write a short novelette to his friends at home. These letters are, to say the least, ample. A saving man shudders to think of the stamps needed to bear them safely to their bourn. They cover the ground with the thoroughness of a cub reporter on his first divorce case; they go in for the fine points of the game, illustrating with incidents from history, personal, national, or universal; they drop into dialogue, repeating verbatim long conversations in dialect; in fact, when we reach the "Sincerely yours," we feel convinced that if the writer has omitted anything, he clearly never heard of it. We glance at our wrist watch; one hour has been consumed in reading it.

Yes, life always has its compensations. Though those at home may content themselves with a brief catalogue of family ailments, and absent friends may insult us with picture-postcards, the reader of fiction knows that somewhere in this world men and women are specializing in the art of correspondence. Somewhere, clever, interesting, humorous, pathetic, "chummy," personal letters are being composed which will delight the hearts of their recipients and cause a perceptible bulge in the United States postal receipts. For is not fiction, after all, simply the mirror held up to life?

REVIEWS

The High Romance: a Spiritual Autobiography. By MICHAEL WILLIAMS. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.60.

Mr. Williams needs no introduction to the readers of AMERICA. All who have enjoyed his contributions to our pages will doubtless be eager to see this remarkable book, the "Spiritual Autobiography" of a journalist who though baptized a Catholic, gave up the practice of his religion while still a boy, lost his faith, and after twenty years of wandering among nearly all the "isms," was led back to the Church by no less a guide than Sister Teresa, "the Little Flower." The first half of the volume describes the author's childhood at Halifax, the years of his youth he passed there as a warehouse clerk, his subsequent stay in Boston as the drudge of a five-cent store, his early literary flights, thirst for the beautiful, loss of health, his adventures in San Francisco, first as a reporter and later as a city editor during the great earthquake and fire, his experiences as a member of Upton Sinclair's Socialist community at Helicon Hall, and finally his "dark night of the soul" when "art" and self-indulgence seemed to be the only things in life really worth while. All through the author's personal narrative run fine bits of description, criticism, reflection, epigram and prose-poetry, but this mosaic-work often impairs the unity and order of the book and sometimes wearies and distracts the mind of the reader.

But in the second part of the volume, which is appropriately entitled "The Homeward Way," the author's story advances more smoothly, and holds more closely the reader's attention. Combined with passages of merciless self-analysis, and of keen discernment of our country's neo-pagan tendencies, is an admirable study of the process of conversion as the author observed it in his own soul, and an excellent piece of apologetics that will doubtless bring the Church's claims before numberless inquirers. For that interest in "mysticism," which is now so widespread will lead many readers to begin "The High Romance" and a good part of them will probably lay it down with the conviction, or at least the strong suspicion, that the only safe and true mysticism in the world today is that taught by the Catholic Church and practised by her children. For the author's account of his interviews with the Bishop and their effect, of the wonders that followed his first call at the Carmelite monastery, of the way "Sister Teresa confirmed her favor" by curing Antonio's baby, of the remarkable restoration of bodily and spiritual strength Mr. Williams has enjoyed since the day his lost faith returned, all read like a "A High Romance" indeed. But no one who reflects how hard it must have been for the author to put down about himself many of the things the general public may read in this book can entertain any doubt regarding Mr. Williams's sincerity. "But because my story has such a happy ending," he concludes, "I kept it from the fire, and I sent it forth as an act of faith."

Songs of the Celtic Past. By NONNEYS JEPHSON O'CONNOR. New York: John Lane Co. $1.50.

Irish Lyrics and Ballads. By Rev. JAMES B. DOLLARD, Litt.D. New York: P. J. Kenedy. $1.35.

Irishmen are often charged with being dwellers in the past, harborers of old grievances, "dreamers of dreams wandering by lone sea-breakers" or like Wordsworth's solitary reaper "singing of old unhappy far-off things or battles long ago." Still a dream may make a nation or may save a nation. Joseph's envious brethren, when they saw him afar off, said, "Behold, the dreamer cometh," but that same dreamer was afterwards appointed over the whole land of Egypt and Pharaoh put a robe of silk upon him and a chain of gold about his neck. Ireland may well dream of her Celtic past when it treasures such tales as Ailill and Etain chosen, as Mr. O'Connor says, for its spiritual value. He believes the Fairy Midir is but a messenger from a power higher than man, saving human nature from a fall. There is also an old Irish love tale, the story of one of Erin's kings, who, tired of battle and the red hand of war, longs for:

> "The love that is a buckler 'gainst the world
> For two united hearts. . . . . ."

There are more modern melodies in the volume, too, even so modern a one as "In Madison Square." All the lyrics have a freshness about them that tells of the Green Isle of Song.

It has been said of the Gael that his words "are always merry, but his songs are always sad." In "Irish Lyrics and Ballads" there is an undercurrent of sadness, not the sadness of despair, for the Gael ever had his eye on the God of hope, but that mystic melancholy that falls on the lonely traveler in the hills of Ireland. It is the "still sad music of humanity"—Irish humanity, if we may so speak—looking on the glens and mountains that have a heart-message. Father Dollard has put the Irish heart and the Irish lyrical cry into his poems. You hear the "crooning of Irish breezes, the murmur of Irish streams." The heart of Ireland is in these poems, and when the heart of Ireland sings you have exquisite music. The longing love for the Irish hills and the Irish firesides is also mingled here with the ". . . haunting, wailful music that the Fairy Harpers play."

The great heart-call, the sweet simplicity and the inspiring music of Father Dollard's poems should make them a lasting contribution to Ireland's lyrical literature. J. S. H.

The Straight Religion. By FATHER BENEDICT, O.SS.S. With a Foreword by Rev. FATHER BERNARD VAUGHAN, S.J. New York: Benziger Brothers. $1.50.

"I have called this book 'The Straight Religion,'" the author explains in his introduction, "because it is the straight religion; it gives a straight answer to all the straight questions that men and women are asking today, and whether you like that answer or not, you are not left in any doubt as to what that answer is." Beginning with the proofs of God's existence the author takes his readers through thirty-six chapters that explain the Church's doctrine with more dogmatic precision and theological detail than is usual in apologetical works meant for the general reader. But the book is probably designed to supply the need of educated Protestants and unbelievers whose souls have been deeply stirred by the present war, and who have been moved to turn to the Ancient Church for her answers to the vital questions that now clamor for a satisfactory answer. If the (Protestant) Bishop of Oxford had to confess that what "looms largest and most magnificent on our horizon here in England" is "The Roman Catholic Communion," doubtless many of his coreligionists have been struck by the same phenomenon and will eagerly read the "straight" solution Father Benedict offers for their problems. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

March's six best-sellers, reports the Bookman, were "The Tree of Heaven," Sinclair; "The U. P. Trail," Grey; "The Major," Connor; "Oh, Money! Money!" Porter; "Bag of Saffron," Von Hutton, and "Christine," Cholmondeley. "Oh, Money! Money!" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.50) is an attractive story on the philosophy of happiness, the backbone of which according to Mrs. Porter, is character, not wealth. Stanley Fulton, the book's hero, is an austere bachelor with a fortune of many millions. How his prospective heirs are each tested with a gift of $100,000, how the money brings joy to some and wo to others, and how in the end Fulton's difficulties are solved by an amiable New England Cinderella, who wins his heart, his hand and incidentally his wealth is all told well by this cheerful author. "The Bag of Saffron" is a story about a selfish woman who leaves her husband and elopes with another man. The literary artistry of the novel is as defective as the ethics. The other four books mentioned have already been noticed in AMERICA.

"My 75" (Doran, $1.35), by Paul Lintier, is the story of the deeds of a French battery from the beginning of the war to the unexpected triumph of the Aisne. The author paints with vivid touch the fears that tortured the hearts of his comrades during the black August of 1914, but fails to bring into bold relief the spirit which has been inspiring the soldiers of France during the past four years; the spirit of heroic self-sacrifice.——In "Front Lines" (Dutton, $1.50), Boyd Cable draws twenty-one interesting pen-pictures of the fighter's work and play. Some are humorous, all are human.——"Holding the Line" (McClurg, $1.50), by Sergeant Harold Baldwin of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, is the vivid story of the experiences of a soldier in the first Canadian contingent that left for the war. The credit given the German foe for personal bravery is an indication of the good sportmanship of the author.——"The Winning of the War" (Harper, $2.00), by Professor Roland G. Usher, is a thoughtful warning against over-confidence. He sees the greatest strength of the Allies in their moral superiority, in their union and their control of the seas, of copper, wool, rubber and cotton; but points out that Germany dominates the Ukraine, the Balkans, Turkey and Austria-Hungary; that starvation or rebellion in Germany is most improbable, and stresses the grave danger in the destruction of the Allies' shipping, man-power, and in the resources of Belgium and Northern France.

The anonymous "Record of Nicholas Freydon, an Autobiography" (Doran, $1.50), is the story of an English journalist's career. When a boy he went with his father to live in Australia. Left an orphan there, he was placed in a Catholic asylum, where he was kept hard at work until the night he ran away to make his own fortune. The portraits the author gives of the Sisters in charge of the orphanage are far from flattering. They are hard business women and merciless disciplinarians rather than religious. The account of Freydon's climb from grim poverty to a place of eminence as a writer in England, his marriage to a drunkard and his subsequent return to Australia is so vivid and circumstantial that the reviewers have been guessing at the name of the "autobiographer."——"Sunshine Beggars" (Little, Brown, $1.50), by Sidney McCall, are the Bertolloti, a poor Italian family whose artistic temperament and cheerful companionship are an inspiration and a joy, especially to Phil Merril, a little rich boy who craves love and sympathy. It is an entertaining "glad book" that strains the probabilities somewhat.——"The Man from Nowhere" (Benziger, $1.00) is another of Anna T. Sadlier's delightful Catholic juveniles. The mystery surrounding the "Man" and its unraveling, the highly imaginative settings, and the real boy characters, will appeal to the younger folk.

"Trashiness of Fiber"

SOMETIMES one hears this criticism of a teacher: "He works his pupils too hard." To overwork a pupil is, without exception, the most short-sighted thing a teacher can do. It is an injustice to the teacher as well as to the pupil. Show me an overworked schoolboy, and I will show you an overwrought, nervous, tired-out and used-up teacher. This rule holds almost invariably. But there is a vast difference between overworking a pupil and simply keeping him busy. Some youngsters must be kept extremely busy, else they are in danger; and so is the teacher!

The End of Education

AFTER all, what is education, if it be not plain downright character-building? And is there anything we can find making more for the development of strong character than training the young in the art of work, the joys of work? For the young can be taught to find joy in work. The eminent English Jesuit, Father Martindale, discussing the youthful schooling of St. Francis Xavier, remarks, "Education, we keep hearing nowadays, must keep the children happy. In practice this means that they must be kept amused. . . Drudgery and grind are to disappear; children are spontaneously to rush to the schoolroom, itself a palatial haunt of higher art. . . . The very grammars are entertaining."

Now, goodness knows, this sorry old war-ridden world needs all the decent entertainment it can get: there is none too much. But "a time for all things!" Undeniably, one of the tendencies of modern education is over the line of legitimate entertainment. It is well and good, if not overdone; and is in a degree quite necessary too, this striving of the teacher to catch and hold the interest of the young by every possible reasonable means. Well and good as far as it goes, if it goes not too far, if it leads not too far away from the basic ideal of true education. Many educators, however, in their advocacy of the inductive method of training children, lose sight of the ultimate end, forget that the pleasures of the classroom are a means and not an end. An axiom of the efficient school is that all the "play" of the classroom, I am not speaking of recreation, must be purely inductive to work. When play oversteps or falls short of that end, it is harmful.

Overemphasized Amusement

TEACHERS can inculcate in their charges a love for work for the work's sake, itself, as well as for the reward it may bring in merits, promotions, privileges, and so forth. But this can never be achieved by permitting the amusing side of school work to become overemphasized. "I maintain most stoutly," said Father Martindale again, "that the sum total of good character is not by one degree the greater for all this [amusing of pupils] than in the days when education was an austere affair. Education once could be," he goes on, "and often was, sober to the verge, and over the verge, of sternness, and though violent reactions most likely followed often enough upon the heels of emancipation, yet it may well be thought that a certain high essential value, a sound and penetrative quality, was infused into the child, which survived the period of lawlessness and revolt, and saved him throughout from the effects of that 'trashiness of fiber' we so often diagnose in the pleasurably nurtured child of today."

A National Weakness

TRASHINESS OF FIBER is the national weakness of America. We have been called in times past the nation of pie eaters. It is indeed as if we had fed ourselves on mental as well as material pastry the past few generations. More men were rejected at our army officers' training camps last summer because of "trashiness of fiber" than for any other fault in the catalogue. It was not physical flaws that disqualified hundreds of our young men so much as a lack of mental stamina, "an inability," as one army official expressed it to me, "to tackle any job and stick to it till it was finished."

A great deal is being said and written about the astounding revelation the army draft has made concerning the physical fitness, or unfitness, of young America. The draft has indeed played like a searchlight on the body of the youth of our country, revealing him from head to foot for what he is. Much of the blame for his deficiencies is traced to our schools, our muddled educational system. But what of his shortcomings, his trashiness of fiber, his lack of ability to stick to a job, as our army officer put it? Where does the blame for that lie if not, very largely at any rate, with our schools? Too often things are made too easy for our boys and girls; they are not trained by their teachers to work. Then, when they face the real work of life, neither the muscle nor the mind is there to tackle the job and carry it through. It is not the child's fault.

The Teacher's Power

IT is in the teacher's power to fire his pupils with enthusiasm for what they are set to do. Of course, there are such things as lazy youngsters. But also, it sometimes happens that pupils are lazy because their teacher is lazy. Too many teachers follow the line of least resistance in handling their difficult charges; and though on the face of it these children may pull through, in reality they are only weakened in character and unfitted for the tasks of life before them. Their fiber is reduced to trashiness. What they need is to be taught to work, how to work and how to enjoy their work; how to overcome obstacles and master difficulties, so that the "sound and penetrative quality" of which Father Martindale has spoken, and which makes for strength and endurance and character, may be infused into them and make men of them.

SOCIOLOGY

Faith and Industrial Peace

IT will hardly be questioned that the removal of the more distressing economic disabilities of the proletariat will tend to allay industrial unrest by eliminating its most poignant and irritating causes. Sufficiency, security and economic freedom are milestones on the highway to industrial peace. But it would be vain indeed to indulge the hope that the road may be charted throughout its entire length and made safe for the march of democracy by any political or economic machinery that can be devised. Factory inspection will not make unemployables efficient nor will shorter hours render the idle industrious.

It is not the part of wisdom to overlook the obvious fact that there is vast restlessness and unhappiness among those who are economically well-provided for; nor to be blind to the further fact that should all economic expedients become fully and ideally operative there will still remain no negligible residuum of misfortune and inequality which will serve on occasion to fan into a flame the inextinguishable embers of human envy and avarice. Indeed there can be found no principle more subversive of lasting peace than that which would lead man to seek his happiness in material well-being. If industrial peace is to be made durable there will be required a faith, a philosophy of life which will provide a secure basis for justice and social obligation; which will make democracy safe for the world, and will provide a motive for individual virtue. The philosophy of life of which we speak is Christian faith which bids man recognize his own spiritual nature, his free-will, his eternal destiny, his duties to God which form the only substantial basis of his social rights and duties, and which finds the ideal of human life realized in Jesus Christ.

Contempt for Toil

NO small part of social unrest is due to the widespread contempt for ordinary work fostered by false educational ideals. Education is sought as a means of escaping labor, and social caste is built on the avoidance of physical toil. The greater part of labor must always involve wearisome monotony which will provoke chafing unrest until a philosophy of life and labor is adopted which gives a dignity to work. When Christianity was first introduced the same secular ideals that are prevalent today proclaimed the servility of toil. Christ's example and doctrine transfused the most menial occupations with Divine purpose. Under the influence of that teaching the most ordinary actions became meritorious of eternal life and the Christian toiler was reconciled with, nay, found joy and the fulfilment of duty in the contented performance of necessary physical tasks. "To work is to pray," was the spirit of the religious discipline which drained the marshes of Europe and made the deserts bloom with beauty.

Stewardship of Wealth

ANOTHER cause of industrial unrest is the irresponsible use of wealth by its possessors. The envy of the less fortunate is aroused by the prodigal and senseless extravagance of the rich, just as the hatred of the weak is inflamed by the unjust dealings of the powerful. Until the possessor shall learn that he has not absolute right to the disposal of his wealth there can be no industrial peace. He must learn that he is merely a steward, holding his possessions and power in trust from God and that after his own reasonable needs and the needs of his family are satisfied he is bound in charity to use his possession for the well-being of his neighbor. He cannot do what he pleases with his own, but must do what God pleases. Until the majority of possessors come to the Christian view of the stewardship of wealth, all programs for industrial peace must retain the character of unreal speculation. The theory of the unlimited ownership of wealth so dear to the human heart, is a perennial source of feud and contention.

Building on Air

MODERN sociology is largely an attempt to find a substitute for Christian faith as a basis of social obligation. The attempt has been more than a failure; it has been a world calamity. It has removed the old sanctions of social order, and unable to maintain so weighty a fabric on an airy nothing, has precipitated the structure into utter dissolution from which it can be retrieved only by the slow process of reconstructing society on its old foundation. The appeal of modern sociology is to the solidarity of the race. "We owe everything to those who have gone before us," so runs the argument, "therefore let us act justly and virtuously for the sake of those who come after us." What could be more unconvincing to the man tempted by avarice, envy, or lust of power? What more fatuous? Why should I pay to future generations a debt which I owe to my ancestors? There is no valid foundation or sanction for social justice except that provided by Christian faith. God is our Father; both we and our neighbor are equally His children. Thus our duty to God involves respect for the rights of our neighbor. There is no other sufficient basis for social obligation than this, and those who hope to establish a social order on other foundation are building on shifting sands.

Making Democracy Safe

AUTOCRATIC control of industry like political autocracy has always been a source of irritation and the tendency has been to find the road to peace in both spheres in progressive democratization. But if democracy is to mean simply the rule of the majority and not the rule of justice, the hopes reposed in democracy will never be realized. Democracy, political and industrial, makes larger demands, intellectual and moral, upon the individual than any other form of organization. It is true that the majority is more likely to be just in the long run than is the individual despot. But the majority, if guided only by self-interest and expedience, may be as tyrannical as any czar and may create unrest as distressing as that provoked by any industrial despot.

A democracy demands not only a wider diffusion of education, if it is to be a stable and just social order, but it requires also, a higher individual sense of justice. Only in the conscience of the individual can democracy find a safe-guard. Law will not protect it, for in a democracy, law is only the expression of the will of the majority. The diffusion of secular knowledge will be of little avail for secular education does not touch the will. Nor can there be an appeal to force, for democracy would then cease to be. Only in the development of conscience will the safeguard be found. Only by adopting the philosophy of life born of Christian faith will democracy be made safe for the world. No other voice but that of the Divine Master can effectively address the tumultuous waves of industrial unrest, "Peace be still" Democracy carries in its breast the solution of industrial problems, but it must be Christian democracy. The final formula will be the phrase approvingly quoted by Piux X.: La démocratie sera catholique.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Jesuit Instructor at Japanese Imperial University

A LETTER from the Catholic University Institute, Tokyo, Japan, notifies us of the recent appointment of the Rev. Mark J. McNeal, S.J., a graduate of Georgetown University, Washington, as Lecturer in English Literature in the Imperial University of Tokyo. He is the first American so honored by the Japanese, and his selection is therefore welcomed with special gratification by the American Association. The students are the "pick" of all Japan. Father McNeal is thus offered an excellent opportunity of constant association with the professors of the University and of close familiarity with its students. He will doubtless be able, incidentally, to remove many false notions regarding Christianity at the very center of the intellectual life of Japan. His genial character, no less than his literary accomplishments, will win for him many friends among the faculty and the pupils.

A Chicago Professor of Sociology

PROF. WILLIAM ISAAC THOMAS, formerly of Oberlin and lately of Chicago University, recently obtained a short-lived and infamous notoriety by setting at defiance the Sixth and Ninth Commandments and proclaiming his emancipation from the law of God. Among his sayings, as quoted in the Cleveland Leader, April 13, are such as the following:

> Women are better off for having their fling as men do. Dissipated women often make excellent wives. . . . The morality of women is an expediency rather than an innate virtue. . . . Matrimony is often an arrangement by which the woman trades irreproachable conduct for irreproachable gowns. . . . Any girl, mentally mature, has the right to have children and the right to limit their number.

These and other similar observations of a prurient and diseased mind have no interest for us, except in so far as they once more bring home to Catholics the danger of sending their children to non-Catholic universities. Prof. Thomas had written his sex literature and promulgated his degenerate views while still a faculty member of the University of Chicago, holding his position at the very time he committed the overt act that brought him into public disgrace or obtained for him the coveted notoriety, accordingly as we view the situation. But what of the parents who had fondly entrusted their sons and daughters to his training? The lesson we presume will make slight impression upon spineless and "prominent" Catholics determined, in spite of all the exhortations of the Church, to give their children a godless education in order to advance them in their "social climbing."

Marquette Medical Summer School

THE Marquette Medical School, Milwaukee, announces a three months' term for laboratory technicians, to begin Monday, June 10. The courses are: (1) Pathology, including the work involved in the various examinations of clinical pathology, diseased tissue and bacteriology; (2) Dietetics, a study of the chemistry involved, work in the chemical laboratory and in the dietetic kitchen, and the preparation of diets for the patient; (3) X-rays, a study of the principles, learning the X-ray apparatus, the technique of diagnosis and treatment, and practice in the application of this work; (4) Hospital records, which includes the taking of histories, the making and filing of records; (5) Lectures on special subjects. The courses are open to trained nurses, graduates of colleges, normal and high schools and to others who are qualified. Applications must be made immediately. The course is of the highest importance at the present time in view of the war exigencies and the need of hospital and private service.

A Plea for Belgian Soldiers

A PLEA is sent to us for the Belgian soldier boys who have now been in the trenches for almost four years. They are without news from parents or relatives and in constant anxiety as to the latter's safety. Unlike our American soldiers, or the British and French, they can receive no comforts from home, nor can they make extensive purchases with their meager pay, said to be equivalent to about five cents a day. A gift from a friend in America to these men, who are mainly Catholics, will bring a new ray of joy into their lives. Addresses of Belgian soldiers can be obtained from the Belgian News Fund, 21 Russell Square, London, W.C. Here are a few addresses of Catholic soldiers: Arthur Van Driessche, M. d. Logis, Z. 302, E. M. III Gr.; Achiel De Coster, Z. 55, Ier Escadron, 4e Peleton; Gaston De Coster, Z. 205, 11e Compagnie; Gérard Nollet, Z. 205, 11e Compagnie. To each of the addresses must be added the general destination: Belgian Army in the Field, Flanders Front. These men correspond in Flemish and French and understand a little English. There is no difficulty in having names of Catholic soldiers supplied since almost all are Catholics.

The Logic of Faith

THE following striking words of the great Bishop Ullathorne, which serve as the closing argument of a mission calendar prepared by the Fathers of the Divine Word, Techny, Ill., may well be read by us with an eye single to our own United States, although they were written by an English prelate and originally intended for English readers:

> I believe our own future will be blessed with increase in proportion as we, with earnest faith, send help to them who cry to us—as we have cried to others and received their help. I believe it, because it is the disposition of our heavenly Father greatly to help those who do such works of faith and charity. I believe it, because their is no charity greater or more blessed than that which co-operates with God in sending His servants forth to spread His light and minister His grace to the nations afar off, who sit in darkness and alienation of soul from their supreme God. I believe it, because the mission to the heathen is the school of generous heroes, whose works of faith and sanctity will bless the country that supports them. I believe it on the word of our Blessed Lord: "Give and it shall be given unto you again, full measure, and heaped up and overflowing into your bosom." All facts show the operation of this heavenly law of charity.

The logic of this unassailable argument was convincingly applied by Cardinal Manning, when he proved that the crying need of means at home was the very reason for giving the most liberal donations to the missions abroad:

> It is quite true, we have need of means at home, and it is because we have need of means at home, and of more means by a great deal than we as yet possess, that I am convinced that we ought to send means abroad. It is because I believe that in enriching others we shall not impoverish ourselves, that I, therefore, believe it to be our duty, and I believe it to be strictly in accordance with the letter and spirit of our Master's example, of whom it is said: "Who, though He was rich, yet for our sakes He became poor, that we, through His poverty, might be rich." I am entirely convinced that if we desire to find the surest way to multiply immensely our own material means for our work at home, it is by not limiting the expansion of charity and by not paralyzing the zeal of self-denial. Holy Scripture teaches us that there are those who give and are yet enriched, and there are those who withhold from giving and are always in want.

There could be no better time than the present for Americans to put into practice this logic of their Faith.

A Protestant Recognition of Catholic Service

MANY ancient prejudices were broken down during the Knights of Columbus drive. Among the notable speeches delivered by Protestants, attention deserves to be called in particular to the words of John C. Ten Eyck, one of the most prominent attorneys of Yonkers. He thus expressed his profound appreciation of the Catholic Church and of the work performed by her:

> I have not been asked to help in this campaign by the Roman Catholic Church. I would have been proud had I been asked. The man does not live whose eloquence can express even a tithe of the service of the Church to the world and the civilization we enjoy. But even I can express my consciousness of some obligation to that Church which was the only Church of God when no other Church was in existence. It was that Church which preserved the Gospel during the early days of the Christian era. It was that Church which struggled for, maintained, defended and promulgated the principles of sound morals and human culture. It was that Church which preserved the wisdom of the ancients, which otherwise would have been lost, which preserved the great manuscripts in the safe places of the monasteries and ecclesiastical temples of Europe.

Describing then the eagerness with which the Catholic Church in America has sent forth her sons to interpose their breasts between their country's safety and the threatening peril across the sea, he thus gave the reason why Protestants contributed to the war fund of the Knights of Columbus, aside from the fact that all alike are cordially welcomed in every K. of C. building at home or abroad:

> There can be no conscience so accusing as the conscience of a non-Catholic who has permitted a Catholic boy to die without the last rites of his own Faith. We Protestants are not so blind as not to know that Catholics love their Faith above all other possessions; therefore we Protestants must give those Catholic boys in their hour of trial what they ask. No honest American can question that this is the only way to help those boys, and it is our duty to provide all they need. If the sacrifice is great we still must make it, for nothing that we can do, whatever our beliefs may be concerning their beliefs, bears comparison to the sacrifices that they are making for us.
> It is no business of mine to challenge the most sacred convictions of those boys as they lie with broken bodies and anguished souls in pools of their own blood, shed for me and mine, but it is my business to see to it that all their demand is given to them. We Protestants are not blind enough not to know that the Catholic soldier whose conscience is at peace with God is a dauntless soldier, whose faith in the life after life is greater than his fear of death.

Though there still remain hearts dark and sinister enough to harbor envy and hatred against the great Church to whom we owe all that is noblest in our Christian civilization, yet we cannot fail to realize that there exists likewise a sincere and deep appreciation of the glorious work she has accomplished in the past and is performing today in the service of mankind.

Chronicle

The War.—The week, which has everywhere been one of comparative quiet, opened on the western front with two attacks made by Australian troops west and southwest of Morlancourt, between the Somme and the Ancre Rivers. In the first they gained 700 yards on a 1,500-yard front, and in the second 500 yards on a 2,000-yard front. At the same time the British improved their positions on the south side of the Lys salient, near Locon. On the north side of the salient the French and the British crept forward by a series of small local gains until they were in a good position to renew their assaults on Mount Kemmel. The communiqués of May 7 reported heavy artillery actions along the entire Flanders front. The German guns pounded the advanced bases behind the Allied lines, from Ypres all the way around the northern curve to Meteren and Hazebrouck, while the Allied artillery shelled the German supply roads. Below Arras, at Neuville-Vitasse, the Canadians successfully raided the enemy's trenches; at Boyelles the Germans counter-raided but were repulsed. On May 8, in a strong local attack the Germans gained a footing at several points on the Allied front south of Dickebusch Lake and midway between La Clytte and Voormezeele, north of the Kemmel region. South of La Clytte the French meanwhile advanced their lines, while on the Amiens sector, between the Somme and the Ancre Rivers, the Australians made some slight gains. The later dispatches of the week told of marked activity of both Allied and German artillery on the Vimy and Robec sectors of the British front and south of Dickebusch, also north of Albert, in the region of Mount Kemmel, on both sides of the Luce and the Avre, and on the Hailles-Montdidier sector southeast of Amiens. On May 11 the enemy attacked southwest of Mailly-Raineval, between Hangard and Montdidier, and gained some ground which was subsequently retaken by the French. In the Ypres sector the Allied line rests against the northern slopes of Mount Kemmel, with Hill 44 in the possession of General Pétain's troops. In a vigorous attack near Moreuil Wood, northwest of Orvilliers-Sorel, in the sector east of Montdidier, the Germans were driven back.

Bulletin, May 6, p.m.-May 13, a.m.

The American troops were several times in action. Berlin claims that "heavy losses were inflicted upon them" southwest of Apremont (east of St. Mihiel, in the "northwest of Toul" sector) and north of Parroy (in the Lunéville region) by a strong mine bombardment. It has been announced that the Americans will be held back of the lines until they are a complete, self-supporting fighting force.

Operations designed to close the port of Ostend were successfully completed the night of May 9, when the obsolete cruiser Vindictive was sunk between the piers and across the entrance of Ostend harbor. Since the attack on Zeebrugge on April 23, the Vindictive had been filled with concrete and fitted as a block shop for that purpose. The British light forces retired to their base with the loss of one motor-launch, which had been damaged and was sunk to prevent it from falling into the hands of the enemy. The British casualties were slight. The Vindictive lies about a hundred yards up the channel with her bows pointing toward the harbor. She probably did not block the whole harbor, but made it impassable for big ships.

The Ostend Raid

An attack on Mr. Lloyd George, the British Premier, threatened to overthrow the British Cabinet. Major-General F. B. Maurice, late Chief Director of Military Operations, charged Lloyd George and Andrew Bonar Law with having misstated and misrepresented military facts in their reports to the House of Commons. The charges brought about one of the most striking episodes in the stormy career of the Premier. They seemed for a while to have staggered the public. While General Maurice staked his reputation and his future career in the army on the substantiation of his accusations the Premier took up the challenge and just as boldly staked his tenure of office on their refutation.

Lloyd George and the Maurice Charges

After the appointment of General Foch as Commander-in-Chief of the Allied Armies, General Maurice had made what was considered a disparaging remark about him in a comparison drawn between General Foch's action in dealing with the offensive on the western front and that of the tardy Blücher in coming to the help of the British army at Waterloo. Immediately after the unwarranted criticism he was removed from his post of Chief Director of Military Operations. General Maurice also charged that the extension of the British line south of St. Quentin was a matter dealt with at the Versailles Conference, and that the impression existed that the British forces were more numerous and strong than they really were. The implication in the accusation was that the Premier had allowed a wrong impression to prevail in defending the Government on the charge of having weakened the British forces in France. General Maurice said that the ministerial statements referred to were known to a large number of military men not to be in accordance with the facts, that such a knowledge was breeding distrust of the Government and that it had been implied that the British armies had failed to hold their ground in the presence of inferior numbers. All these facts combined, he held, tended to weaken the morale of the troops.

The Premier answered the indictment in the House of Commons on May 9, and won a complete vindication. Former Premier Asquith's motion for the appointment of a select committee to investigate the Maurice charges was rejected by a vote of 293 to 106. As to the figures to which General Maurice had taken exception, the Premier showed that not only were they accurate but that they had been taken from the General's Office. As to the implication that the British front had been unduly extended, he proved with documentary evidence that although a regrettable necessity, this action had been taken at the request of the French and with the approval of the War Cabinet and Field Marshal Haig. In conclusion, he pleaded for harmony and union among men of all parties, saying, "I really beg, for our common country, the fate of which is in the balance now and in the next few weeks; I beg and implore that there should be an end of sniping." General Maurice has been put on the retired list.

Rumania has been forced to sign a treaty of peace with Germany. The terms of the treaty strip Rumania of the upper and lower Dobrudja, as well as of a slice of territory on the Austrian frontier. She is furthermore compelled to support a German army of occupation in her conquered territory, to reduce her army to an insignificant number of troops under German control, and to permit German warships along the whole length of the Danube. Rumania is allowed to annex Bessarabia. The treaty practically makes the country a German province.

The Rumanian Treaty

While the internal dissensions in the Ukraine are growing more and more serious, the German methods in the country are evoking opposition and hatred in all quarters. The situation has become so critical that, according to the correspondent of the Amsterdam Exchange Telegraph Company, the Germans were obliged to dispatch large detachments of Bavarian cavalry into the country. An official Ukrainian report received in Washington states that on May 10 the building in which the Central Rada sits was surrounded by men in the uniform of German officers and soldiers and men of the Central Rada as well as members of the Government who had assembled for the session of the Rada were arrested and searched.

Crisis in the Ukraine

The charges of dishonesty and corruption in aircraft production made by the sculptor Gutzon Borglum, and which many contend may prove a "boomerang" upon his own reputation, are still occupying official circles in Washington. After comparatively brief consideration the House passed the Sedition bill, which originated in the Senate. The bill provides the President with the broadest powers for punishing disloyal acts and utterances. Only Representative London of New York, a Socialist, voted against the measure. National Memorial Day, Thursday, May 30, was designated by President Wilson in a proclamation issued on May 11, as a day of public humiliation, prayer and fasting "to pray Almighty God that He may forgive us our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth . . . beseeching that He will give victory to our armies as they fight for freedom . . . and steadfastness to our people to make sacrifice to the utmost in support of what is just and true, bringing us at last the peace in which men's hearts can be at rest because it is founded upon mercy, justice and good-will."

Home News

Ireland.—Events that threatened the existence of the Government in England and forced the Cabinet to fight for its life, have shelved for the time-being the settlement of the case of Ireland. No official progress in the direction of a solution has been made and affairs are in the same condition as last week. Ireland is solidly committed to passive resistance of compulsory conscription, every parish having taken the pledge drawn up by the Hierarchy after consultation with the Lord Mayor of Dublin, Mr. de Valera, Mr. Dillon, Mr. Healy and Mr. O'Brien: "Denying the right of the British Government to enforce compulsory service in this country, we pledge ourselves solemnly to one another to resist conscription by the most effective means at our disposal."

Home Rule and Conscription

Editorial comment in England ranges from the bluster of the Spectator: "There will be fierce rioting for a time, but as soon as the Irish people see that the Government are going to stand no nonsense and will shoot but not argue they will go quietly," to the moderate views of the London Tablet: "It is difficult, therefore, to see why, apart from the question of expediency, which is quite another matter—Ireland, having, as an integral part of the United Kingdom, assumed at the outset her full share of the responsibility for the war, should not now be asked to take her fair part in the burden of service and sacrifice which the war involves."

The question of expediency has been well stated in an appeal sent to the British Government by a joint committee of the British Trades Union Congress and Labor Party:

It must be clearly evident to the Government that an attempt to enforce conscription would mean not only the shedding of blood of thousands of Irishmen, Englishmen and Scotchmen, but also the maintenance of a huge permanent army of occupation in Ireland. Today every soldier is needed on the western front, yet the Government is proposing a course which will involve the withdrawal of hundreds of thousands of soldiers to engage in a civil war, which will outrage the conscience of the civilized world. Moreover, Irishmen are scattered over the wide world—in America and in the dominions of Great Britain itself—besides large numbers on the western front. The tragedy cannot be local or confined to Ireland. It may easily be the beginning of a world tragedy, in which our last hopes of a fairer future will be extinguished. . . . With all these facts and terrible anticipations in mind, we confidently appeal to the Government immediately to take the necessary steps to avert the appalling disaster which now threatens.

Sir Horace Plunkett, chairman of the recent Irish convention, in a letter to the press paints the situation in somber colors:

At the gravest crisis with which the Empire has ever been faced, the Government have staked their existence on a twofold Irish policy—conscription and Home Rule. They cannot achieve both except at the cost of much present bloodshed and lasting hate. They might achieve the first and by it make the second impossible. In my opinion, they would fail in the attempt and have to go on, leaving both undone. Their successors then would have to find a way out of the worst Irish situation in my memory, which goes back to the Fenian days, fifty years ago.

Although he despairs of any settlement if conscription is made compulsory, he nevertheless entertains hopes of a way out of the tangle if the Government would drop the enforcement of the program of enforced service and leave it to the Irish sense of right to determine the question by voluntary recruiting in their own Parliament:

I believe the Government could not only satisfy the reasonable aspirations of the Irish at home, but also get them to follow voluntarily the instincts of the chivalrous race and the example of their kinsmen and sympathizers throughout the United States and the British dominions. There is only one alternative to the disastrous policy upon which the Government has embarked, namely, to set up immediately a responsible government in Ireland. The report of the convention has shown this could be done with the support of a large body of Nationalist and Unionist opinion. The Government should pass through Parliament without delay the necessary legislation as a war measure. The moment the bill is passed an Irish executive committee, broadly representative and composed of responsible men who would not shirk the burden of their brief authority, should be appointed and given the task of setting up a Parliament as quickly as possible, promoting voluntary recruiting and generally carrying on. The Irish people, given their own instrument of government, would quickly show the world their real attitude in this war.

Not all agree with Sir Horace Plunkett in his hopes for the success of voluntary recruiting in the event of Ireland's being given her own Parliament and a free hand to deal with her contribution to the armed forces of the Empire, but there is practical unanimity in the conviction that the proposed enforcement of conscription without the concession of Home Rule is doomed to certain failure. Nor is there any evidence of confidence that the enforcement of it, even with the concomitant granting of Home Rule, will have any measure of success.

Compulsory conscription is universally regarded in Ireland as a violation of essential rights. Cardinal Logue's message to the meeting at Armagh crystallizes the sentiment of the people: "I am heart and soul with the meeting at Armagh. Forcible conscription is an outrage on the clergy and people of Ireland. There is nothing for it but passive resistance to it in every shape and form."

The Irish Catholic, while deprecating denials of England's right to legislate for Ireland, is no less outspoken than the Cardinal on the conscription issue:

For ourselves let us say at once that we do not believe that much, or anything at all, is to be gained by calling in question the competence of Parliament to enact laws that are legally binding upon the people of this realm of Ireland. We prefer to challenge the action of the Government on the ground that the proposed legislation is unjust and immoral, and, therefore, not binding upon the conscience of the Irish subjects of the Crown. This view of the conscription proposals is clearly implied in the criticisms of our Bishops, who have already spoken, and who have now given a clear lead to their people.

Mr. Devlin goes into more detail and takes his stand on the broad principle of the right of peoples to self-determination:

Today, from every corner of Ireland, from Antrim to Cork, from Galway to Dublin, there has gone forth the mighty expression of a nation's indignation, evoked by this outrage against the people's liberty. The endeavor of one nation to conscript another is a principle we cannot accept or acquiesce in; if we did we should be in reality and in truth the slaves they think us to be. We here in Ireland have the right to demand that the policy of self-determination, which we understand is the doctrine of our rulers, should operate in this country. If they are fighting for small nations, and the right of small nations to determine their own destiny, then we say we also take our stand upon this principle of self-determination, and we will be conscripted when we decide ourselves that we should be conscripted.

We tell them further that they make themselves a byword throughout the world when they talk about the rights of small nations, and deny its application to this small nation—one of the most ancient, most highly civilized nations in Europe, the nation which, with its splendid Christian ideals, has been an exemplar to humanity, whose sons have carried the banner of truth, liberty and justice in every quarter of the globe. What up to now has been the achievement of these, our masters, who are our masters only by virtue of their superior military power? Do not imagine that all England is in favor of this policy. All that is thoughtful in England, all that has prescience and observation, look upon this policy as mistaken and criminal.

Cardinal Logue's statement that the Pope was in no way responsible for the attitude of the Irish Hierarchy in their opposition to conscription having proved insufficient to stay the spread of this falsehood, the Most Reverend John Harty, Archbishop of Cashel, took occasion in the course of a speech, made at Thurles, May 6, to declare that all talk about any action by the Pope in the matter of resistance to compulsory service arose in the imagination of some English bigots who had attempted by a cry of "No Popery!" to intimidate the Irish Bishops. The Irish Bishops, he said, had interfered in the conscription issue because moral and religious questions were involved.

Rome.—The Holy Father, true to the course which he has unswervingly adhered to from his accession to the Pontificate of striving to effect a restoration of the reign of justice to the world, has addressed a message to all peoples in which he urges all to unite in prayer on the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul, June 29, for the cessation of the evils which are tormenting humanity. He bids the world lift its eyes to God and to put its trust in Him. He calls attention to the fact that the anger of God at the sins of mankind must be placated, if He who is the arbiter of human events is to intervene and bring back to a storm-swept world charity and justice. The best way to appease His wrath and to propitiate His offended majesty is the Divine Sacrifice of the Mass, which all Catholics and all priests are to offer with the intention of hastening the advent of peace, joining with the Holy Sacrifice humble prayer and persevering supplication that the supreme desire of all be granted and that justice be restored. A special prayer is to be said during the Mass of Sts. Peter and Paul, imploring Almighty God to have pity on His children.

Prayer for Peace

Russia.—In a letter printed in the February 2 Illustration, General Yanouchkevitch, Chief of the Russian General Staff, maintains that his deposition, made before the Senate in the Soukhomlinof case, was not taken down correctly and that the German press "spread absurd rumors" about what he said regarding "the subject of the orders for and the day of the Russian mobilization." He now declares:

The Day of Russia's Mobilization

> I affirmed, in my deposition and before, that the Germans were ready before we were, because they had the advantages of that secret mobilization which does not exist in Russia. Then I related how on July 29, 1914, when in accordance with the Emperor's orders, I was in conversation with the German military attaché, Major Egeling, I informed him that if the mobilization of the Russian army should take place on the German frontier, it would by no means be done with a view to aggressive measures against Germany. I then assured Major Egeling that it was the contour of the Austro-German frontier which would force us, in case of mobilization against Austria, to mobilize the troops on the German frontier as well. To this it was that the German military attaché had the audacity to reply with respectful irony, that it little mattered as he was "sure that the Russian mobilization had already taken place." It was in vain that I assured him of the contrary and gave him my word of honor, as Chief of the Russian General Staff, that orders for the mobilization of the Russian had not yet been given; that, according to our Russian law, known as well to him as to me, it was not possible to mobilize our army without a ukase from the Senate being published and known to all the people; that the reservists could not otherwise be called up. The German officer firmly maintained that he was certain of the contrary.
> Outraged by this audacity, but willing to believe that it was a misunderstanding, and anxious to avoid any chance of a catastrophe, I offered to give Major Egeling a written denial on the spot; but he refused. And it was this that convinced me that Germany wanted war and was only seeking a mere pretext. I immediately informed the minister Soukhomlinof of the matter. Mobilization did not take place on the German frontier until July 31.

As Germany has always maintained that she mobilized her forces only because Russia was discovered to be getting ready to attack her, this letter of General Yanouchkevitch is of great importance, throwing, as it does, new light on the solution of the question: Who began the war?

According to an Associated Press dispatch from Harbin, Manchuria, Russian officers of all ranks, in a pitiful state of destitution, have been flocking there from all parts of Siberia, seeking to enlist as private soldiers in the British and American armies. They escaped from large military centers only after undergoing great hardships and much suffering at the hands of the Bolsheviki. Revolting troops shot their officers, and in some instances the latter's families, and in those regiments where a semblance of discipline remained the officers were first degraded and then set at menial tasks which they found so unendurable that many committed suicide, while others who resented the indignities heaped upon them were brutally tortured and murdered. A number of those who tried to escape by making the long journey to Harbin were caught on the way and killed.

Refugee Officers' Sufferings.

An American who recently returned from Russia reports a condition of chaos in the country, saying:

> The country has reached the zenith of individualism. Every one is out for himself. Justice is dealt on the spot by the people who happen to be around. Meetings are called on the slightest pretext for discussion and action.
> The Government issued forty-ruble notes, about the size of postage stamps, and there were numerous counterfeits. Some of the counterfeiters, in their naïve Russian way, printed on the top of their spurious notes, "Ours is as good as the Government's"—and they were.
> Germany is getting very little out of Russia now except food, and even the raising of the crops has been neglected utterly, so that the country will face starvation by the end of the year unless radical steps are taken in the meantime to insure a food supply.

In the hope of bringing relief to the stricken country, an American League to Aid and Cooperate with Russia has been formed with Frank J. Goodnow, the head of Johns Hopkins University, as president. At the first meeting of the League held in Washington, May 2, resolutions were adopted expressing confidence in the Russian people and pledging the "energy and full force" of the organization "toward effectively safeguarding our common liberty and toward throwing off the yoke of autocratic power, to the end that the world may enjoy a lasting peace and fair dealing between all nations."

Prohibition, the Mass and the Supreme Court

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

THE Constitution was ratified as a national instrument and not as a mere compact between States, but mostly by narrow majorities; and strict construction held wide sway till Jefferson, its leading exponent, discarded it in 1800 to effect the Louisiana Purchase. Popular approval of this achievement and the national self-consciousness that grew out of the war of 1812, and buoyant western expansion strengthened the national Government; but the strongest nationalizing factor was the Supreme Court, which, under Chief Justice Marshall, brought first into exercise the large powers granted it by the Constitution. As member of the Virginia Constitutional Convention, Marshall had said: "To the judiciary you must look for protection from an infringement of the Constitution"; but he held it no infringement to limit the powers of the States, as in the Dartmouth College case, for the protection of individual rights, nor to allow Congress a liberal use of "implied powers," in a famous opinion which has close pertinence to our present question: "Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional." This has become an accepted principle of constitutional interpretation; and hence the converse should equally control: Let the end be legitimate—as the continuance of a "mode of worship" coeval with the Constitution assuredly is—all means and laws which, though not prohibited, are inconsistent with the letter of constitutional acts and the spirit of the Constitution, are to be considered unconstitutional.

The Civil War, as successful wars are wont, expanded the central Government's powers; and the Supreme Court, enlarging the Marshall doctrine, usually interpreted them to extend to whatsoever the Constitution did not forbid. This tendency has been operative even to our day, and the Constitution has been found at times strangely complaisant.

Whether we approve or disapprove the evolution, the fact is obvious. The Supreme Court has jurisdiction in all such cases as implied State or national prohibition of Sacramental wine, if only because it has frequently exercised it. Article III of the Constitution gives the Supreme Court either original or appellate jurisdiction, "both as to law and to fact," in almost every conceivable case "in law and equity, arising under the Constitution, the laws of the United States, and Treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority"; and in "Texas v. White" and numerous other decisions, the Court has itself formally asserted its far-reaching powers. The danger lies not in the limitations of its jurisdiction, but in the undue extension of it to justify executive encroachments, insidious or open. The words of laws and constitutions should be interpreted, as Justice Story defined, "in their natural sense, and not in a sense unreasonably restricted or enlarged"; that is, implied powers must be really implied, and the Courts should apply the "rule of reason" reasonably.

We have no reason to fear such application. Fundamental law, compacts, treaties, custom, judicial precedent, enforce our natural right to exercise our "mode of worship" unrestricted, and therefore to procure the elements requisite for its vital and essential act. "You take my life when you do take the means whereby I live." Religiously, the Mass is our life; and true wine, that which Christ used and the Church has ever ruled indispensable, is a means essential to its living. That laws prohibitive of such wine are destructive of our freedom of worship, and therefore are, and should be declared, unconstitutional and invalid, needs no further elaboration. That the Supreme Court will actually so declare is a presage of future contingency which none but a prophet may utter of any body of fallible and more or less flexible interpreters.

The Supreme Court has been the mainstay of the U. S. Constitution, laws and treaties, making them in fact what the Sixth Article defines them, "the supreme law of the land." Its guardianship of our organic law is the unique American feature of what Gladstone termed "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a given time by the brain and purpose of man." The Supreme Court has executed its trust with wisdom and fidelity. By sound and broad-visioned interpretation it has, with rare exceptions, exercised wise restraint on hasty legislation and biased construction, and beneficently evoked the latent powers of the Constitution.

But the Supreme Court is human. Of different origins, traditions and environment, its members hold different views on political, religious and social questions; and that they are influenced thereby appears from the fact that on questions of political bearing they usually divide on party lines, and when feelings run high and views are dominant their decisions follow the popular bent. They are influenced like others by the atmosphere that encircles them, and this circle of influence compasses the nation. It is therefore incumbent on us to purify this atmosphere and eliminate or neutralize its vitiating elements.

We must continue resolutely to insist on our constitutional rights, individually and collectively, and support them from the ample legal and historical sources at our disposal. We must make it clear to the people at large that any prohibitive law which in effect prohibits our essential worship not only inflicts a great wrong upon us, but also upon them, inasmuch as it undermines those fundamental rights which are the basis of our common liberties. We must not quibble over technicalities nor let the occasional obstacles affright us that necessarily arise in the centuried paths trodden by not a few devious lawyers and legists. We must stand on the plain sense and intent of our organic laws, our customs and constitutions; and we must, in all loyalty, sedulously abstain from lightly picking flaws in the defense of our friends and playing devil's advocate for our enemies.

The Trail of the "American Patriots"

ISMENA T. MARTIN

THROUGH the leading cities of the United States and Canada bands of fanatics are operating under various noms de plume, afraid to face the sunlight. Offices are maintained in the heart of the cities in which the tribe congregates, but no sign over the door tells the name of the occupant, or the nature of the business transacted. The city and telephone directories are equally vague, usually listing the managers as "organizers" or "club organizers." Why this secrecy? Hush! The "American Patriots" are within! They are the only body of men joined together in a common cause, ashamed to wear a badge of their lodge, ashamed to admit membership. Their one aim is to overthrow the Catholic Church, their binding tie, common hatred for their Catholic fellow-men.

The Methodist Church stands convicted as a sponsor of this band. In New York State it operates as "The Great Secret Order," with Bishop Burt, of Buffalo, State Master. This good Methodist Bishop is known to fame as a political worker of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and was for some few years its resident European Bishop. Think not that the divine is wearing a badge to identify him with the latest anti-Catholic movement. The proof, however, is at hand to show that he is the head and tail of the tribe in New York State.

An illiterate wanderer who helped out Brother Burt in recent political work in New York State is at the head of the movement in Maryland, the cradle of religious liberty. Certain Methodist churches have been used for meeting-places, where candidates have been initiated to further the anti-Catholic campaign and to set brother against brother. The Baptist Church has stood loyally by its Methodist sister, and both are teaching their congregations anew to pray for the destruction of Rome.

The "Patriots" are next heard of in Michigan, where they are still working in the dark. They do not even own up to the title, and when a ray of light points their way they run to cover. Only a handful of the nondescript appear at their public meetings, and only the rabble come out in the open. The headquarters are in a Detroit office building. The members are ashamed of their membership and Detroit blushes for the organization.

A physician, whose sickly smile preordained him as a fit model for a statue of intolerance, folds his arms and beams down upon his brothers-in-arms at public meetings. A minister in charge of a Baptist church on the edge of the city manfully takes his stand with the defamer of Catholicism, and a dapper little negro lawyer completes the trinity. The physician smiles upon the minister, and is rewarded with the choicest brand of ministerial approval, while the negro, trailing behind, is proud to be permitted to touch the hem of the garments of his bosom companions. These three men, of infinitesimal minds, and of even less influence, fondly imagine that they hold in the hollow of their hands the fate of the Catholic schools of the great State of Michigan.

These "patriots" ushered in May Day by bringing Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida, to lecture throughout Michigan on "Americanism." Under that deceiving title the Florida Governor explained how and why the Catholic schools should be legislated out of existence, via the constitutional-amendment route, that darling of the bigots. He punctuated his address with vitriolic attacks upon the Pope, the Church, the priest, the nun: indeed, on everything Catholic. In Detroit he held two meetings in the Detroit Armory from which thousands of Detroit Catholic boys so lately marched away to France, to fight, and if need be, to die, that liberty might live! To the credit of Detroit, however, let it be said that not a corporal's guard turned out to listen. The newspapers ignored the meetings, and though 10,000 invitations were sent out through the mails and in other ways to the members of the Methodist and Baptist Churches, the elect were afraid to come out in the open. Among the two or three hundred people gathered in the Armory to hear the lecturer, not one was of sufficient importance to be taken seriously.

The men who financed the affair kept well in the background. Men who hobnobbed with Catts in Washington last December during the Anti-Saloon League convention, knew him not in Detroit. He came into the city unheralded and went out unsung. He dined alone. He was kept aloof by his keepers. During his lecture the Governor let the cat out of the bag, for he called the Methodist Church the mother of the anti-Catholic movement, even though he did so unconsciously. The men who spoke for a liberal collection adroitly referred to the fact that every "patriot" should be represented when the cash was counted. The envelopes passed around were labeled "Patriotic Fund" and for "patriotic purposes."

At the first meeting a man from out in the State was pressed into service as chairman. The second evening the minister presided and was introduced as one Detroit citizen who "had the courage to sit on the platform"—with Florida's Governor. This follower of the gentle Nazarene took pride in introducing the speaker as a man who had made his campaign for Governor of Florida on this issue we are presenting tonight. He was elected Governor against almost insuperable odds, with a combination of forces against him. The liquor traffic was against him, the hirelings of the Church of Rome were against him—all the weight of that sinister body was hurled against him. But, with the great propaganda which he spread amongst the people, to the great chagrin and the great surprise of the politicians, all who controlled the votes of the Church of Rome, and the liquor interests, this man was elected. So now, a Baptist preacher sits in the Mansion House, Governor of Florida.

To add a touch of Baptist culture to his introduction, the minister added: "One of the nicest things about his campaign was, I think, his stand that nothing but the American flag should decorate a platform from which he spoke, and that no flag should ever hang over the American flag in Florida." Catts was plainly annoyed because he was "used to talking to acres of people in Florida," and he bemoaned the fact that the almost empty Armory gave mute testimony to the cowardice of his financial backers. For he said:

Hear me talking. There's nothing to be afraid about in this amendment. It simply means that all residents of the State of Michigan, between the ages of five and sixteen years, shall be compelled to attend the public schools, and that the Legislature shall enact appropriate legislation to enforce the law. We have this same amendment in Florida, only we don't bother calling it an amendment to anything. We simply call it compulsory public education. You have it exactly as we have it in Florida today. I am afraid there is something wrong here in Michigan. Every one seems to be afraid. The preachers are afraid; the ministers are afraid; the D.D's the LLD's, the A.S.S.'s are afraid—all afraid of this amendment and of the Catholic machinery. It was the same thing in Florida. All the big preachers were afraid. Not a single church or minister, except the Methodist, fought with me in Florida. After I won, they were all with me. But, bless the Methodist Church, it fought with me, like a tiger, to the last ditch. I want to say right now, that if it wasn't for the Prohibition party—seven men I could name—I would never be Governor of Florida. The Democrats put me out of the party twice—once by passing a bill that no man could make his campaign on a denominational issue. So, the Prohibitionists put me on their ticket.

Such is the confession of Catts himself, made in a public meeting. The Prohibition party put him on their ticket, and the Methodist Church fought "like a tiger, to the last ditch," to drag intolerance into politics and to put into action a campaign of infamy unequaled in the annals of American history.

Governor Catts has been imported into the State of Michigan to vilify the Catholic Church and people. The Pope of Rome is keeping him awake at night. He screeches for another Garibaldi, while the Methodists applaud. Behind Catts and his program is a well-financed, carefully laid plan of attack, aimed directly at the Catholic Church and her institutions. Who is back of the movement and what forces are giving it impetus will be discussed in another article.

Catholic Organization in France

COMTESSE DE COURSON

THOSE who have occasion to follow the religious life of France, seen from within, will have noticed that the French Catholics are learning, more and more, the value of joint action and the usefulness of combined efforts. Individual action and influence have always existed among them, but they have now understood that to "fight the great fight" certain organization is necessary, and this conviction is in keeping with a movement that is general and world-wide, outside the sphere of religion. Socialists are everywhere strongly banded together; syndicates, created by the working classes for the defense of their material interests, exist in all countries; the Church, according to her custom, is ready to encourage all the social movements that are conducive to the welfare of her children, and in France she is mingling more and more actively with the social life of Catholics.

Several important organizations have brought her influence and her teaching to bear upon classes of people that hitherto depended on their individual action to keep them in touch with religion. By uniting their aspirations, hopes and efforts on a common standpoint they are stronger to resist human respect, they are soothed and supported by the human sympathy that is the outcome of a common faith in God.

The Union Catholique des chemins de fer, founded for railway servants some years before the war by a zealous priest, the Abbé Reyman, is flourishing in spite of adverse circumstances. The 50,000 men who glory in their name of Cheminots Catholiques are excellent public servants; indeed, it is impressed upon them when they become members of the Union that proficiency and devotedness in the discharge of their professional duties are an essential part of their duty to God.

To evangelize these harassed and overworked railway men is no easy matter, but they are now grouped together with a method that speaks volumes for the practical spirit of their directors, and their religious instruction is well looked after. Indeed, the Abbé Reyman rightly believes that faith must be built on strong foundations if it is to withstand the difficulties that must arise; his cheminots have not much time to study and to pray, but their meetings are so arranged that a brief and solid religious instruction is an essential part of the program. There are now many women employed in the French railways and the cheminotes are as satisfactory as the cheminots. They filled Notre Dame the other day and were warmly welcomed by Cardinal Amette. Before the war the banner of the Cheminots Catholiques, with their insignia, an engine at full speed, and their motto, Fidem Servavi, was well to the front at all ceremonies; it was conspicuous at the Congress of Lourdes in July, 1914, only a few days before the war broke out, a war that was to tax to the utmost the faith, self-sacrifice and patriotism of the cheminots, who, let us hasten to add, proved equal to the occasion and whose faithful service was of untold value to their country.

The cheminotes, as the feminine members of the Union are familiarly called, have lately put in a petition that proves how a desire to know and to understand what they believe dominates their religious attitude. They ask that lending libraries should be established near the big railway stations for their use and they add that books on religion would be welcome, as they realize the necessity of completing their religious instruction. This request confirms an observation that was made some years ago by those interested in social work: the religious revival in France, in all classes, is marked by a wish to learn, study and to be informed. Mere sentiment is no longer the fashion; the present generation has a practical spirit in religious as well as in mundane matters, and we all know that the faith built on solid foundations, well-informed and enlightened, is the strongest.

Another class of women workers has also founded a Union of practical Catholics among its members. The P. T. T., as they are generally called, are the young girls and women employed in the post office, the telegraph office and the telephone exchanges. They are many of them well-informed women who belong to the middle class that constitutes an important and influential portion of the French nation. In the ceremony that took place at Notre Dame on February 10, 1918, the P. T. T. were in force and the collection was taken up to form libraries and study-rooms for these earnest young workers. The Cardinal Archbishop of Paris, who is warmly interested in the cheminotes and in the P. T. T., was there to welcome both, and the great basilica, so closely connected in the past with the history of France, opened wide its doors to admit these women, who represent a new France, the France of the future. This idea that these women hold in their hands the future generations of Frenchmen was developed by an eloquent Dominican, Father Gillet, who, while speaking of "The French Woman of Tomorrow," drew a picture true to life of the French woman of today: earnest, practical, eager to learn and strong to act, better developed than the woman of the past because of the part she is called upon to play in the struggle for life.

Catholic unions, founded on a common faith, exist in other centers. Thus, in the big Paris shops, where hundreds of men and women are employed, the Catholics are banded together in order to help, support and encourage each other in a life where material cares easily crowd out the spiritual element. At Notre Dame these patriotic men and women had a Mass said for those of their comrades who have fallen in battle. The celebrant was an elderly priest, who was ordained at the age of fifty, and who during many years was accountant at the Bon Marché, one of those big emporiums well known to American tourists. Many of the higher employees of this and other large shops were there, besides hundreds of less important workers, and their excellent attitude impressed all present. Where the bond between the associates is their religious faith it brings sweetness and strength into their lives, together with a feeling of brotherhood that is a powerful incentive to well-doing.

The same bond unites the young workwomen, commonly called the midinettes, who are busy in the fashionable shops of the wealthy quarters of Paris. For these girls religious services have been organized, les Missions de midi, which take place at a quarter past twelve o'clock, when the girls troop out of the shops for lunch, and they naturally take place in churches situated close to the fashionable dressmakers or milliners. The services are brief, so as to leave the girls time for their mid-day meal, but the thirty minutes are well employed. A spirited cantique and a clear, concise and well-chosen exposition of some essential point of Catholic doctrine are followed by Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament. Then the services are over and the bright-faced midinettes who fill the church step out blithely into the sunshine. During these thirty minutes they have been taught, they have prayed and the Master's blessing has come into their lives. These lives are often spent in an atmosphere where religion has no place, but we hear marvelous tales of the good seed cast in these ignorant souls by the Missions de midi bringing forth ample fruit.

Religious ignorance is at the root of the irreligion of France; it has been carefully fostered by the so-called neutral schools and from the schools has reached the families of the working classes, where Catholic habits and tradition have gradually died out. Before the war the extent of this religious ignorance was only suspected; the war made it appear as an alarming fact. On February 20 an impressive report was read on the subject at the Journée diocésaine of the diocese of Paris. The reporter, the Abbé Verdier, pointed out the gradual growth of "religious ignorance" throughout the country; it has made deplorable progress since two generations ago, for Jules Ferry and Paul Bert un-Christianized the French elementary schools and officially banished even the name of God from the school books. The number of unbaptized soldiers at the front, the hopeless ignorance of many wounded men, whose mind is a blank as regards religion, the neglect of Catholic practices in families that are more ignorant than hostile, are some of the results of the campaign carried on by the successors of the men mentioned above. To this great evil the religious and social works just described bring an efficient remedy. It will take time to train a more enlightened and more religious France, but God's best and greatest works are slow to develop. Moreover, a new people must be created, taught and trained, but the ordeal of the war will have prepared this renovation. For are not sacrifices, bereavements and pain God's most eloquent messengers and missionaries?

When "Leonardo's Message" Did Not Fail

JOHN CONOLEY

IN the issue of the Literary Digest for April 20, 1918, there is a very interesting and significant article to be found under the caption, "When Leonardo's Message Failed." Professor Fred Newton Scott, of the University of Michigan, "in experimental mood, armed with some large photographs of Leonardo's (da Vinci's) 'Last Supper' and 'Mona Lisa,' . . . descended upon the public schools of a large city to find out, if he could, what impression young folk get from famous paintings." The professor began his experiment with the very youngest pupils, in order to get "unsophisticated judgment." He showed the picture of the "Last Supper," asking such questions as "What are these men doing?" "What are they saying?" "Why don't they eat supper?" The result of the experiment, characterized by the Literary Digest as "amusing reactions," is recorded in the Inlander (Ann Arbor) as follows:

"In answer to the question what the people in the picture were doing, one little girl said that it was a party, an opinion to which all the rest gave their assent." Not one single child had the slightest idea as to the significance of the picture, and the nearest to anything like recognition of the figures in the picture was the very vague remark, "They have long hair." This remark was made by an "eager mite of a girl," who spoke "solemnly," and Professor Scott thought her remark was "about up to the average of contemporary art criticism."

But the really tragic moment in this experience arrived when the question was put, "Who is the central figure?" We are told that "there was no hesitation or doubt in the minds of those who raised their hands, and while the rest nodded their heads in approval, one tiny child lisped in awe-struck accents, "George Washington." Rather paralyzing, is it not?

Now it is to be remembered that Professor Scott's investigation was not conducted with a view to exposing the religious ignorance of a given number of children in "the public schools of a large city." His purpose was a very innocent one, i. e., to indicate "that great paintings are not necessarily self-interpreting." There would seem to be little need for such a demonstration when one recalls the classic story of the young woman who, while making a hurried visit to St. Peter's, glimpsed the famous "Last Communion of St. Jerome," and called aloud to her mother lagging behind, "Oh, Ma, look! Here's the 'Dying Gladiator.'" Then, too, one has but to remember that the cubist masterpiece "Nude Descending a Staircase," may be rightfully assumed to be anything from "a streak of greased lightning" to the tail of a kite, in order to agree wholeheartedly with Professor Scott.

Undoubtedly, "the right interpretation of a picture" is "a matter of education," but one may justly find fault with the Professor's further conclusion, i. e., that the right interpretation of a picture is also a matter of "knowing the circumstances of its production, and the trend of ideas at the time when it was painted." However, the one important result of Professor Scott's experiment was the discovery of an appalling ignorance on the part of a number of children in "the public schools of a large city" with regard to the life and personality of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the New Testament personages so closely associated with Him. Any child, of any age, in any school, would instantly have recognized Charlie Chaplin, Douglas Fairbanks, or Mary Pickford. We may even assume that President Wilson would have been identified without hesitation. But where the figure of Our Lord and Saviour is presented to a given number of primary-grade public-school children, He is immediately confounded in their unenlightened minds with George Washington!

One will forthwith conclude that the cause of such overwhelming ignorance is the lack of education, and rightly so. But why this lack of education? Is this a Christian nation? Are we a Christian people? Certainly we have excellent reasons for believing that we are. The land is dotted with cathedrals and churches, hospitals and asylums, religious institutions of every denomination, all erected to the greater glory of God, and as so many evidences of our common faith in Jesus Christ, "Who for us men and for our salvation came down from heaven, and was incarnate of the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary, and was made man."

Moreover, we are, as a nation, inordinately proud of our public-school system. It is looked upon as the last word in efficiency, and one word said against it is sure to bring a howl of protest from every corner of the land. Even more, "The Little Red School House and the Bible" has been made the battle-cry of more than one political party, organized for the sole purpose of defeating the efforts of Catholics to secure "a place in the sun" for their parish schools.

Notwithstanding all this, we find that the children in "the public schools of a large city" are so totally unfamiliar with the life and personality of Jesus Christ that a picture representing Him and His Twelve Apostles seated at the table of the "Last Supper" is recognized as a "party," and Christ Himself confounded with George Washington! Where does the fault lie? Is it with the public-school curriculum or the local Sunday schools? These same children are probably being taught every conceivable primary "wrinkle." Undoubtedly they are all able to weave strips of red and white and blue and yellow and green paper into wondrous and useless articles, to cut out letters, and paint conventional designs of tulips, pansies, and forget-me-nots. They are taught to keep their teeth clean, to breathe through their noses, to walk straight, to dance folk-dances, to sing songs, and to play health-games. They know George Washington, Abraham Lincoln, and Woodrow Wilson "as the rings on their hands." But Jesus Christ is a total stranger. They know less than nothing of what took place "in the night in which He was betrayed," for to these children a representation of the "Last Supper" is "a party."

In the Sunday school, it is safe to say, these same children are taught that it is proper to put pennies in the mission-box; that Joseph's coat was of many colors; that bears devoured the naughty children who shouted "Go up, thou bald-head" at the venerable prophet. Nay, more, they may know that Catholic children are superstitious persons with whom one may not safely play. But of Him, whose life and bitter Passion constitute the reason of their presence in Sunday school, they can make no more intelligent remark than that he has "long hair."

One understands perfectly that there is no living man who can unerringly trace and interpret the mental processes of children. Nor will one be found who will unhesitatingly explain to us the peculiar mental "twist" that makes a given child seriously regard the portrait of a beautiful woman, and then say "See the pretty horsey!" Neither Froebel nor Montessori has reached the plane of infallibility in their diagnosis of the child-mind, and certainly the public schools of the country are not overmuch given to psychological research and the making of comparative studies of the results of their work. So the presence here and there in a given public school of a child who fails to recognize the da Vinci "Last Supper" as anything more solemn than a "party," and who confounds Jesus Christ with George Washington, may mean nothing more disastrous than that this particular school has its percentage of pupils who excel in the matter of religious ignorance, or are defective mentally and unable to differentiate between persons.

But in the Scott experiment we are brought face to face with entire classes of little children whose ignorance of the life and person of Jesus Christ, the central figure of the faith which their parents profess, could be no more dense if they lived in the wilds of Darkest Africa. The comparison is really unfair to Darkest Africa, for it is safe to say that the primary-grade children in the schools of the Trinitarians, at Benadir, or any of the African mission schools under the patronage of the St. Peter Claver Society, would have been able to grasp sufficiently well "the message of Leonardo," at least to identify the figure of Jesus Christ. It is impossible to find a more scandalous indictment of the present system of education, which points to the cosmopolitan nature of the public schools as justification for the exclusion of religious instruction from its curriculum.

One agrees, of course, with Professor Scott, when he says it would be "hazardous" to generalize, and surely it would be unfair to draw sweeping conclusions, or to make odious comparisons. Thus far our attention has been drawn to "the public schools of a large city," and to offset the depressing account of the ignorance encountered there, the following account is given:

"In experimental mood," armed with the Literary Digest of April 20, and its small reproduction of the da Vinci "Last Supper," I went direct from the reading of Professor Scott's article to the cathedral parish school. I was accompanied by another priest of the diocese, who went along to record the result of our experiment. We went at once to the primary grade and explained the purpose of our visit to the Sister-in-charge. We took seats in the hallway, and the children were sent out to us one by one, care being taken that the children examined were kept from communicating with those yet to be questioned. There were twenty-eight pupils in the room. Of these eleven were six years old, nine were eight years old, four were seven years old, three were nine years old, and one, a Protestant child, was ten years old.

The questions asked were: (1) What does this represent? (2) Who is this, pointing to central figure. (3) Who are these others? (4) What are they doing? (5) What is Our Lord doing? This last question was asked only when the identity of the figures had been established. The result, as compared with Professor Scott's very discouraging experience in "the public schools of a large city," was most consoling.

Not one child failed to recognize the picture as a representation of Our Lord and His Apostles. Each one pointed out the figure of Christ. Two of the twenty-eight said they were "eating," but gave no further explanation. Twenty-six said they were "eating the Last Supper." Twenty-one said "Our Lord is changing the bread and wine into His Body and Blood." One said "Our Lord is making the Blessed Sacrament." Another said "Our Lord is giving the Apostles Holy Communion." One boy, aged eight, attempted to quote from memory the words of institution, saying: "Jesus took bread and gave it to His disciples, and said: This is My Body. And then He took the chalice and said: This is My Blood." One little girl aged seven said it was "a picture of the Last Supper on Holy Thursday." Eight children failed to recognize the Apostles individually. Twenty pointed out St. John, and fifteen identified Judas. The important point is this: Not one child failed to grasp the religious significance of the picture. Only two failed to realize what was being done. Every child in the room was able to recognize the figure of Jesus Christ.

Now comes the question: Did these children grasp what the Literary Digest calls "Leonardo's Message"? There can be no doubt of it. Possibly Professor Scott would be disappointed at their failure to apprehend "the meaning of the attitudes and gestures . . . The animated movements of the hands, so characteristic of Italians and southern peoples generally." But these parish-school children were neither "mystified" nor "misled" by these characteristics. They recognized at once the import of the picture, its religious significance, and the central figure therein, while no small percentage of them were able to go into details as to what was being done.

It is quite possible that not one of these children has even so much as heard the name of Leonardo da Vinci mentioned. They have, perhaps, no more idea of "the circumstances of its (the picture's) production" and "the trend of ideas at the time when it was painted" than they have, as Professor Scott says, "why the Pythagoreans objected to beans." But they interpreted the picture rightly because they have been carefully and painstakingly instructed in the historical facts depicted by the artist, and have been brought to that fine point of acquaintance with the life and personality of Jesus Christ and His Apostles that will enable them to recognize Him, and them, whether they be portrayed by a Leonardo da Vinci on a stretch of canvas that is one of art's heirlooms, or in the horribly crude oleograph that sells "three for a quarter."

"The right interpretation" of this particular picture is indeed "a matter of education." Far be it from me to conclude that the system employed "in the public schools of a large city" is inefficient, or that public schools generally are primarily intended to retard the progress of religion by excluding instruction in it from the daily program. I have my own opinion, but that is another matter. I offer, however, for serious consideration, the total failure of the younger pupils of "the public schools of a large city" to grasp the significance of Leonardo da Vinci's "Last Supper" as opposed to the instant recognition of the personages portrayed and the general meaning of the picture by the primary-grade children of a given parish school where religious instruction forms part of the curriculum.

The Hills of Perugia

JOSEPH WICKHAM, M.A.

WHEN on some fortune-favored afternoon you will stand on the garden terrace of the old Papal citadel in Perugia and look down over the valley and the wide-circling Apennine hills, you will be living an hour which may be reckoned among the choicest your years will give you to enjoy. There is no picture in the world that can fill the imagination more nearly to satiety than the prospect here. Look at all those billowy little hills below you, with their wonderful silent cities. There is Assisi blossoming like a flower on Monte Subasio, like a flower of St. Francis, who has given her eternity; and there is Spello, an exquisite vision in brown and gray; Foligno is there, offering her face to you, a lovely mosaic that you would fain possess; Trevi smiles sweetly in the growing distance; farther away rise the towers and spires of Spoleto, with Monte Luca's dark forests behind; and a thousand feet beneath you sweeps the soft Umbrian plain, bejeweled all marvelously with the flashing waters of the Tiber. When you came from the south you saw all the way this Tiber valley, and you beheld the Umbrian fields stretching out before you, and if you came to Perugia by the direction of Orte, you saw every one of those delicately-tinted cities emerge singly from the wooded landscape, spreading out their gifts of palace and temple in a light of glory. You caught their names in hurried glancing as you flashed by the little stations. How like unto music were those names, how full of melody the thrilling Italian syllables, as you pronounced them, Spoleto, Foligno, Spello, Assisi. And now you behold those cities again, the whole necklace of beauty, in the linked sweetness that is Umbria. It is worth the coming, even from the capital of the world.

If you read the history of Perugia you will read a tale of old-time strife and warfare. The visitor today does not wish to remember her wholly as the city of battles that she was; but rather as the great patron of Umbrian art, the possessor of Perugino and Pinturicchio. So he will very early in his stay wish to go to the Collegio del Cambio and the Palazzo del Municipio.

In the hall of the Collegio del Cambio, the old Exchange of the city, are to be seen the noted frescoes of Perugino, the great "space-composer." These he executed in the years 1499 and 1500 at the invitation of the Priori to decorate the Cambio. The virtues of faith, hope, and charity are on one wall; on another are the cardinal virtues of wisdom, justice, fortitude and temperance; and among them may be seen the portrait of Perugino by himself. In this decoration of the Udienza del Cambio one finds the poetic quiet, the gentleness of appeal, the delicate beauty, the religious idealism and the dreaming spirit that characterize all the finer work of Perugino.

Close by the Collegio del Cambio stands the Palazzo del Municipio, the building in which Perugia's art gallery is housed. It is a most magnificent Gothic structure of the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries. At the entrance which faces the Corso are figures of the three patron Saints of the city. Over the portal looking toward the Duomo are the bronze Guelphic lion and Perugian griffin, and chains, in commemoration of the defeat of the Siennese in 1358. On the third floor within is the Pinacoteca Vanucci, where one may study the entire school of Umbrian painters. Among the most notable works here are the frescoes of Benedetto Bonfigli, the "Nativity" of Fiorenzo de' Lorenzo, the "Madonna" of Perugino, and the "Annunciation," among other pictures of Pinturicchio. It was the two last-named painters who gave a high standing to the Umbrian school. They painted in various cities of Italy, giving some of their best art to the Sistine Chapel at the Vatican. And every visitor to the Pinacoteca will remember that it was Perugino who guided the youthful ardors of the great Raphael.

There are many fine old churches in Perugia which have many claims on one's interest, for their art and their association with the chronicle of other days. You may read much history, too, in looking upon the Torre degli Scirri, the sole survivor of the family towers of the thirteenth century. And no one who is interested in days that are very dim and distant will miss taking the journey for three miles outside the Porta San Costanzo to view the famous Etruscan tombs of the Volumnii.

In your walks about the streets of Perugia it is her strength and her sternness that reveal themselves rather than any wonderful beauty. She is set high on a hill, secure against the world, and for her beauty she is content to think of the master works of Perugino and Pinturicchio, whom she nourished, and of Raphael, in the growth of whose glory she wishes not to be forgotten; for her beauty she is satisfied in the wondrous painting of the valley of Spoleto which stretches out before her, unfading and indestructible in the eternal plain of Umbria. Above this fairest art of the vale-world she sits in watching, all the live-long day; above it all she dreams in a magic of music beneath the stars, Perugia, the princess of the hills.

Irish-Irish and Scotch-Irish

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We are continually being reminded of the greatness of the Scotch-Irish. Their thrift, energy, enterprise has often been commented on in the secular press and other agencies; and it seems to be taken for granted that in the possession of those qualities which make for progress, and industrial and commercial supremacy the Protestant or Scotch-Irish is superior to the Catholic or Irish-Irish.

Three hundred years ago the Catholics were driven off the lands of a large portion of the province of Ulster, and a colony of Scotch Protestants settled in their stead. These formed the foundation of what has since been called the Scotch-Irish. It was intended they should supplant the old Irish and extirpate their religion. Fifty years later the Cromwellian settlement increased their numbers, and small groups of Scotch were brought over by the landlords from time to time. This continued down to the fall of landlordism, about thirty years ago.

Following the first plantation barbarous penal laws were put into force against the Catholics. They were denied education, their religion was proscribed, landlords harried and rackrented them. The largest and most economic holdings in the most fertile parts of the province were reserved for Protestants, whilst Catholics were obliged to content themselves with small patches of infertile land on the slopes of the hills. Mr. Gladstone's great Land bill of 1881 and subsequent acts of the British Parliament put Catholic and Protestant on a basis of equality so far as land is concerned. Of course the advantage still remains with the Protestants, as they have the most profitable farms, handed down to them from their fathers. Have the Protestant farmers held their own under equality? They have not.

Since the passing of the land laws, above referred to, Protestants have lost hundreds of farms all over Ulster. This loss has taken place in every one of the counties and is still continuing. The Catholics are steadily winning back the lands from which their fathers were dispossessed in the past. Another generation of progress like the last and Protestant ascendancy will be confined to a very small area. The pursuit of agriculture is the greatest occupation on the face of the earth. The race that controls the fields will in time control the towns and cities, as it is the vigorous blood from the country that, drifting in, reinvigorates their exhausted manhood.

Irish Catholics have not yet taken a prominent part in manufacture and commerce, but their day is coming. Most of the great mills of Ulster are in Protestant hands. Catholics are discriminated against, very few of them get jobs as bosses, and not many are allowed to become tradesmen. They are kept at jobs where work is hard, pay bad, and nothing is learned. Notwithstanding these disadvantages the Catholic is holding his ground well.

The successful defense of Derry City by the Scotch-Irish in 1689 was a great factor in making the reformation permanent in the British Isles. The ceremony of closing the gates against the invader is still observed on the proper date each year; but when they are now closed it is on a city with a Catholic majority. Armagh City, formerly a Protestant stronghold, is now ruled by Catholics. In Belfast, that great stronghold of ascendancy, Catholics are now one-fourth the population, and they are increasing.

Regarding education, the intermediate examinations, conducted yearly by government inspectors, give a very good test of the intellectual capacities of the two races. Thanks to the convents and the Christian Brothers' schools, the Catholics capture exhibitions and scholarships far out of proportion to their numbers. The supremacy of the Catholic students is unquestioned. Admirers of the Protestant Irishman have maintained that he drinks less, spends less, and works harder than his Catholic, fellow-countryman. If that is so and the Catholic is gradually supplanting him, despite many other impediments, what conclusion is to be drawn?

No one denies the greatness of the Scotch-Irishman, but in these days when myths and fictions of all kinds are subjected to critical investigation, it is not inappropriate to ask the question, which is the superman, the Irish-Irishman or the Scotch-Irishman. From time to time the Irish-Irishman has had strong doses of civilization driven into him with bayonets, which impaired his material progress. If the same thing should happen again it might further retard him, otherwise he seems destined to come into his own in the Province of Ulster in a short time.

Religious Bigotry Rampant

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The pro-German spirit which surrounds us calls for most stringent measures for its suppression, but the underground methods of the anti-Catholic and unchristian crusade of slander, in the country's present trying ordeal, is permitted to run unchecked. Many proofs of this unchristian spirit are cropping up constantly; one of the latest took place a few days since.

An illustrated lecture was given the pupils of the public schools and their parents, in one of the schoolrooms. The lecturer evidently had repeated his theme so often through this State that it was stereotyped in his mind and utterance. It was of the type of a schoolboy holding forth on "The Boy Stood on the Burning Deck." His subject was Belgium. More than 100 pictures were thrown on the screen. Amongst them were more than twenty portraits of those in some measure identified, more or less, with Belgian events. Charles V was presented, and of course the Duke of Alva. The latter individual received all that he deserved, and much more. The highest of high praise was reserved for Mr. Gladstone, and the former Premier, Mr. Asquith.

The lecturer enlarged eloquently on the rapidly declining dominance "of the 'clericals,'" and their "dwindling majority" in both houses of the Belgium parliament. They were being supplanted by the "liberals" and the "Socialists." He dwelt on the bitterness of "clericals" and "Roman Catholics" to the secular schools in Belgium.

When done, he waited for the customary congratulations, with a swelling chest and florid countenance. Amongst the train of hand-shakers the present writer took a place, and the follow dialogue followed:

"I listened to your lecture with close attention." "Thank you." "Your address and the portraits reminded me of an exhibition of the play of Hamlet, with Hamlet left out." "How so, what do you mean"? "The omission of the portrait of the most distinguished and noble defender of his country, whose moral force against the ruthless invader of Belgium has won more friends for him in the world than even the valiant defense of her soil, by her sons. You withheld it." "Who (sic) do you mean"? "I mean the illustrious Cardinal Mercier!" "Oh, I couldn't give his, I hadn't his picture." "The magazines of both hemispheres have given his portrait repeatedly since the war began. You withheld it through religious bigotry."

It was a sight to see this man, after this quiet castigation. Depend upon it that whenever or wherever he repeats this lecture, Cardinal Mercier's picture will be seen.

When the international exposition was in progress out here, not long since, a former candidate for United States President spoke on "The Proper Observance of the Lord's Day" to a vast audience who, with one excepution, were Protestants of various divergent sects. He went out of his way to denounce "Bloody Mary," as he styled her, for expelling Puritans from England. Like the foregoing case, there happened to be one Catholic present. From him the speaker received a letter, correcting his falsification of facts of history, with dates, showing that it was Queen Elizabeth who by her "act of uniformity," persecuted this sect, and that later they were expelled by the ranting fanatic and pedant James I. It was pleasant to read the wriggling reply received from this prominent man. It is preserved. The writer felt doubly indignant, for he voted for this man for President.

For the complete silencing of such caluminators, certain essentials are demanded: (1) A willingness to undergo some little trouble to refute calumnies, knowledge of facts, and moral courage to support them. (2) Attendance by Catholics at such meetings, where it is of importance that they should be present, and calm exposure of barefaced falsehoods. Catholic societies could do this work.

American Creeds

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am submitting a correspondence which may be of interest to your readers. In a contest, in which a prize of $1,000 was offered for the best American creed, the following was published in the Baltimore American in its issue of April 4 as the winner:

THE AMERICAN'S CREED

I believe in the United States of America as a government of the people, by the people, for the people; whose just powers are derived from the consent of the governed; a democracy in a republic; a sovereign nation of many sovereign states; a perfect union, one and inseparable; established upon those principles of freedom, equality, justice and humanity for which American patriots sacrificed their lives and fortunes.

I therefore believe it is my duty to my country to love it; to support its Constitution; to obey its laws; to respect its flag; and to defend it against all enemies.

Struck by the inadequacy of this formula to portray correctly a compendium of American ideals, I wrote to the editor of the American a letter, of which the following is a copy:

To the Editor of the "Baltimore American":

SIR: The decision that has found a so-called American's creed presents to me a spectacle calling for sad reflection.

Certainly any creed to be accepted by real Americans should begin: I believe and trust in God Almighty.

This country was discovered by Christians; settled by Christians; developed by Christians; and won its independence through the efforts of Christians. Faith in God and dependence on Him characterized nearly all early State papers. In those days it was not fashionable to ignore God, even though Tom Paine and others like him were in the limelight. It is not so many years ago a storm arose in Congress when a new coin came from the mint without the words, "In God we trust," appearing on it.

It has remained for these days when the Allies are turning to God as never before, for a body of supposedly representative Americans to award the palm defining the beliefs and duties (duties mind you) of Americans, to a creed that recognizes no belief in God or duty to Him. "Thou shouldst not have any power against Me unless it were given thee from above," said Christ to Pilate.

Let Americans not forget that all power is from above. There are millions of Americans who cannot accept such a creed as given.

I believe in God and in the United States.

AMERICAN.

Baltimore, April 4, 1918.

This letter the editor did not see fit to publish. He did, however, print in the issue of April 7, the formula which I had submitted as supplying the essential lack in the formula to which the prize had been awarded:

ANOTHER AMERICAN CREED

I believe in Almighty God and trust in Him.

I believe in the United States of America because they are a real republic, governed by a democratic people for themselves; a national sovereignty, composed of state sovereignties—one perfect union, established by the people under God's eternal principles of right and justice.

I believe in equality religious and equality political, in true liberty and in the pursuit of happiness. I do not believe in license.

Since love of God requires love of country, I believe in patriotism, even to the sacrifice of life and fortune, having before my eyes the noble example of those who established this government.

I believe in its Constitution and honor its glorious flag. I will obey its laws and will defend my country against all enemies, foreign or domestic.

AMERICAN.

Does the American creed to which the board of judges gave the prize represent merely local views, or does its elimination of God indicate a growing national departure from old ideals and beliefs?

A Drive for "America"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Some one once said that if a person has any thing to say, and says it often enough, he will eventually find hearers. The reference is to AMERICA's long and patient campaign for wider diffusion of Catholic periodicals and better organization among Catholics. The admirable essay of Mr. Muttkowski in a recent issue, entitled "Leadership Publicity" is the latest utterance on the subject. According to this writer the ideal Catholic periodical has not yet appeared, although he confesses that AMERICA approximates it most nearly. Let it be noted in passing, that there is some authority for the statement that AMERICA is the best Catholic weekly we have.

It is doubtless true that all our Catholic magazines and papers are read and supported by but a small fraction of our people. This being so, is it not largely a waste of time, space and effort to endeavor to produce something better, when what we have is not appreciated? Is there any hope that under present conditions a publication of a different character would fare better? Is it not apparent that the real crying need of the hour is not for new magazines or better magazines, but more readers and more subscribers for what we have? When we shall have educated our people to the point of reading and appreciating AMERICA, a splendid weekly (to read it is to appreciate it) then, perhaps, it will be profitable to discuss the need of Catholic dailies.

Is there not too much truth in the charge of selfishness attributed to us in the quotation from the convert in Mr. Muttkowski's article? During the past two years, or since I have been a subscriber, I have read every issue of AMERICA almost from cover to cover. What a mental and spiritual tonic it has been! How much that has been a joy to mind and heart, and even the ear, has appeared in its columns! And because of apathy and selfishness I have been satisfied to read and enjoy, when I should have labored to pass the good things around.

Readers of AMERICA, awaken! If this paper, of which we are all justly proud, is not read by hundreds of thousands instead of by hundreds and thousands the blame lies with us. It is ably edited. It covers every desired field. It deserves to succeed. Let the task be ours to make it succeed beyond even the wildest dreams of its founders. We have had drives for about every thing. Is it not high time we made a drive for AMERICA and all that it represents? We can double, perhaps treble its number of subscribers within sixty days, if every one will help a little. Let our aim be to place it in every Catholic home in the United States. Let us make AMERICA not the greatest Catholic weekly in the United States, but the greatest weekly in the world. I am sure the Editor will be pleased to contribute as much space as will be required to make the drive the success it deserves to be.

Pentecost

PENTECOST, which, in its literal signification, commemorates the fiftieth day after the Resurrection of Christ, is one of the four great feasts of the ecclesiastical year. It records the final completion of Christ's mission on earth, the fulfilment of His promise to send the Paraclete, the Comforter, the Spirit of Truth, the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity, to take up His abode in the Church and the Faithful, to set the seal on the deposit of faith, to change the followers of the Saviour from timid men into dauntless Apostles, to instruct them in the hidden meaning of Divine Revelation, and to send them forth on their world-wide work of preaching Christianity to every creature.

The coming of the Holy Spirit was not a mere passing visitation, attended by marvelous signs and wonderful outpourings of Divine grace, but destined to be only temporary. Christ said: "I will ask the Father and He will give you another Paraclete, that He may abide with you for ever, the Spirit of Truth." He has kept his word. The tongues of fire, which manifested the first Pentecostal advent of the Spirit of Truth, are no longer visible, but the presence which they attested has not failed.

The Holy Ghost is still the soul of the Church. His guidance is felt today, as at every stage of her portentous history, and will continue to be felt to the end of time, when the number of the elect shall have been completed. The gates of hell, thanks to His abiding indwelling, shall no more prevail in the future than they have in the past, and through many vicissitudes, amid shoals of error and the assaults of foes, serenely, securely, untainted and unafraid, the Spouse of Christ shall take her course, until the Angel sets his feet on the sky and the sea and summons to judgment both the dead and the living amid the crashing of the universe and the turmoil of the elements.

Not less beneficent is the action of the Holy Spirit in the souls of the just, searching the heart, consuming the dross, brightening man's ways, washing away his sins, healing the sick, curbing the proud, dispelling sadness and gloom. The Holy Ghost, thanks to the loving-kindness of Christ, still fills the hearts of the Faithful and enkindles in them the fire of Divine love.

Another Drive on the Pope

ONE of the distressing by-products of the war has been a violent outbreak of anti-clerical, sectarian and Protestant hatred against the Pope. Wild talk has been revived concerning the temporal power, although the last vestige of it has been in its grave these many decades. Deep-seated antipathy has taken alarm at the prestige of the Vatican and has protested in surprised indignation at the immense spiritual authority evidenced by the lonely prisoner in Rome, whom it thought long since discredited. But this is not all. A campaign of calumny has been set afoot, it would almost seem systematically organized, and bigotry and hatred have had an ugly recrudescence. All of which, apart from the indignation it has caused millions of Catholics, is seriously hurting the common cause. It is incredibly shortsighted, to say the least, now that some measure of success is assured by long-hoped-for unity of military command, to raise the cry of "No Popery!" and to try to effect a breach in the unity of citizens.

What lies behind the wide publicity given to false statements and wholly unfounded rumors concerning the acts and plans, past, present and future, of the Pope, which are being recklessly disseminated in Italy, France, Great Britain and the United States, without a shred of evidence and with no respect for the truth? How comes it that a word derogatory to the Jews is sufficient to put a man in prison, whereas the Pope is considered legitimate prey for any chance reviler who may care to take a fling at him, no matter how poisoned it may be with falsehood? How is it possible that the very papers which pride themselves on the loftiness of their principles, as contrasted with Germany's, throw ethics to the winds when there is question of the Pope?

It is inconceivable that any well-informed, fair-minded man should write these words, recently printed in the Wall Street Journal:

> Already the failure of the German drive in the west in securing any of its objectives has revived peace activities from a new angle, or rather from one which had been discarded. The Cologne Gazette, which correctly forecast the Pope's first effort to secure a German peace, predicts another attempt of the kind about the middle of this month If this is correct nothing but failure can result. The attitude of the Vatican as disclosed in Ireland, Belgium, Austria, Germany and in Italy itself puts such mediation out of the question.

What is the purpose of these contemptible insinuations? The writer speaks of "the Pope's first effort to secure a German peace." By the same token he implies, unless he is hopelessly illogical, that President Wilson, in his address to Congress on January 8, 1918, advocated a German peace. For even in so anti-clerical an assembly as the Italian Chamber the substantial identity between the principles outlined by the Pope and those insisted on by the President was openly proclaimed. No chicanery can call the Pope's peace proposals a German peace without stigmatizing the President's fourteen articles in like terms.

The truth is, of course, that neither one nor the other was in any sense pro-German. By what stretch of imagination can the Pope's proposals be called a German peace, seeing they would exact from Austria-Hungary the renunciation of the occupied territories of Serbia, Montenegro, Rumania, Russia and Italy; from Germany the abandonment of the conquests in Belgium, France and Russia; from the former, concessions in the matter of the Italian-speaking provinces along the Adriatic, and from the latter a just settlement of the vexed question of Alsace-Lorraine? The truth is, as has been repeatedly asserted by the Vatican, and stated without contradiction in England and Italy, that the Pope's note, if it seems to favor one side more than the other, looks to the interests of the Entente rather than those of the Central Powers. The veiled accusation about the Pope's attitude towards Belgium is equally at variance with the facts. The King of Belgium, the Belgian Government and Cardinal Mercier have all officially expressed to the Vatican their intense gratitude for the Pope's attitude towards Belgium. If these three unimpeachable and competent witnesses are satisfied, what show of justice has the complaint of the Wall Street Journal?

Furthermore, only crass, inexcusable ignorance or deliberate suppression of facts can explain the echo of the false reports to the effect that the resistance to conscription in Ireland is the result of Papal pressure. Before the Wall Street Journal made its calumnious insinuation there had appeared in the New York Times, and every well-informed person was aware of it, this deliberate denial from Cardinal Logue:

> I don't suppose you yourself need telling, but if you think anybody else needs telling, then tell him from me that it is nonsense. The Irish Bishops have received no instructions and no suggestions from the Vatican, about their attitude toward conscription. If they had, it is surely myself who would know, and I do not know anything of the kind. But everybody knows that the Catholic Church has sons on both sides in this horrible war, and everybody ought to know that so far as the Vatican is concerned, it has been neutral throughout. The Vatican could have been no other.

Why did the Wall Street Journal ignore this statement?

The Italian calumny, which the same editorial repeats, was challenged by the Cardinal Archbishop of Westminster as soon as it appeared in the London Morning Post, and its author, so far from substantiating it, failed to produce proof and was compelled to lapse into inglorious silence. Cardinal Gasparri at once contradicted it and characterized it as "an atrocious calumny"; his statement has not been disproved. The Italian Government, which was most concerned, so far from asserting the odious charge, went out of its way to pay a high compliment to the loyalty of the Italian clergy and Hierarchy.

The writer, therefore, in the Wall Street Journal is confronted by an awkward dilemma. Either he was not acquainted with the facts, in which case his ignorance is inexcusable; or he was acquainted with them, but deliberately suppressed them, in which case his conduct is beneath contempt.

The Third Liberty Loan

FOR the third time since entering the great war the American people have given evidence of patriotism and generosity. The Third Liberty Loan has been a marked success. It has been oversubscribed to the amount of more than a billion, perhaps a billion and a half, dollars. It is semi-officially stated that 17,000,000 of our citizens bought bonds, 12,500,000 more than the number of those who subscribed to the First Liberty Loan, 7,000,000 more than the number of those who took the second loan.

Had a stranger unacquainted with the history of the times come to New York and witnessed the busy and stirring scenes in the metropolis he would no doubt have thought that the city was in the midst of a heated electoral campaign, or a great international celebration. At every point of vantage thousands were gathered listening to patriotic speeches delivered by men, women, children even, by civilians and soldiers, professional and laboring men. And the burden of every speech was the war; the conclusion, the inevitable and moving watchword: "Buy a bond and help the Government win the war." To stir up the enthusiasm of the people the "Blue Devils" of France, the "Anzacs" from far away Australia and New Zealand, and a picked group of Pershing's men who had fought for liberty and justice at the Marne or Gallipoli, or in the sector where American boys are doing their bit, locked steps, and with fluttering flags and flashing bayonets brought home to every one the fact that a great crisis was making its demand upon the faith and the generosity of a great people. Thousands thought of their husbands, fathers, brothers and friends in the trenches already facing the enemy or preparing to sail for the front, where so many of our brave soldiers have died in the great cause.

In all our cities similar scenes of loyalty and enthusiasm took place. Americans gave gladly, freely, the rich of his millions, the widow her mite, the offering of the heart, for the country's need. For the stored-up wealth of the captain of industry and the humble savings of the poor all help to rivet bolts into our transports and battleships and to put into the hands of our soldiers the weapons of victory.

There can be no doubt that the heart of the American people is in the war. The West is now awake. It has at last realized the tremendous task that lies before it. America will not flinch at the sacrifices it must make if that task is to be fully and perfectly done. The country is ready. Stern as the sacrifice must be, it has its splendid compensations. In the presence of all the pangs and sorrows that it must entail, the United States learns that such a sacrifice brings its blessings. Americans will know each other better. A great cause has lifted them all to the same common level. A splendid solidarity of thought and sentiment has arisen out of a common peril. All now have one common faith in the justice of their cause. All alike, rich and poor, are laborers for the same purpose—a speedy victory of our arms leading to a just and honorable peace. The Third Liberty Loan has not only been of great military and economic value: socially and morally it has been a great educator. Occasioned by the war, like the war it has taught a well-needed lesson. It has been the cause of the people's inner concord and mutual harmony, the inspirer of sacrifice, of self-discipline and unselfishness. A great call came to the heart of the American people and has found that heart true and sound.

The Unbelieving Novelist's "Sectarianism"

THOSE who have read with care certain book reviews in the secular press must have remarked how different the treatment of novels defending Christianity often is from that shown those attacking it. For instance, if a well-written work of fiction which is also a clever piece of Catholic apologetics, happens to be assigned to the reviewer, likely as not he will praise the book's "dramatic climax," have a good word for its "keen psychological analysis," and even commend its "sparkling dialogue," but he is almost sure to end his review with an expression of regret that the author has quite spoiled his novel by "dragging in an exposition of his own religious opinions," or else with a protest made in the sacred name of "artistry" against gifted authors who perversely use works of fiction as "vehicles of sectarian propaganda." Thereupon the average reader will perhaps sadly nod his head in full agreement with the judicious reviewer and then turn for relief to the notice of a new book by a maker of best-sellers, who has abandoned the field of high romance and taken to writing "problem novels" instead. His new volume, let us say, is nothing more nor less than an ill-disguised attack on revealed religion and an attempt to show the absurdity of tenets held sacred by fifty generations of Christian people. But it is worthy of note that the reviewer of this book, far from finding the author guilty of spoiling a good novel by "dragging in an exposition of his own religious opinions" and thus committing an unpardonable sin against "artistry," actually praises him to the skies for "delineating in the book's leading character an admirable type of the modern mind that ruthlessly subjects to the acid test of criticism the most venerable doctrines of Christianity," and concludes his review, perhaps, with the fervent hope that "every candid seeker after truth" will not fail to read Mr. Skeptic's remarkable book.

It would seem, therefore, according to the discerning reviewer, that no one but the unmistakably Christian novelist, by obtruding his religion on his defenseless readers, outrages the canons of correct taste and literary artistry. But when such "a consummate fictionist" as the author of "The Soul of a Bishop" makes his absurd "theology" the very bone and marrow of the book, when a "graceful stylist" like the author of "The Brook Kerith" fills the volume with disgusting blasphemies, or when such a "fearless investigator" as the author who sorrowfully exposes "The Inside of the Cup" to the public deliberately makes his novel a pernicious anti-Christian tract, our "fair-minded" reviewer, strange to say, does not find "the sacred canons of literary craftsmanship" violated in the slightest degree, and observes that "the artistry of fiction" sustains no injury whatever, owing to the remarkable skill with which the authors weave into the story their clever solution of today's religious problems. So it is quite clear that the weary writer of reviews for literary supplements is firmly convinced that those who are most given to grievous offenses against art and good taste by "dragging religion" into their novels or by showing a "violent sectarian bias" in the composition of their stories are fictionists who profess Christianity, whereas those who bitterly attack in their novels revealed religion are generally free from all "taint of sectarianism" and are "consummate literary artists" besides. But cannot atheism be quite as "sectarian" as faith?

The Military Salute

ALMOST everybody seems to be using the military salute just now. As the baker's boy delivers a package of war-bread his hand goes briskly to his forehead; little Polly while trundling her doll-carriage pauses long enough to stand at attention and gravely salute; the profiteer salves his conscience by pompously returning his clerk's military greeting, and saying: "Excellent! Of course, we are all soldiers now." Even priests acknowledge the respectful martial salute of the Faithful with a similar gesture. But few of those who use, whether lightly or seriously, the military salute are probably aware of its ancient origin or have ever considered the beauty of its symbolism. The military salute actually comes down to us from the Catholic Middle Ages. As a writer in the current St. Nicholas reminds her youthful readers:

> It was ever the custom of brave and gallant knights, upon meeting, to raise their visors and look each other squarely and fearlessly in the eye. On the road or in the arena before the tilting match, clicking up the visor was an indispensable courtesy. We no longer wear visors covering our faces, but we raise our hands to the visors of our caps and look squarely and fearlessly at the person saluted. The salute is a sign manual of a proud fellowship in arms, and not the subservient acknowledgment of a superior officer.

It would well become those now using this striking gesture to recall when they do so the bright virtues of courage, loyalty and courtesy that were so characteristic of the Catholic knights who originated the salute. The disintegration of the Russian army, it is worthy of note, followed the abolition of that "relic of autocracy," the military salute. The soldiers then proceeded to elect their own officers, subsequently refused to obey them, and ended by murdering them. With the passing of the salute went the Russian's last vestige of loyalty, courage and courtesy. So if American civilians who use the soldier's gesture will keep in mind and aim to practise always the fair virtues that it symbolized of old, the wide vogue which the military salute is now having will no doubt wonderfully increase our country's morale, and thus hasten the victory of our arms.

Democratic Prosperity

THE untold millions of dollars subscribed to the war on both sides of the tremendous conflict and in almost every country give rise to some pertinent reflections. What would our rich financiers have said if even a small portion of this wealth had been asked of them for the improvement of the condition of labor? We have reference to the poorer element among the labor forces, the unskilled workers who to a large extent have hitherto been miserably underpaid. The capitalistic world would have stood aghast. It would have foreseen nothing less than economic ruin. "Heaven and earth would have been moved," says the Archbishop of Melbourne, "and all the devices of Parliament exhausted before an hundredth part of that expenditure would have gone to improve the lot of the poor man who labors for a living."

Surely the constructive work of democracy is no less necessary than its defensive warfare. The foundation stone of the entire building of democratic prosperity is the living wage. Not the multi-million dollars, but the multi-million lives are of first importance.

Almost all our social evils, so far as they flow from economic causes, are traceable to the denial of a living wage. If women and children are driven into factories it is because the husband does not receive a wage adequate to support a family in Christian decency. If marriages are delayed and vice flourishes instead, it is in great part because men consider themselves unable to support a wife and children. If criminality among the young increases and the infant mortality-rate mounts into ghastly figures, we may well know that no small reason for both of these evils is the absence of the mother from the home. If insurance of every kind is demanded of the State, it is again because a large proportion of the population have not had enough to lay by a modest capital against the day of sickness, unemployment and accident or the advance of old age. Yet under normal conditions the laborer's wage should be sufficient to answer practically all these needs. Insurance would still be required, and might wisely be made compulsory in certain instances, but it could be paid by the workingman himself out of a remuneration adequate for this purpose. He would thus retain his self-respect and not be made a ward of the State in the time of disability. Only when the laborer's just wage has been fully paid may there be any question of profits on the part of the employer.

We understand that the workingman is not without his defects and often serious faults. These greatly aggravate the situation and increase the difficulty of any final solution of the problem. Even the best social system is doomed to meet with failure when unsupported by religious principles and a sense of duty that springs from faith. Religion alone can secure the virtues necessary that a democracy may prosper in the thrift, moderation and contentment of its citizens. Religion alone can assure honest labor in return for honest pay. But while religion is the first and greatest social need, the second in importance, and flowing directly from it, is economic justice.

Literature

AUBREY DE VERE

ONE of the least-read and yet most interesting of the poets of the nineteenth century is Aubrey De Vere; interesting, because of many points of contact, of analogy and contrast, with modern life and today's problems; little read, for the same reason perhaps as is Wordsworth, because his poetry is reflective rather than imagist, of "God's world of spirit" rather than of sense. Writing as he did in Ireland, in stirring times politically and religiously, his field is peculiarly his own,—Ireland, the Middle Ages, the Faith are his themes. He is a poet with a definite ideal, and in all he wrote he steadfastly kept it before him.

Aubrey De Vere was born at Curragh Chase, in County Limerick, on January 10, 1814, of an Anglo-Norman family descended from a sixteenth-century Earl of Oxford, and settled for some generations in Ireland. His father, Sir Aubrey De Vere, was himself a poet and a fervent Anglican, and young Aubrey grew up in an atmosphere at once literary and deeply religious. He tells us himself that his own romance consisted in the personal religious history that culminated in his joining the Catholic Church. His evolution began with a passionate veneration for Wordsworth and Coleridge, in those early days the prophets of the spiritual reaction against Benthamism, radicalism, empiricism, "progress," and physical science. From the former poet he learned reverence and simplicity, and from the latter the necessity for a united Church and a hatred of sectarianism. At twenty-four he had already thrown himself with generous eagerness into "that religious revival which at the time was the inspiring passion of great men in England, France and Germany." He seems to have turned over in his deeply studious mind all phases of the question, but it was not until he came into actual contact with Newman and his school that he found already full-grown the attitude that he had been slowly maturing in himself. He had a singular gift for separating and fastening upon the purely spiritual elements in many divers systems, and Burke, Kant, Coleridge, F. D. Maurice, Carlyle, and finally Newman, all supplied him with factors that he assimilated in order to build up slowly the reasonable foundation that his faith finally rested on. His search was embodied in two ideals, a moral system that would safeguard the sanctity of the individual's will, and a body of dogma, authoritatively taught to the reason of man.

Another element in his growth was his sympathetic study of the Middle Ages, which he accepted as his artistic and religious ideal, and which in the end he came to see still living in the Catholic Church. For him, "the principle of ecclesiastical authority," then paramount, but lost, as he saw, at the Reformation, was "the only principle consistent with a sound religious philosophy, and a belief in a permanent Christianity." We have here the keynote of his mentality. Sectarianism, time's revenge for private judgment, he rejected as early as 1841, as it seemed to him in the highest degree unphilosophical. It was this same appeal of the authority and sacredness of tradition that lay at the root of Newman's philosophy, and from the day that De Vere really joined the Oxford movement, it was only a question of time and study and prayer until he should join the Church. At last, in the Archbishop's chapel at Avignon, while on a journey to Rome with Manning, he was received into the Church, November 15, 1851, at the age of thirty-seven.

De Vere still had a long life of fifty-one more years to live. In 1846 he had shown an unexpected quality of strength in his heroic exertions during the Irish Famine, and two years later published a book which caused a stir: "English Misrule and Irish Misdeeds," with its distinction between "good and bad Englishmen," and its vigorous proposals for Irish agriculture and systematic emigration. Conversion had meant temporary estrangement from many old friends and he settled down to a useful life of work for Ireland and the Faith. Always amiable and approachable, however, he gradually by sheer force of character won back all his friends, and in London moved freely in all the literary circles of the age. "A tall slender figure, unbent by age, he brought an atmosphere of genial light and gladness with him," are the words of an admirer. He impressed everybody with his habitual youthfulness, and indeed he himself said in middle age that he felt like eighteen. This fact, and his air of the fastidious aristocrat blended with serene simplicity of mind,—"an ecclesiastical air," Mr. Gosse tells us, "like that of some highly cultivated imaginative old abbé," made him a personage wherever he went.

His whole life was one of peaceful seclusion, wrapped up in two main passions, love for his country and an intense religious insight into the faith and art of the Middle Ages. His writings naturally fall into two periods; in early life, one of advance with the rising tide of religious revival, and after his conversion, a fight against the advancing wave of rationalism. A devoted follower of Wordsworth, he never wrote for mere form or sensation; to him the thought was uppermost. His very titles seem to give a clue to this: "Irish Legends," "Legends and Records," "Medieval Records." Yet the constructive imagination shown in such poems as "Joan of Arc" and "The Death of Copernicus" establishes him as a true poet. He ever felt that what he wrote was "in fact but a letter to some few friends, known or unknown." And hence, he wrote to Charles Eliot Norton, "I am of the unpopular side, in England, because I am a Catholic, and in Ireland, because I am opposed to revolutionary schemes."

Just after his conversion, Pius IX told him to write on Our Lady, and the result was "May Carols," in which he strove to show how completely "Christian symbolism rests upon the opposite idea from that of Pagan pantheism, viz., on that of the Incarnation." This view of Christian symbolism as "the only other key for the interpretation of nature," completely engrossed him. Almost his only loves among the painters were Angelico, Perugino and Giotto, and some of the most beautiful things he ever wrote are about their paintings. He wrote out of the happiness of a life that was full and rich, with the Church as the great historical background for his dreams; She was for him the great conserver of all that was beautiful and true in the past, and the great safeguard from revolution in the future.

Here indeed lies the contribution he made to his generation. Hence his Irish Legends, depicting what he conceived to be Ireland's vocation and place in the scheme of Providence, like Israel's, a spiritual one; hence, too, his "Legends and Records of the Church and Empire," and "Medieval Records and Sonnets, "the former an attempt to reconstruct the gradual formation of Western civilization achieved by Christian ideals and beliefs; the latter a presentation of the complete unity of life in Church and in State realized in the Ages of Faith. One of his last works was "St. Peter's Chains," a series of sonnets on the Roman Question, expressing his conviction that true independence for the Papacy and union of the world with it, was the only safeguard against the agnostic and disruptive tendency of modern thought.

It is outside the limits of this paper to discuss his labors and writings in the interests of Ireland, and his valuable contributions to literary criticism. To us Catholics it is enough to know that he is the Wordsworth of the Faith, and that he lived and thought that Faith even more strongly than he wrote about it, enough to cherish the picture of a great Catholic sinking slowly to his grave in beautiful Adare, saying his Breviary, and meditating and studying, at the venerable age of eighty-eight.

TO FRANCIS THOMPSON

Since thou on earth were poet to God's throne,
Aloft, dost thou not dream and sing of Him,
And try thy strength with choirs of Cherubim,
Till Heaven o'erflows with odes of mighty tone?

Or—Prophet—did some Angel bring to thee
The scorching coal that freed thy poet's lips,
And thou dost see a new Apocalypse:
The future joys that span eternity?

Or with the little Jesu, hand in hand,
You pace the hills that southwardly look down,
Where thistles raise on high their purple crown,
You speak the thoughts a child can understand?

And thus you roam forever by the sea,
Choosing to have the wisdom of a child,
Than all the courts of Heaven to hold beguiled
By song or vision chanted mightily.

REVIEWS

My Ireland: Songs and Simple Rhymes. By FRANCIS CARLIN. New York: Henry Holt & Co. $1.25.

"My Ireland" is one of this year's literary "finds." When the author first published his lyrics the book attracted little attention, but it subsequently fell in the way of such critics as "Tom" Daly, Padraic Colum, Christopher Morley and William Stanley Braithwaite, who at once discerned the fresh beauty of "My Ireland" and so this new and revised edition of the poems has appeared. Mr. Carlin is American-born, but when a boy he fortunately made such a profitable sojourn in the land of his ancestors that on his return to this country he brought back with him a mind stored with Irish folk-lore, an eye that had been taken captive by the charm of Erin's natural beauties, and an ear that retained the lilt of her poetry. The seeds then sown slowly ripened through the years of the author's youth and in this volume he garners the harvest. A little more pruning, however, would have heightened the poetical value of the book.

"The wind, the lark and the Gaelic Muse," the bees and the flowers, the saints, the warriors and the sages of Ireland are the themes of his poems. "In the Baby of St. Brigid" Mr. Carlin tells why little children smile in their sleep, "The Silent Clock" vividly describes a deathbed he saw when a boy, and "The Scribe" sweetly sings of the "illuminating dreams" that throng his soul. The stanzas,

> Sister Lucy all in white
> Silent as a snowy night,
> Lies upon her bier as though
> She were a form of drifted snow.
> Sister Lucy for a while > Lived among us, with a smile
> That glistens yet like ice, upon
> The face from which its warmth has gone brings "The Dead Nun" right before us, and the following poem, entitled "Maureen Oge," beautifully expresses the longing that all the lovely things she used to see seem to feel for the absent maiden:

> O Maureen Oge across the foam,
> If you were at these hedges here,
> You would not know that you were home
> So quaint is everything and queer.
> Each primrose opens with the day
> To wonder why it has unfurled,
> And since you wandered far away
> The winds have searched the open world.
> The cuckoo calls you home again;
> The daisies droop in pale distress;
> And roses lean across the lane,
> Och; roses wild with loneliness.
> O Maureen Oge beyond the sea,
> I wait not only with the rose;
> For in the house where you should be,
> The walls are lonesome for your clothes.

Accidence of Hebrew Grammar. With Exercises. By HENRY A. COFFEY, S.J., Professor of Hebrew in Woodstock College, Maryland. St. Louis: B. Herder. $1.25.

The author of this typographically attractive little book has incorporated into his grammar not merely the fruits of ripe scholarship, but has also brought to bear on the making of it an experience of actual teaching of his subject, extending over many years. Only the accidence of the language is treated, although it is said that Professor Coffey has another volume on the syntax already in preparation. The real crux of Hebrew, apparent rather than real, is the mastery of the forms, and it argues well for the skill of the author that he has found it possible to compress a satisfactory treatment of the matter into eighty-seven small, uncrowded pages, avoiding the difficulties from which previous works of the same kind have labored: the pedagogical defects of the "first-book" system, the lack of perspective, the overcrowding and the not infrequent confusion of more ambitious grammars. Father Coffey's book is not the work of a theorist, but bears evident marks of the practical teacher, combining precept with practice, it relegates to their proper place explanations needed only later, is sparing of technical terms, is restrained in erudition, presents the matter clearly, briefly, constructively, and develops along with the knowledge of forms, a vocabulary, which, if small, is nevertheless comprehensive, the treatment of the verbs being especially noteworthy. An index and lists of words in both languages, to be used in the translation and writing of exercises, are useful additions. Father Coffey's "Accidence" is just the book that is needed in the Hebrew classes of seminaries. J. H. F.

Letters to the Mother of a Soldier. By RICHARDSON WRIGHT. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Co. $1.00.

This book is an animated little treatise designed to strengthen the hearts of those mothers whose boys have left home for camp and battle-field. It is cast in the form of a series of letters which an elderly man is supposed to have sent to his widowed sister whose son is at the front. A forced note of intensity, together with a slight air of discursiveness, somewhat impairs the illusion that one is reading real letters. This is a merely artistic defect and does not at all interfere with the impression that the author is sincere in his sympathy and in his desire to be helpful.

Mr. Wright gives abundant evidence of having approached his kindly task with a full consciousness of its demands upon his reverence and his powers of serious reflection. If his little work should fail of its purpose in any given instance the failure will be due to the limitations which he set down for himself when he undertook the office of consoler. Thus, to give one instance, he mentions as books to be read in a period of keen anxiety, H. G. Wells's recent novels, "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," by George Gissing; Henley's "Invictus," and Francis Thompson's "Hound of Heaven." The number of mothers who can find balm for their souls in literature of that wide range must be comparatively small. Again, to cite another instance, while the author recommends prayer and the practices of religion, he lays no particular stress upon the recommendation. It is clear that the thought of the conflicting beliefs among his audience bothers him and makes him cautious.

The war has created a demand for just such books as this of Mr. Wright. They have figured largely among foreign publications during the last three years. The hour may be approaching, if it has not already struck, when books of this kind will be of paramount service with ourselves. It is an opportunity which ought to appeal to the zeal of a Catholic writer with the literary gifts of Mr. Wright. The Catholic will be strong just where Mr. Wright is weak, and that is at a most essential point. For the Church has resources for a dark hour which other forms of Christianity cannot command. J. D. Irish Memories. By E. Œ. SOMERVILLE and MARTIN ROSS. With 23 Illustrations from Drawings by E. Œ. Somerville, and from Photographs. Third Impression. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $4.20.

This is a volume of reminiscenses by two Irish Protestant literary women who are the authors of some sixteen books. "Martin" or Violet Ross is no longer living, consequently in many of the pages the "Quis desiderio" note is struck by Miss Somerville. The early part of the book has a great deal about the Ross family whose estate is in Galway. Miss Ross's grandmother was a Catholic whose "four children were brought up as Protestants," but "the rites of the Church," we are told, "were celebrated at Ross without let or hindrance"; Miss Somerville has no doubt that she herself received "secret baptism at the hands of the priest" when she was an infant. "It was a kindly precaution taken by our foster-mother." It would seem that Catholicism was not regarded seriously by the Rosses and Somervilles. The volume is full of literary and personal reminiscences, anecdotes of horses, dogs and hunts, tours and travels, all of which will probably be of more interest to the circle of the authors' acquaintances than to American readers. Let us hope that the Ireland described in this volume, an Ireland exploited by privileged Protestants, is gone forever, and that after the war all Irishmen will have equal rights and opportunities.

Raemaekers' Cartoon History of the War. Compiled by J. MURRAY ALLISON. Volume One. The First Twelve Months of War. New York: The Century Co. $1.50.

Louis Raemaekers, the Dutch artist, is a man whom the war has made an international figure. He was a little-known landscape painter before August, 1914, but the powerful war-cartoons he began to publish in the Amsterdam Telegraaf depicting the horrors of the German invasion of Belgium soon became the talk of Europe. He has probably done more than any one man to make the world realize the injustice and ruthlessness of the Kaiser's occupation of Belgium. The appearance of this volume of one hundred cartoons, representing for the most part Belgian scenes and incidents of the war's first year, ought to fill every American reader of the book with an iron determination to see that every outrage the unoffending Belgians have suffered at the hands of the invader shall, as far as possible, be avenged and atoned for before peace returns to Germany. On the page opposite each drawing Mr. Allison has set appropriate citations from the reports of investigating commissions, from military proclamations and the like. As the compiler well observes in his preface, Raemaekers "depicts militarism as hideous, brutal, coarse and cunning. His one thought seems to be that those things which all kindly and gentle men and women held dear and sacred, are being trampled upon and threatened by a monstrous wrong," and no one who looks at such striking pictures, for instance, as "The Shields of Rösselaere," "The Hostages," "Kultur Has Passed Here," "Mater Dolorosa," or "Slow Asphyxiation," will doubt that Mr. Raemaekers' pencil has unmistakably expressed his convictions. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

"It's Mighty Strange" (Stratford Co., Boston, $1.50), by James A. Duncan, is the interesting story of how Clarissa Lincoln, a daughter of the New England Puritans, became first a Catholic and then a Little Sister of the Poor; her conversion was begun by meeting the Egan family, and her influence and example subsequently brought into the Church almost everybody in her village. Interwoven with the story, though not always with the best of artistry, are some good pages of apologetics. The stanch virtues of the Lincoln family are well described, many of the incidents narrated seem to be facts and most of the characters are quite life-like.——There is too much preciosity about Alma Newton's "Memories" (Duffield, $1.00), a slender book which is chiefly concerned with the story of how she was crossed in love. The author's constant efforts to produce striking pen-pictures often result in failure.

"If I Were Twenty-one" (Lippincott, $1.25), by William Maxwell, is the advice of a business veteran to the young man starting out in life. It is filled with amusing and telling anecdotes, some sane criticism of men and times, sound observations on human nature and what you might call a psychological analysis of American business methods. It is from the pen of a man who has had experience in what he calls plainly, "getting a job," maintaining that no man ever yet "accepted a position" and from one who has had experience in the still more trying task of keeping others to theirs.——"Our Backdoor Neighbors" (Abingdon Press, $1.50), by Frank C. Pellet, is a nature-book of nearly a dozen sketches of animal life as observed by the author. The older reader will not find much to attract him in the sketches, for there is little given in the way of facts that is not already known or very easily accessible in briefer and more complete form; and the author's style is not very literary. However, younger readers will doubtless profit by an acquaintance with "Our Backdoor Neighbors," and are sure to like the eighty illustrations in the book.

Father Thomas S. McGrath has added to his other little prayer books a manual of "Prayers for Our Dead" (Benziger, $0.30 and $0.60), containing the Latin and English of the Missal's Requiem Masses, the burial service of children and adults and various indulgenced prayers for the dead.—"Czem Ja Bede?" (National Capital Press, Washington, $0.50) is the title of the Polish version of Father Cassilly's valuable pamphlet on vocations, "What Shall I Be?" which is published by the America Press. Father Aurelius Borkowski, O.F.M., the translator, has added accounts of the different Religious Orders and Congregations and filled the book with appropriate illustrations.——Our Sunday Vistor Press has out a new and revised edition of the Rev. Lawrence Hoyt's "School Children's Prayer Book" ($0.12 and $0.15). All the prayers that little ones need are there.——Father Francis Cassilly, S.J., has prepared a "Catechism for First Communion" (Catholic Instruction League, 1000 W. 12th St., Chicago, $0.05; $2.75 a hundred) which priests and teachers would do well to examine. In twenty-three short chapters is given in very simple language everything that little boys and girls of seven need to know in order to make their First Communion properly and valuable suggestions are also offered the children's teachers.——"What Luther Taught" (America Press, $0.15), Fathers Husslein and Reville's strong booklet, has appeared in an English edition to which Father Thurston contributes an introductory chapter and Father Ernesto Cangueiro of S. Paulo, Brazil, has translated the book into Portuguese under the title "O Que Luthero Ensinou."

———

There was once a piper of whom it was written that "the only tune that he could play was, 'Over the Hills and Far Away.'" The first part of the indictment seems proved against Mr. Edgar Lee Masters, the evidence in the case being "Toward the Gulf" (Macmillan, $1.50). The "blurb" which the publishers are good enough to forward with the volume avers that Mr. Masters' "analysis of motives" is "merciless," and his "understanding of character" sufficient to make his work "impressive," and for once the "puff direct" is not without an element of truth. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Masters apparently finds all his world an underworld, and most of his men and women gross creatures enmeshed in the web of fate and flesh. A poet trifling with his high gift is a sight for tears, and judged in the light of this canon, Mr. Masters' last volume is enough to evoke a roaring lacrymal Niagara.

This is the sonnet that gives a title to "Shepherd My Thoughts" (Kenedy, $0.75), Father Francis P. Donnelly's recent book of poems:

I wish to pray and from the ceaseless war
  Of worry summon forth the sweet delight
  Of holy peace. Full easily from sight,
But scarcely from the soul, the world I bar;
My flock of thoughts, how timorous they are!
  They rush where fairer pasture lands invite,
  Down easy hollows from the harder height;
And one and ninety-nine are lost afar.
Good Master, they are Thine and know Thy voice;
Send it now sounding down the devious ways
And dark where they have wandered from Thy care.
Ah, surely they will hearken and rejoice,
And thronging flock to meet Thy kindly gaze;
Shepherd my thoughts and fold them into prayer.

"The Earthquake" (Scribner, $1.50) tells in Arthur Train's interesting way the story of a wealthy American family's metamorphosis by the present war. John Stanton, a millionaire, leaves America with his wife and daughter in quest of health and returns to find the country involved in the present conflict. They immediately enter into the spirit of the struggle and the effects upon each are described. The rank and file of American patriots will see little sacrifice in a family of four living at an expense of $25,000 a year, when our brave heroes are giving life itself for the defense of our country in the shell-torn trenches of France.——"Martin Rivas" (Knopf, $1.60), by Alberto Blest Gana, which has been translated by Mrs. Charles Whitham, may be considered "the greatest of Spanish novels," but it is safe to say that the translation will never win for the book that distinction among English readers. It is a materialistic South American love-story with scarcely a chapter in it that leaves a pleasant impression on the mind. The characters are quite ordinary and the rather weak plot is not artistically developed.——In "Irish Joy Stories" (Mahon Press, New York, $0.50) Sheila Mahon, whose writings reveal a touch of real Celtic genius, has collected and published eight of her stories of Irish fairy-lore. The little book contains amusing tales of the "good folk," the Leprahawn, and the traditions connected with these tiny people, whose reputation for wonder-working is stilll sacred at many an Irish fireplace and in many an Irish heart.—— "The Son Decides" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.35), by Arthur Stanwood Pier, is an account of how an American college boy of German parentage gradually changes his attitude toward the war and ends by becoming a volunteer. Strange to say, the boy's father loses his German accent as the story proceeds.

EDUCATION

Schools and Patriotism

THE teaching of patriotism to the youth of our land is one of the big duties that devolves upon the teacher today. Not that it is anything new, for always and at all times this has been one of the chief obligations of those who instruct the young. But just at the present moment, when our country is involved in war, special emphasis must be laid on this subject. No opportunity may be lost in which to point out to our boys and girls the God-given law of love of country which has its source in the very words of Christ Himself, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's." In Catholic schools, especially, where religious devotions are in the order of the day, a particularly happy occasion is offered, outside of the classroom, for the emphasis of the patriotic note, when prayers are said for our arms and for the eternal repose of our soldiers who die in the service of the flag.

But how is patriotism to be taught? Is there to be a text-book for it, as there is for arithmetic or geography, with lessons assigned and recitations heard? Perhaps it might not be a bad idea for some one to get up a little text-book in patriotism; but that has yet to be done. In the meantime patriotism must be taught, text-book or not. How is it to be done?

Foundations of Patriotism

THERE are in truth 100 text-books on patriotism; just as many, at any rate, as there are of all the other studies of the school combined. For it is from the pages of every other book, be it geography or arithmetic, spelling or history, or catechism, that we must draw our real lessons in the love and service of our country. Patriotism, after all, is nothing but character-building, the training of the young in high ideals, in honesty and purity, in strength and sturdiness, for love of God and country. Even in so prosaic a thing as a spelling lesson patriotism may be taught, when a boy or girl is trained in thoroughness and accuracy, the same thoroughness and accuracy that some day will serve the nation as surely as arms protect it, or ships defend it.

There is perhaps no book, however, so rich in opportunities for the teaching of patriotism in school as our American history. From the pages of our country's history we can draw innumerable lessons in love and service of the flag; out of those pages shine forth the ideals of our nation's founders, the heroism of our forefathers; from their fabric the wise teacher will weave the background for his pupils' nationalistic thought, making them see, above all things, the aim and object of those first patriots of America who fought and bled and died to make our democracy a reality. The American history class in every school of the land today should be a veritable fountain of patriotic inspiration.

Jingoism Opposed to Patriotism

BUT is this a fact? Is true patriotism taught in our American history classes? Or is it rather mere jingoism that we give our youngsters when we open up to them the story of the country's struggles? Do we strengthen our youth, put backbone into them, and fire their souls with inspirations that will bear fruit, when we recount to them the glories of our dead heroes? Or do we only weaken them in the process by so filling their heads with vanished splendors that they can see nothing else? "America has never been defeated!" is one of the slogans of the hour, and assuredly we have a right to be proud of the flag that has never been pulled down in surrender. But would it not be better for us to cry, America never shall be defeated! and then make the word good? The point is, our dead heroes are dead; they can fight our battles no more for us, excepting insofar as their ideals and their bravery inspire us, not to mere adulation but to emulation, to action. The fault is in our method. From the manner in which too many of us teach American history, or have been taught it, we are in danger of relying altogether too much on George Washington and Patrick Henry, instead of upon ourselves. We are liable to let the glories of the past blind us to the weaknesses of the present.

A few years ago Brigadier General Edwards, U. S. A., criticising our American school histories, spoke a word of warning that, in the light of what has happened during the past year, was truth itself. Our boastful American histories, he said then, "will be in large part to blame if this country ever comes to grief for its military unpreparedness." "Full of blow and braggadocio," he characterized those histories, educating the youth of the land to the idea that "we can lick all creation," and so on. Even today do we not frequently see the challenging word that "one American can beat a dozen Germans"?

Need of a Judicious Text-Book

THERE is no greater need in our schools today than a judicious teaching of American history. We dare not make jingoes of our children. The reaction would be fatal. The fruit of chauvinism is destruction. The mistakes we have made in the past in this regard should be enough to warn us. For instance, the truth about the Revolutionary War, and the War of 1812, as our newer researches show us, is disconcerting, to say the least. Truth and justice must be served. Yet this does not in the faintest degree imply the loss of our original American ideals or the juggling of right and wrong. On the contrary, if we study the American Revolution in its true light, the ideal of democracy is far better served than in the old way of laying galling emphasis on mere acts and consequences instead of stressing the causes and motives of the struggle. Self-government, self-determination, is our avowed ideal in the world-conflict today. A proper interpretation of our first war but reveals the same high objective which is certainly more deserving of emphasis than the incidental item of taxes. Dr. Albert Bushnell Hart's recent volume, "New American History," will throw much light on this question for teachers and students; and another book that has lately appeared, "The American Revolution in Our School Text-Books," by Charles Altschul, will serve even more pointedly to show how American history should be taught.

Where We Fail

THE big weakness in our present method of teaching American history is a fatal leaning toward provincialism, a failure to grasp the basic truth of world-independence, of international unity. We have been, and are, doing the very thing that we reprehend in Germany, inculcating in the young an aloofness, a false spirit of conscious superiority that has no real foundation. What we should do and what we must do, is build the foundation, the first stones of which, of course, are the ideals and deeds of our fathers. But that is not the whole structure.

We must teach patriotism in our history classes. There, above all other places, can we show our true metal; and there, above all other places, can we demonstrate how true to the touchstone of Christian philosophy are our American ideals. The pupil who learns the history of his country as it should be taught him will know that there are ideals; that it is worth while to be true to them; that there is a right and a wrong, between which, as Theodore Roosevelt has so aptly put it, "there can be no neutrality." Such false philosophies as the one which tells us that "all things in life are relative" will have no chance with a mind so trained. Smug satisfaction, the blindness and boastfulness which destroy men and nations, will be unknown to the American citizen so educated. The true American patriot is the one who knows his country's soul. The school history which we teach him must express that soul; his teacher must reveal it to him. C. P.

SOCIOLOGY

The Country Child

IMMORTALIZED in story and celebrated in song, the life of the country child has come to be regarded as the ideal child-life, all light and beauty and purity, against which, in the strongest contrast, looms the dark life of the city youngster: a life which has likewise grown to its own place in the literature and thought of the people of every land. The conviction that the country child has every advantage, so far as health and happiness and moral safety are concerned, is universally established.

All this has its foundation in fact, but nevertheless everything that is said and thought concerning the superiority of the life of the country child over that of his brother of the city is not based on fact. The advantages are not all in the green lanes; or at any rate, there are disadvantages there as well as in the street and alley of the town. Yet, if we were to rely wholly on the writings of the sociologists and reformers of the present day, or to draw our conclusions from their activities only, we would be forced to believe that except in the city, there are no dangers to be coped with in the raising of children, no perils to the health or morals of the young to be fought except those of the congested districts of great centers of population.

The Country School

THIS is not to minimize the difficulties of child-raising in city surroundings, where there are indeed dangers and obstacles almost beyond computation. But has not the contemplation of these evils more or less blinded us to the dangers with which the country child is surrounded? Yet these dangers demand fully as much attention as those of the city. Some way must be found in which they may be reached and remedied. The school appears to be the likeliest medium.

The fact is, most of the dangers and evils imperiling child life in the country may be said to focus themselves, one way or the other, in the country school. In the first place, the country school is all too often such an unhygienic and unsanitary place as would not be tolerated in a city. And in the second place a very great number of the children attending the country school are sent to it badly devitalized by conditions at home, and all the more susceptible to the dangers the school itself presents. Child life is cheap in the country. The children of hard-working farmer parents, who themselves toil twelve hours a day, year in and year out, are too often regarded as mere chattels on the farm, or, if not exactly that, at any rate are treated with an indifference to health that in the long run works considerable evil. Such children are given their work to do, school or no school; and if school there must be for them, it is only the tag end of their energies that they can possibly bring to it. Then, if it is to a school poorly ventilated, over- or under-heated, sans every sanitary and hygienic necessity, who can deny that the health of the child will suffer? Yes, even the health of the country child, popularly supposed to be so natively robust and rosy-cheeked as to be immune from all bodily danger.

Sapping the Child's Vitality

OF course it is a good thing for boys and girls to have the advantages that country life affords: a certain amount of exposure to develop hardihood and resistance; a certain amount of hard work to put spines in them. But the trouble is that both country parents and country teachers are prone to look upon the country child as a creature very especially immune from all the ordinary weaknesses of children. Yet a child is a child, wherever you find him: a tender and growing thing that must be nurtured; that must not be overworked; that must not be too much exposed. Take the matter of extremes of weather, for instance. No one will deny that country children are very often exposed to the elements in a way that is decidedly harmful, that leaves them very susceptible to disease, and all the more so if their vitality has already been sapped by long hours of heavy work, by lack of the sleep that is absolutely necessary for them, and finally by hygienic conditions in the school that are pretty well calculated to put the finishing touch on their bodily injury.

Then again, if too much strain is made on the vitality of the country child through exposure, through over-work, through "choring" at unearthly hours when sleep is what the young body needs, or through labor that exhausts, not only is he exposed to the danger of undermining his health, but what energy is left him to assimilate his studies? What powers can he possibly bring to the classroom with which to cope with the problems of mental development? Education under such circumstances cannot be a success.

Lures of Vice in Country Life

SO much for the bodily health of the country child. As for the spiritual, there are evils and dangers in the country and the village that should not be forgotten while we are hearkening to the warnings against the perils and allurements of city life. Parents who fret about their children leaving home for the city, or who spend sleepless nights worrying about the sons or daughters already gone to the town; teachers who gaze with complacency on their young charges of the country side, sighing with a sweet sense of security over the pitfalls that threaten the children of the distant metropolis, such parents and such teachers would do well to give a second thought, in the same regard, to the youngsters who still remain in the rural districts. Home they may be; but because they are not exposed to the noise and rush and distraction of the city, it does not follow that they are safe from the traps of sin or immune from terrible temptations. There are lures and perils in the country that are just as omnipresent and just as fatal as any in the "wicked city." Those who know can tell of wickedness in the country such as would put the Barbary Coast to shame. The pastor in the country town, for one, can tell us no little about the dangers to which boys and girls are exposed, right at home, in the "safe" country districts, without even a step in the direction of the bright lights of city life.

Problems of the Country Child

THESE dangers exist. If then, to cope with them, our country youth can bring, as he likewise brings, perhaps, to his studies in the country school, only a devitalized body, a body overstrained by exhaustive labor, by unearthly hours and lack of the proper amount of sleep; a body, furthermore, weakened by unhygienic conditions in the school, what can be the result? Can the fruit of such living be, after all, so very much sounder and more wholesome than that of life in even the most congested city districts, where restricted space, lack of good air, pollution of the atmosphere by smoke and gases, and nerve-shattering noise, attack and undermine the vitality of the town-bred child? Sometimes those who have had to observe closely and first hand the actual life of the country child, supposedly so refreshing, so immune from danger, yet in actuality too often a life of bodily and spiritual neglect, sometimes such people are tempted almost to a belief that of the two, the city child has the better of it. In the long run, at any rate, he has advantages that the country child never gets. And that is just the point. The country child should have these advantages. He should have hygienic surroundings in his school. He should have rest and recreation at home. He should have all the helps and safeguards of body and soul that are the rightful due of the growing child, and especially of the adolescent youth. There are problems in the country, problems of the country child, just as serious, demanding just as careful attention and just as quick a solution, as any relating to life on the city streets.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Remailing Catholic Literature

AN excellent and very practical plan for the distribution of Catholic literature is offered by the International Catholic Truth Society. The suggestion is made by it that those interested in the remailing of Catholic literature should send an envelope, enclosing a three-cent stamp, to the address, 407 Bergen Street, Brooklyn, N. Y. In return the society will communicate the name of a mission or person to whom such literature can be advantageously forwarded. Those who have undertaken this work of charity can similarly interest their friends in mailing some Catholic papers and magazines into isolated districts. The subject might furthermore be mentioned at the meetings of Catholic societies, so that as many as possible will interest themselves in this campaign for the diffusion of Catholic truth.

Parochial Schools in Lead

A REMARKABLE triumph was recently scored by the parochial schools in a Thrift Stamp Essay Contest conducted by the St. Louis Globe-Democrat. All the schools, public and parochial, of Missouri and southern Illinois, were included. The competitors were divided territorially into two groups, in the first of which alone 5,400 papers were submitted. The judges were the superintendent of the public schools of St. Louis, the superintendent of the parochial schools and Rabbi Sale. In each group the first prize was won by a pupil from our Catholic parochial schools. The winner in the first group was Albert Weidinger, of St. Liborius' parochial school, St. Louis, while in the second group the first prize was awarded to Robert Palmer, of St. Andrew's parochial school, Murphyboro, Ill.

Laymen's and Women's Retreats

THE first announcements of laymen's and women's retreats for the coming season have been received. The Missionary Association of Catholic Women offers the opportunity of a retreat for women at Our Lady's Academy, Chicago, to open August 7 and close August 11. Applications are to be sent to the home of the Association, 834 Thirty-sixth Street, Milwaukee, Wis. Eight retreats for the laity are to be conducted by the Fathers of the Divine Word at Techny, Ill. The retreats for men will take place July 11-14, August 8-11, and a German retreat July 18-21. The retreats for women are set for June 27-30, August 1-4, August 22-25, August 29-September 1, and a German retreat July 4-7. The laymen's retreats are held at St. Mary's Mission House, and a special appeal is made to the young men who are likely soon to receive their country's call to arms. No better preparation can be made by them for the serious task of war than a good retreat. The women's retreats are conducted at St. Ann's Home. Both institutions are situated at Techny, Ill. Last year more than 600 men and women attended the various exercises. This is the best recommendation.

The Power That Guards the Pope

WITH noble fearlessness the recent pastorals of the English Bishops have defended the rights and honor of the Holy Father. The Bishop of Nottingham looks back to the time, upwards of half a century ago, when the Temporal Power of the Pope, "consecrated by the sanctions of 1,000 years, was assailed by the anti-Christian revolution, aided by Napoleon III and by the Palmerstons and Russels here at home." It was then that the far-seeing Cardinal Manning described the Temporal Power of the Sovereign Pontiffs as "the keystone of the arch of Christian civilization, which could not be disturbed without entailing the collapse of the whole superstructure." This forecast, says the Bishop, has been realized today. He then alludes, in striking words, to the fate of all who have lifted violent hands against God's anointed:

> Napoleon I, with the sagacity of a great statesman, used to say that in dealing with the Pope you should treat him as though he were master of 200,000 men, which meant, a century ago, that he should be treated as one of the great powers of the world. But his estimate fell far short of the truth. Napoleon learned to his cost, that while he could capture and imprison the Pontiff, he was powerless to subdue him, and still less to avert the Nemesis which dogs the footsteps of every persecutor of the successor of the Fisherman. It is not too much to say that his insolent treatment of Pope Pius VII evidently cost him his imperial crown. And yet, in the bitterness of his soul in his exile at St. Helena, the only friend he had left was the saintly Pontiff he had outraged.

The world, Bishop Lacy concludes, is approaching a great crisis, and nothing will save it from disaster save "the Wisdom that sitteth on the Throne." There is a Power more than human that defends the Pope, as there is a Wisdom greater than that of man which guides the Church.

Schwab Corrects False Report

IN a speech reported throughout the press of the land, Mr. Schwab had apparently expressed himself in a most outspoken manner in favor of the Bolshevik sentiment. Among other consequences of that address "Bill" Haywood, the I. W. W. leader, had presented him with a pair of overalls, together with his congratulations. Mr. Schwab has since seen fit to correct the impression left by the report:

> I have had a lot of notoriety in the misquotation of remarks that I have not before this made any effort to correct. I said, "The world of the future is to be ruled by the people who work." I meant by the people who work not only those who work with tools and with the machine, but those who work with heart, brain and energy. I regard myself as a worker and all my men as workers. The point I want to make is that the aristocracy of the future cannot and dare not be that of people born to position and control by noble lineage and wealth. It will not conform with the standards of the future that such should direct the enterprises of the world. Those who have striven for their country and for humanity, those justly should rule.

This answers the interrrogation with which AMERICA had reproduced the significant passage of his reported speech which in plain words aligned the steel magnate with the Bolshevik movement.

The Knights of De l'Epee

THE Knights of De l'Epée, a national Catholic organization for the deaf, desire to bring their order to the notice of the Catholic deaf throughout the country. They believe that many who might avail themselves of its advantages are still unaware of its existence. The order is similar to that of the Knights of Columbus, but its purpose is to unite fraternally all Catholic deaf men of sound bodily health and good moral character, between the ages of eighteen and fifty-five years, to give them all possible aid, socially, morally and intellectually, to establish a fund for the relief of distressed and sick members, and finally to be of assistance to the widows and orphans of deceased members.

> The Order shall aim to preserve the good faith of all members of the Catholic Church; to encourage faith, loyalty and honor among its members; to assist in spreading, whenever deemed urgent, proper means for the uplift and education of the Catholic deaf children. It shall give its support in every possible way to Catholic chaplains engaged in missionary or educational work among the deaf.

The organization has headquarters in many of our larger cities and all persons in search of information can communicate with the Supreme Knight, James F. Donnelly, 811 Walnut Street, Richmond Hill, L. I. For ladies the order of the Ladies of De l'Epée has been established, similar to that of the Daughters of Isabella. Its consolidation with the men's organization will be acted upon at the Baltimore Convention, which is to be held in August. The organizations of both the men and the women take their name from the founder of the sign language, the Abbé Charles Michael De l'Epée.

A "Methodistic" Discovery

METHODIST bishops and editors are perhaps the most wonderful explorers this side of the moon; they are perpetually finding and describing strange and uncanny things that do not exist, at least outside of their own disordered imaginations or untruthful hearts, as the case may be. Thus not long since one of their bishops discovered some outrageous statements in St. Alphonsus Liguori, that were not there, another bishop hit upon an unholy doctrine in the "Ne Temere," that had no existence in objective fact, the editor of the Northwestern Christian Advocate found words in an editorial of AMERICA, that were written by himself in his own office, the editor of the frowzy little damosel, the Christian Advocate, in writing of the editors of AMERICA presented fiction for fact. Truly, they are wonderful explorers, these Methodist folk. As a consequence the following abstract, marked Methodist Centenary Bulletin, which was sent to AMERICA from Corydon, Indiana, did not cause even a ruffle of surprise: a Methodist explorer had made another discovery, that is all.

> A closetful of human skulls, neatly packed away, row upon row, was the gruesome discovery workmen made when they began to remodel the buildings purchased by the Methodist Episcopal Church for their mission school in Puebla, Mexico.
> The school today bears no trace of its bloody past. It is all very quiet and graceful with galleries running around flowery patios and the soft hum of girlish voices as they study aloud within the pleasant rooms. But had the skulls been made to talk they might have told some ghastly tales, for the school buildings were once part of the old Inquisition buildings. Puebla has always been the ecclesiastical capital of the country, and until the early part of the nineteenth century was the seat of the cruelest proceedings of the Inquisition.
> When the Inquisition was overthrown, the infuriated people, many of whom had lost brothers and fathers and even sisters at the hands of the priests, attacked these buildings as they attacked the Bastile in France. They found few victims alive, but when they began furiously hacking at the walls, there was a hollow sound; and twelve chambers were uncovered in which heretics had been walled up alive. The skeletons had the rags of their clothing still clinging to them.

A whole closetful of human skulls! A school with a bloody past! The seat of the cruelest proceedings of the Inquisition! Infuriated people, many of whom had lost brothers and fathers and even sisters at the hands of the priests! Heretics walled up alive! Skeletons had the rags of clothing still clinging to them!

The lights are low on the Bowery, and the Methodist editor is tearing passion to tatters, to the joy of a sweaty rabble. But what is the truth? Only this, the Inquisition never operated in Puebla and never put anyone to death in that city. It is to be hoped that such trifling and continued exposures of Methodist bishops and editors will not cause them to discontinue their explorations. By all means let them push on their investigations, for some day they may fall across this objective fact: "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbor."

Chronicle

The War.—Along the western front, both in Flanders and Picardy, the week has been one of suspense and preparation. No movement or action of major importance has taken place. The severest fighting occurred in the neighborhood of Hill 44, a small but important elevation near the Vyverbeek River, north of Kemmel, about which sanguinary conflicts have been waged since May 8. On May 14 it appeared to be in the hands of the Germans again. The next day's dispatches announced that it had been recaptured by the French. Southwest of Morlancourt, east of Amiens, the enemy, early in the week, opened an intense bombardment on a front of nearly a mile, and followed it with an assault which at one point gained a footing in the British line, but it was repulsed elsewhere with heavy losses. In a counter-attack the Australians completely restored the British positions. They also took the village of Ville-Sur-Ancre north of Morlancourt. In a vigorous assault on the German positions south of Hailles, southeast of Amiens, the French captured a wood west of the Avre River and held it in spite of a strong German counter-attack. Artillery duels were reported in the Hailles-Castel sector, and repeated minor and local attacks in the region around Albert and north and south of the Avre. American batteries were active around Montididier and in Lorraine.

Battle in, May 11, p.m.-May 20, a.m.

After a long period of inactivity, partially broken by "feeler" thrusts, the Italians attacked and destroyed an Austrian post at Col dell'Orso, on the northern mountain front between the Brenta and the Piave. They had prepared for the attack by previously taking the dominating position of Monte Corno in the Arsa region which leads down from the Lagarina Valley and is the main line of approach from Trent and Rovereto. They also carried out an offensive operation on a large scale in which the Austrian trenches on Monte Asolone, between the Brenta and the Piave were entered, while a British contingent successfully raided the enemy trenches at Canove. Enemy efforts to approach the Italian advance line in the Rosole Valley at Fortini, in the Posina Valley and on the Col di Chele failed. On the southwest front the Austrians were driven out of the Casatasson Ridge north of Monte Grappa. In two strong attacks on Monte Mantello north of Tresegnori, and near Mount Stablet, in the Adamello district, they were also thrown back with heavy losses.

An Austrian battleship of the Viribus Unitis type (20,000-ton ships) was torpedoed and sunk by Italian naval forces in Pola Harbor.

Recently Germany protested that she had no plans of territorial aggrandizement in the East. The declaration was followed this week by the news that the Kaiser had selected four Kings to rule over Lithuania, Courland, Esthonia and Poland. A state of war was also declared in the Russian cities of Ekaterinoslav, Odessa and Poltava, while in spite of the armistice German bands were advancing in the Don Cossack region.

Austro-German Pact; Germany's Plans

At the conference held at the German Great Headquarters, Emperor Charles of Austria, induced by the internal troubles in the Austro-Hungarian Empire, seems to have given the Kaiser a free hand and to have accepted a new treaty of alliance with Germany, widely interpreted as making Austria-Germany a German colony or vassal State. Political, military and economic questions were regulated on the basis of a twenty-years' agreement. The Kings of Saxony and Bavaria appeared uninvited at the conference of the Emperors and insisted upon participating as the heads of important German States. Several German papers speak of the alliance as a great and happy stroke. The Vorwärts on the contrary writes:

> An alliance can only have an assured foundation if it rests on the willing consent of the people. Of such a basis we see little sign at the present moment in Austria. Germany today in Austria-Hungary, thanks to the Pan-German propaganda, is heartily unpopular, not only with the Slav majority, but also with a considerable portion of the German-Magyar minority.

Paul S. Reinach, the American Minister at Pekin, has officially informed the State Department at Washington of the conclusion of a treaty between the Japanese and Chinese governments for a defensive alliance against Germany, for mutual protection for the duration of the war.

President Wilson opened the National Red Cross Drive for $100,000,000 at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, on May 18. The substance of his speech is contained in his declaration that there are two duties with which we are face to face. The first is to win the war, the second is to win it greatly and worthily. The following are some of the most characteristic sentences of his address:

The President's Red Cross Speech

> I have heard gentlemen recently say that we must get 5,000,000 men ready. Why limit it to 5,000,000? I have asked the Congress of the United States to name no limit, because the Congress intends, I am sure, as we all intend, that every ship that can convey men or supplies shall go laden upon every voyage with every man and every supply she can carry. And, we are not to be diverted from the grim purpose of winning the war by any insincere approaches upon the subject of peace. I can say with a clear conscience that I have tested those intimations, and have found them insincere. I now recognize them for what they are, an opportunity to have a free hand, particularly in the East, to carry out purposes of conquest and exploitation. Every proposal with regard to accommodation in the West involves a reservation with regard to the East. Now, so far as I am concerned, I intend to stand by Russia as well as France.

Before signing the Overman bill, which passed the House after passing the Senate, and which endows the Chief Executive with greatly increased powers, the President created something of a sensation in official circles and surprised the country by appointing Charles E. Hughes to act with Attorney General Gregory in the investigation of the criminal charges made by Gutzon Borglum in regard to aircraft production. This appointment took place simultaneously with another sweeping action on the part of the President. In a letter to Senator Martin, the Democratic floor leader, the President again stated his disapproval of the phrasing of the pending Chamberlain resolution authorizing further inquiry by the Senate Military Committee into the conduct of the war. The passage of such a resolution, he declared, would be equivalent to a vote of want of confidence in the Administration and would virtually be an attempt to take over the conduct of the war. The resolution was submitted to the Senate Committee on Audits and Expenses. This Committee by a three to two vote, ordered a favorable report on the resolution after modifying it. This modification limited it to "the progress of aircraft and ordnance production in the United States or into the status of the Quartermaster General's supplies or expenditures in any of those branches of the War Department." All references to the "conduct of the war" were taken out and a proviso added: "Nothing in this resolution shall be held to authorize the Military Affairs Committee to take over in any manner, direct or superintend the executive branch of the Government of the war." It was thought that the President would not oppose the resolution in this modified form without opposing an investigation pure and simple into the material preparation of the war. He opposed it nevertheless on the ground that even thus modified it would in effect authorize a "dragnet" investigation by the Military Committee.

The President and the Investigations

The British Secretary for Foreign Affairs, Arthur J. Balfour, in giving explanations in the House of Commons in connection with Emperor Charles's "peace" letter to Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, recently made public by the President of the French Republic, said that no effort at conversations had ever been made by the Central Powers in the interest of a fair and honorable peace. He stated, however, that "If any representative of any belligerent country desires seriously to lay before us any proposals, we are ready to listen to them." The letter in question had been examined by a committee of the French Chamber, added Mr. Balfour, and the conclusion had been reached that it did not provide any adequate or satisfactory basis for an honorable peace.

The Balfour Speech

According to the statement of Mr. Balfour, the letter of the Emperor to his relative, Prince Sixtus de Bourbon, was conveyed by the Prince to President Poincaré and the French Premier, under the seal of the greatest secrecy, but with no permission to communicate it to anyone except the King of England and the British Premier. The letter was communicated to the French and the British Premier under these pledges. The American Government has no ground of complaint against the French or British Governments because it was not informed of the letter. It realizes that the peculiar circumstances under which the correspondence with the Austrian Emperor's brother-in-law was conducted imposed conditions of confidence and secrecy that could not be disregarded by an honorable statesman. It is pointed out also that the United States Government has not entered into any such formal undertaking as bound the Entente Allies not to consider peace proposals separately, though President Wilson has declared that any peace that would be acceptable must embody fundamentals upon which America and the Entente Allies were in complete accord.

Ireland.—The arrest of the Sinn Fein leaders on May 17 came as an unexpected development in the Irish situation. Some 500 members were apprehended, among the more prominent being Professor Edward de Valera, President; Arthur Griffith, Vice-President and founder; Darrell Figgis, one of the secretaries; William Cosgrove, one of the treasurers; Dr. Thomas Dillon and the Countess Markievicz, members of the executive committee. All the Sinn Fein members of Parliament were arrested. Other notable Sinn Feiners, now in prison, are Dr. Richard Hayes, Thomas Hunter, Joseph McCriath, Patrick O'Keefe, Joseph McGuiness; Denis McCullough, H. Mellows, J. McGrath, John M. Centee, Sean Milroy, George Gerachty, Sean McGarry, Walter Scales, Todge Barry, Peter Hourihan and Dr. McNabb.

Arrest of Sinn Fein Leaders

Simultaneously with the arrests Viscount French, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, published the following proclamation:

Whereas, it has come to our knowledge that certain subjects of his Majesty the King, domiciled in Ireland, have conspired to enter, and have entered, into treasonable communication with the German enemy; and

Whereas, such treachery is a menace to the fair name of Ireland and its glorious military record, a record which is a source of intense pride to a country whose sons always distinguished themselves and fought with valor; and

Whereas, drastic measure must be taken to put down this German plot, which means will be solely directed against that plot; now, therefore, we, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland and Governor-General of Ireland, have thought fit to issue this proclamation, as follows:

That it is the duty of all loyal subjects of his Majesty to assist in every way his Majesty's Government in Ireland to suppress this treasonable conspiracy and to defeat the treacherous attempt to Germany to defame the honor of Irishmen for their own ends.

That we hereby call upon all loyal subjects of his Majesty in Ireland to aid in crushing such conspiracy, and so far as in them lies to assist in securing an effective prosecution of the war and the welfare and safety of the Empire.

That as a means to this end we shall cause still further steps to be taken to facilitate and encourage voluntary enlistment in Ireland in his Majesty's forces, in the hope that, without resort to compulsion, the contribution of Ireland to these forces may be brought up to the proper strength and made to correspond to the contributions of other parts of the Empire.

Chief Secretary Shortt declared that he, with the Lord Lieutenant, accepted full responsibility for the stern measures taken with the Sinn Fein leaders, which were directed, he said, solely against a dangerous German intrigue of which they had knowledge.

The same press Association dispatch, which is the source of this information, goes on to say:

The Irish Government are fully aware that the number of Irishmen and Irish women in active co-operation with the German enemy is very small, but many might unknowingly become involved, and they believe, therefore, they can rely upon the support of the Irish without regard to creed or political views in the measures they have taken. The Irish Government are determined to take every necessary step to stamp out the German plot.

No formal charge has as yet been preferred against the prisoners, who were taken into custody on warrants issued under the Defense of the Realm act. The residences and offices of the Sinn Feiners in Dublin were visited and documents, books and letters found in them were seized. No violence has been reported.

The Dublin Freeman's Journal, commenting on the situation, said in part:

Conscription is to be launched in Ireland under the cover of revelations connected with an alleged German plot. That appears to be the meaning of this rather strange proclamation, which is Chief Secretary Shortt's first word to the Irish prophets. Of course it is not impossible that a few foolish men in Ireland may have been interested in a conspiracy to invoke German aid, as the Covenanters threatened to invoke it in 1914, but the Irish people have never been pro-German, and, notwithstanding all the provocation received from the English Government, they are not pro-German today.

The Lord Mayor of Dublin, who had already received his passports and intended to leave for the United States at an early date in order to confer with President Wilson, made the following statement, published by the Chicago Tribune:

I am uncertain now about my departure. De Valera was a member of the Mansion House conference that was opposing conscription. Developments might necessitate my remaining here indefinitely. It is certain I shall not go as long as I think I am needed here. One reason of my trip to the United States was to explain to the people there that, while we agree with the Sinn Fein, we have at no time sympathized with the idea that we should use force to gain Irish freedom. No one can tell now for the moment what will be the result of the Government's move with the responsible leaders in prison.

Mr. John Dillon, head of the Irish Nationalists, refused to make any statement when interviewed, but called a meeting of the Irish party to discuss the developments. Mr. William O'Brien, Nationalist member of Parliament for Cork, is quoted as saying that the effect of the arrest of Mr. Arthur Griffith, the Sinn Fein candidate for Parliament, would be his unanimous election to represent Cavan.

English newspaper comment on the arrests is restrained, pending the publication of evidence of the pro-German plot, said to be in the possession of the Government. The same is true of editorial comment in the United States. The obscurity shrouding the entire proceeding has made our journals suspend judgment. Thus the New York Evening Post, while not unsympathetic, is non-committal. It said on May 18:

If the Countess Markievicz, Professor de Valera, Dr. Dillon, and others have been guilty of treasonable acts in connection with the Germans, their fate is sealed and no one will have the slightest sympathy for them. Ireland has a hard fight before her, and needs the world's aid, but she will not get it if any of her leaders ask German aid or seek the Kaiser's support. If, on the other hand, this is a new English campaign of terrorism, it is another terrible misfortune, and may mean the beginning of bloodshed—a bloodshed so unnecessary as to wring everybody's heart, whatever one's sympathies. Yesterday the House of Commons adjourned without a sign of a Home Rule bill being introduced, despite Lloyd George's promises; hence any hope of aid from this source has failed. But we do not ask our readers to take our view alone as to the critical conditions in Ireland and the nature of the catastrophe which may now be in sight.

The day before the arrests took place, the Irish party, whose head is Mr. John Dillon, issued a statement accusing the British Government of bad faith in the matter of Home Rule, and declaring that the recent promise of it was insincere and intended to deceive the House of Commons, the British public, the allied European nations, and especially the Government and people of the United States:

We beg of the American people and Government, in the memory of the bonds of sympathy which have existed between the American and Irish nations ever since the foundation of the republic, to urge upon their British Allies the duty of immediately applying, in the case of Ireland, those principles of democratic freedom and national self-determination so magnificently set forth in President Wilson's declarations, the benefit of which is denied to Ireland, while the Irish people are called on to fight for them in foreign lands.

A more formal appeal to the United States Government was embodied in a petition adopted by the National Order of the Friends of Irish Freedom at a large meeting held in New York City on May 18. After emphasizing the loyalty of members of the convention to the United States and their readiness to make every sacrifice for its honor and interests, the convention called attention to the aid given by Irishmen to America in the revolutionary, Mexican, Civil and Spanish Wars, and asked that America now make a return to Ireland and extend to Ireland the application of the President's principle "of the right of every people to self-rule and self-determination," "provided that can be made without injury to America's honor or interests, or violation of America's relations to her co-belligerents." The petition insisted on the disastrous effects of England's administration of Ireland, and especially the arresting of her development, the destruction of her industries and the driving forth to other lands of her sons and daughters; it characterized the question as an international one, which if not settled satisfactorily now, would continue to trouble the world and remain a danger to the world's peace. It concludes as follows:

> Because of the immense sacrifices of every kind which the United States is now making, and is prepared to make, our country now has it in its power to effect a settlement of this disturbing condition which so seriously weakens England and takes from her the power to make her full contribution of strength to her co-belligerents; such a result would be a lasting tribute to the moral leadership of America, and to accomplish it we urge our Government to exert every legitimate and friendly influence in favor of self-determination for the people of Ireland.
> We therefore respectfully ask the President and Congress to take such measures as, in their wisdom and judgment, are best calculated to bring about this result.

The House of Commons adjourned on May 16 until May 28. The promised Home Rule bill was not introduced, nor could any of the members say when it would be introduced. Mr. George Nicoll Barnes, Labor Member of the War Council, in a speech of welcome to the members of the American Labor Mission, said that "Ireland must have its Parliament," but he was, perhaps, merely voicing the same views as when he said, in the course of the same speech, that "Labor is in complete sympathy with Irish national sentiment."

Both in England and Ireland there is the greatest uncertainty in the matter of the enforcement of conscription. The announcement made by Lieutenant-General Sir Bryan Mahon on May 9 of his retirement from the post of Commander-in-Chief of the forces in Ireland was taken by many to be an indication of the intention of the Government to proceed with conscription. But this impression has been somewhat weakened by the report that a number of prominent Irishmen have submitted to Lloyd George a petition to have General Mahon, who is popular with large classes in Ireland, appointed director of recruiting in Ireland. A stronger indication of the possibility of a change of plan on the part of the Government is found by others in the statement which occurs in the Lord Lieutenant's proclamation: "We shall cause still further steps to be taken to facilitate and encourage voluntary enlistment in Ireland in his Majesty's forces."

The New York Herald, basing its information on a dispatch from Dublin printed in the London Times, says that signatures are being invited in Ireland to a proposal that the Irish question be submitted for adjudication to a competent international tribunal. Such a tribunal might consist, for example, of the United States and the neutral Powers of Europe.

News came on May 20 that seventy-three Sinn Fein prisoners were deported from Ireland to Wales on May 18, and on the same day Count Plunkett was arrested.

Russia.—According to a dispatch to the London Times dated Petrograd, April 30, there is practically no food in the markets or shops of the capital. Very little meat can be obtained, while flour, sugar, potatoes, cheese or grain cannot be had at all. Black bread is doled out at the rate of one-eighth of a pound a day. Profiteering or speculating in food is common and things to eat are circulated like money. Here are some prevailing prices:

Scarcity of Food

> Good hares are being sold at £2 10 shillings apiece. Hams are offered at £40 and £60 each. Butter costs 42 shillings a pound; cheese, 36 shillings a pound; white flour, 30 shillings a pound; eggs, 3 shillings apiece; carrots, 5 shillings a pound; potatoes, 6 shillings a pound.

The British colony in Petrograd was forced to wire to London for a supply of food, but none was forthcoming.

Lady Muriel Page, organizer of the Anglo-Russian Hospital, who reached New York from Kieff last week, reports that conditions in Russia "present a picture of almost incredible anarchy." She continued:

"Incredible Anarchy"

> The general disorganization is hard to realize. In Kieff there were 10,000 refugee officers, and in Odessa 11,000, formerly men of means and position, now reduced to earning their living by any sort of work they could get, driving street cars, selling matches, anything. On the streets a well-dressed person is sure to be held up and compelled to give up coat or shoes at the point of the revolver. The most pitiful thing was the case of the refugee officers whom I have mentioned. Before the Bolshevist attack the Rada had threatened these men with death if they refused to attach themselves to its side. They protested that they wanted to go on with the war against the Germans, and the Rada finally made them some sort of promise that lessened their suspicious attitude. But they did not take sides; the matter had gone no further than enrolling them all and giving them passes to go about the city when the Bolsheviki attacked. After Kieff was captured the Bolsheviki found this list, and purely on the strength of it they hunted down and shot 2,600 of these officers.

It is not expected that the Soviet Government, notwithstanding its promises, will be able to organize a fighting army, as the Kaiser insists upon Russia's disarmament.

The Pope and the Exchange of Prisoners

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

AT the annual meeting of the Federation of Catholic Societies, held in Kansas City last August, which was graced by the presence of twenty-five Archbishops and Bishops and by the Apostolic Delegate, a resolution was passed calling attention to the moral power for good exercised by Pope Benedict XV in accordance with the unbroken tradition of the Papacy. The occasion which gave rise to this beautiful expression of devotedness on the part of American Catholics to the Holy See was the publication, a few days earlier, of the Pope's peace proposals. The famous note to the heads of the belligerent nations was only one of the innumerable instances of the present Pontiff's efforts to end or mitigate the suffering of the war, and was selected for special comment because it was at the time in the thoughts of every intelligent man in the world, and also because it presented perhaps the most striking of the manifestations of Papal beneficence in recent times. In spite of the immense moral effect undoubtedly produced by the document, it failed, nevertheless, of immediate results. Another endeavor, however, not to end the war, but to alleviate its horrors, made a year and a half earlier, was entirely successful. A large number of prisoners of various nationalities, incapacitated by wounds or sickness for further military service, have returned to their own countries, exchanging the rigors of confinement in enemy lands for the comforts, however small, of their own homes. This exchange of prisoners, which is still taking place at intervals and will in all probability be continued to the end of the war, was brought about by the initiative and tact of the Holy See. American prisoners will doubtless be included in the arrangement, and is is well for our people to realize the source from which this great boon has come.

Early in the year 1915 the results of the diplomatic exertions of the Vatican in this regard were published by the Osservatore Romano, but it is only recently that the details of the negotiations which led up to the happy conclusion of the agreement were made known by the Civiltà Cattolica, the Jesuit periodical of Rome. The writer was given access to the original documents, now in the Vatican archives, and the facts are beyond question.

The first notification th t the Holy Father had set his hand to this work was given to the public by the Pope himself in his allocution of Christmas Eve, 1914. On that occasion he said that he regretted having failed to secure for the mothers and wives of the combatants the consolation of knowing that at least for the few hours consecrated to the memory of the Birth of the Prince of Peace the rain of shells on their loved ones should be halted. He had, however, he said, good reason to hope for the success of his efforts to arrange an exchange of prisoners incapacitated for further military service.

The ground of his hope, as we learn from the Civiltà Cattolica, was the fact that the Supreme Pontiff had already made tentative proposals for such an exchange to the Powers and had received in return definite assurances from Great Britain, Serbia and Turkey of their willingness to cooperate with him. Serbia sent a favorable reply on December 24 through L. Michailovitch, Serbian Minister at Cettinge; Turkey signified her approval on the same day through Mgr. Dolci, Delegate Apostolic at Constantinople. Great Britain had endorsed the plan two days earlier, being the first to respond to the wishes of the Holy Father.

England's answer was doubtless facilitated by the fact that the Government at London, ten days before, had made similar proposals to the German Government, without, however, having received any reply. The negotiations between the Holy See and Great Britain were carried on by Cardinal Gasquet and Sir Rennell Rood, British Ambassador at the Quirinal, for although the Pope had agreed, two weeks previously, to the British suggestion of the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of his Britannic Majesty to the Holy See, and Sir Henry Howard had been given the post on December 16, he did not arrive in Rome until December 23, and did not present his credential letters until December 30.

The other Powers were not long in announcing their assent. The date on which Germany agreed has not been published, but it was not later than December 29, for on that day the Papal Secretary of State sent a telegram to the Prussian Ministry thanking the Emperor for his kindly acceptance of the Pope's suggestions. By the same time the Vatican had already received, if not definite assurances, at least quasi-promises of approval of the proposed exchange from Austria-Hungary and Belgium. Neither France nor Russia had given any signs of acquiescing in the scheme, and the Ambassador of Great Britain at the Quirinal was urged by the Holy Father on December 29 to bring British influence to bear on these countries to persuade them to agree to the proposal.

France replied unfavorably to the proposition on December 30, President Poincaré forwarding the decision of the Council of Ministers through a distinguished French prelate. The reasons alleged for this disapproval were two: a similar scheme had already been proposed by Switzerland and rejected; and in addition Germany, which was believed to be in great need of officials, was thought to be eager for the opportunity to employ incapacitated soldiers and officers in non-combatant functions.

Notwithstanding the silence of Russia and the expressed refusal of France, the Holy Father on December 31, 1914, dispatched to their Majesties, the Sovereigns of Austria-Hungary, Belgium, Germany, Great Britain, Russia and Serbia, a formal proposal in the following identic telegram:

> Replying on the sentiments of Christian charity which animates your Majesty, we beg you to consent to end the present year and to begin the new with an act of supreme generosity by accepting Our proposal that the belligerent nations should exchange the prisoners who have become incapacitated for further military service.
> POPE BENEDICT XV.

As the Emperor of Turkey was not a Christian, the telegram sent to Méhméd V on the same day appealed to his sentiments of humanity.

Before the close of the following day, January 1, 1915, Great Britain, Germany, Austria-Hungary, Bavaria and Serbia had telegraphed their final formal acceptance of the proposed exchange, their answers being received in the order in which they are enumerated. George V, King of Great Britain; William II, Emperor of Germany; Francis Joseph, Emperor of Austria-Hungary, and Peter, King of Serbia, sent their replies personally to his Holiness. King Louis III did not reply personally, but the Bavarian Minister of Foreign Affairs instructed Baron von Ritter, Bavarian Minister at the Holy See, to inform the Cardinal Secretary of State of his Government's acceptance.

Favorable answers from the other belligerent nations followed in quick succession. On January 3, M. Sazonow, Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, bade the Russian Minister at the Holy See convey to the Papal Secretary of State the acceptance of his Majesty, the Emperor. Nicholas II addressed a personal communication to the same effect to the Holy Father on January 6. King Albert telegraphed his agreement to Cardinal Gasparri on January 5. On the same day Mgr. Dolci sent word that the Ottoman Government had accepted the proposal, and on January 9 the Sultan, Méhméd V, replied to the Pope in the same sense in a note signed with his own name.

France also fell into line. For on January 4 the Holy Father appealed once more to "the noble and generous French nation to follow the example of the other sovereigns of the belligerent nations, who had all accepted his proposal." France, in spite of former opposition, waived objections, and on January 5 manifested fullest agreement in a telegram sent by Raymond Poincaré, President of the French Republic. Nicholas, King of Montenegro, who had been approached on the subject on January 1, personally made known his acceptance to the Supreme Pontiff on January 13. On January 17, Yoshihito, Emperor of Japan, assured the Holy Father that he was in entire accord with the latter's desire to alleviate the evils of the war. He declared, however, that no Japanese prisoners were in the hands of Japan's enemies.

By the middle of January, therefore, in the year 1915, all difficulties had been swept away and all the belligerent nations were committed to the exchange of prisoners incapacitated for further military service. The Holy Father had succeeded where Great Britain and Switzerland had failed. The plan was soon reduced to action. Early in February, 450 French and German prisoners were exchanged through the agency of Switzerland and ninety British and German prisoners through the agency of Holland. Since that time the numbers have run up into many thousands. The whole course of the diplomatic negotiations, with their felicitous results, is clear evidence of the Pope's strict impartiality and lifts his ministrations in behalf of suffering humanity to a plane of Christian charity, strongly in contrast with the prevailing paroxysm of universal hate.

The Catholic Daily Paper

J. C. WALSH

THE frequently heard demand for a Catholic daily newspaper suggests that there are misconceptions of the part a newspaper plays. What people have at the back of their minds when they plead the need for such a paper is that it should be in some sense a pulpit, and with us the pulpit privilege, in matters which as Catholics we consider vital, is wisely reserved for those who are especially trained for its use. Even if it were practicable to attend to this part of the scheme, it would still be necessary to reckon with the more vital newspaper truth, that reading, like kissing, goes by favor. The fact that a hundred, or a dozen, people go to the same church on Sunday has very little influence upon the considerations by which they are guided when it comes to choosing their newspaper. There are some very shrewd and ingenious people always studying what they can put into their papers that will attract readers, and if one runs through the publications of a single day he will see what it is that experience proves to be interesting. Much of what he sees will make him gasp in wonderment, but what he will unavoidably conclude is that the daily newspaper in a large enough city is a reflex of some distinguishable collection of intellectual habits, each conforming, in some way not always easy to account for, to economic and cultural status. The publisher discovers his market and serves it with the same pabulum year after year. The Catholic Church being what it is, it would be beyond the wisdom of a cardinal archbishop to make a paper which would be acceptable, as a newspaper, to all the varieties of taste to be found among the two millions of Catholics in the New York area, almost all of whom would still resort to the mediums through which they had hitherto been provided with what they want.

The Christian Science people have, apparently, nevertheless succeeded. But have they? Theirs is very emphatically a class paper. It is constructed to suit a very highly specialized constituency. It so happens that the Christian Science organization is made up almost entirely of people of a fairly uniform order of mentality. They are about on a level in intellectual alertness, in social position, in cultural foundations. They even run close to a single political type. The Catholic Church is cosmopolitan. The only equality it knows is established in front of the communion-rail.

Anywhere outside a great city the task would be still more difficult, for of recent years the tendency has been to include the newspaper in the same class as public utilities, competition being possible only when combination is impossible. It is already true in many large cities that more than one morning newspaper is as impracticable as more than one water supply. The rule that applies here is that the paper prints only what may be supposed to interest everybody, and studiously avoids, correspondingly, printing what will only interest somebody. It is decided for us, with due regard for the amount of white paper available after the advertisers have been satiated, that we may take as much as we please of each course in a table d'hôte of sport, stock gambling, theatrical gossip, local politics and world news, with just enough savorless editorial comment to honor an ancient newspaper tradition. All that can be said in the positive about such survivals is that, like the appendix, they retain certain possibilities of inflammation. Such a paper, even in the hands of Catholics, could not be a Catholic newspaper. The best that could be hoped for would be that it would not be anti-Catholic, and in the main business considerations prevent it from being that, no matter in whose hands it is. It used to be that no community thought itself well served which had not a paper intended to advance the fortunes of each of the great political parties, but the progress of standardizing and stereotyping has now reached a point where the advertiser dictates the publication of one paper in his own interest and refuses to support two in the interest of the rival political parties.

A Catholic daily, therefore, if one were desirable, would have to take only such part of the field, if printed in a large city, as it could get away from other papers catering to the prevailing tastes in different orders of society. If its influence were to be extended to other parts of the continent, where a local Catholic daily would be an economic impossibility, some single feature would have to be the attraction, for the news would be old before it reached the reader, and yesterday's news is deader than last year's leaves. Moreover, daily-newspaper advertising has a local appeal and sets no store by extra-territorial privilege.

At first sight, no doubt, the position looks rather hopeless, but it is so only in the sense that the position looked hopeless for the little shops when they saw the department stores taking all the neighborhood business. The present-day complement of the department store is the little shop that specializes, that has something to offer whose attractiveness has an appeal above the drab level of the bargain-counter. These little shops are able, in many cases, to add to their local sales a volume of business attracted from all parts of the continent by convincing advertisement. Similarly, if there is a printed message for which the daily paper has no place, the thing to do is to give it all the excellence it will carry and then spread it as far abroad as the demand exists. The more the newspaper becomes negative from interest, the more those whose minds have a positive quality must look elsewhere for satisfaction. Only, as the complement to a big daily paper cannot be a little daily paper, for the very reason that distance of carriage is destructive of the vital feature of the daily, the news of the day, the choice is between the daily publication of something which is not a newspaper and the less frequent issue of a paper which may carry its positive message with increased authority.

There is some room for the question, also, whether the efficacy of the daily press, even at its best, as a formative influence upon public opinion, is not mis-rated. The newspaper affirms opinion, recognizes and voices existing opinion, rather than forms opinion. In all of us there are citadels of conviction, or of prejudice, against which the leader writers may thunder in vain. It is when we see our own views properly set forth that we are convinced opinion is being formed, wholly forgetful that the other reader may be impervious, if not actually contemptuous. Who has not noticed that a newspaper of apparently immense influence in local affairs might be utterly without influence in national controversies, its audience being exactly the same?

True, the journal which most nearly reflects the fundamental opinions of its readers is in the best position to guide its readers in circumstances that call for leading. But its ability to guide and the readiness of its readers to be led will be in the measure in which a unity of thought and understanding has been established between them. Where that unity and understanding have been established, where there is a well-defined common purpose, an obligation devolves upon the reader of which few, in these careless times, are even conscious. Probably those who are showing an interest in the possibility of a Catholic daily do begin to sense it.

Catholics at Oxford

CHARLES D. PLATER, S.J.

THE soul of Oxford has "suffered a [war] change into something rich and strange." Rich, indeed, it has proved, gloriously rich. Some had thought that the 3,000 gilded youths who loitered in its cloisters or played upon its lawns did not represent the grit of the nation. Now, as they scan the war-rolls or read the letters of young Oxford from the front, they know better. The Oxford of four years ago is all in khaki, and much of its best lies sleeping under the soil of France.

But what of the place today, the deserted mother of countless brave sons? Well, she is not altogether deserted, for many new sons have come to her. Of undergraduates, indeed, she has but 300 instead of 3,000, and these are mostly the very young. A few have already come back to her crippled from the war. Nor must we forget the women students whose presence has enabled us to carry on bravely with our lectures and examinations. But besides these, there are newcomers to the "enchanted city" who fill the colleges and playing fields with a stream of young life, "rich and strange." These are the cadets, infantry and flying men, who come for a course of instruction before getting the King's commission. From every part of the Empire they come, and from America. There are Catholics, of course, among them, and these find a swift and intimate bond in their common Faith. They make a brave show in the church at their own Sunday Mass, and they gather daily at the Catholic Cadets' Club, where many friendships are made. Other newcomers are the wounded soldiers, officers and men, who fill the Town Hall, the Examination Schools, two colleges, and other public buildings. If the cadets are cheerful, the wounded seem more cheerful still. Their loose blue clothes and red ties light up the old grey buildings, and knots of them are to be found everywhere of an afternoon. The Catholics among them have their own Mass daily at the Base Hospital, as well as occasional week-end retreats at a country house nearby. There is one Catholic institution which all Oxford loves, and that is Jimmy, the Jesuit bulldog, who "does his bit" daily by pulling one or other of the crippled soldiers round the town in a wheeled chair. Jimmy's brindle coat is as matchless as his pedigree, and he is constantly being borrowed by the men "to be photographed with."

And so we "carry on" with cadets and wounded and the girl students and the handful of undergraduates and the depleted staff. What the future of Oxford will be, with its thousand years of tradition, who shall say? But some of us who live under the shadow of its spires and watch the signs of the times and wait for the return of the tide, think that the Oxford of "after the war" will not be unworthy of its great past. It will be more closely linked up with the national life and it will be more in tune with the great traditions of its founders.

The Catholic spirit has always lurked in Oxford, however much overlaid by Erastianism. The University clung tenaciously to the old Faith and could not utterly forget the days of Roger Bacon and Adam Marsh. A thousand links have ever bound it to its Catholic glories. The very names of the colleges, "Corpus Christi," for instance, and "All Souls," the provisions of its statutes, the Latin grace at dinner, the numerous statues of Our Lady, the survivals of pious customs: all these mark off Oxford from the English Universities which have no such roots in pre-Reformation soil. And those who live in Oxford feel that all these things are not merely curious survivals of a dead past, but point to a vital and inspiring element of university life today.

"I welcome the Benedictines back to Oxford," said a Vice-Chancellor over twenty years ago, when matriculating the first batch of students from the newly founded Benedictine house of studies. No less cordial was the welcome given to another Religious Order, which, though it lacked pre-Reformation links with Oxford, had drawn many of its sons from the University since the days of Queen Elizabeth. The first Master of the Jesuit hall, Richard Clarke, was himself an Oxford man, and, like his patron, Edmund Campion, had been a Fellow of St. John's College. The Jesuit hall today stands upon St. John's ground, and in it are kept two souvenirs of St. John's men: the oar with which Richard Clarke rowed against Cambridge in his undergraduate days and the rope which bound Edmund Campion to the hurdle when he was dragged at the horse's heels to Tyburn to be hanged.

Jesuits and Benedictines were followed by Franciscans, whose return to Oxford recalled some of the most brilliant pages of medieval history. Later came a fourth Catholic house of studies, this time for the secular clergy of the diocese of Birmingham. And meanwhile the Holy Child Sisters had established a center for Catholic women students, clerical and lay; and the Catholic laymen, shepherded by their own chaplain, were increasing in numbers and influence. So, very quietly, returned the tide of Catholic life to Oxford during the twenty years before the war.

What has happened since the blow fell? Oxford had been watching the new arrivals. The "dons" had noted the brilliant successes achieved by the young religious in the honors examinations and in the scholarships. The University lecturers welcomed such keen auditors: the tutors commended their intelligence and zest. The authorities went out of their way to show that they regarded the return of Catholics to Oxford, not as an aggressive incursion of aliens, but as a very fitting restoration of old and honorable links. Since war broke out the University has conferred an honorary M.A. upon Father Cuthbert, the distinguished Franciscan; it has set up a tablet in honor of Roger Bacon and confided it to the care of the friars; it has invited a Jesuit, Father Martindale, to lecture on the classics, and most significant of all, it has recently introduced, quite spontaneously, new legislation with the object of giving permanence to and improving the status of the Catholic halls.

Oxford, in fact, is obviously glad that the Catholic point of view in theology, in philosophy, in social science and in history should be put forward frankly and fearlessly. Indeed, it is largely in response to requests from leading University teachers that the Catholic halls have recently begun to organize lectures and conferences on Catholic subjects. They have rented a charming thirteenth-century building, formerly a chapel, and in the heart of the city, and installed there the beginnings of a Catholic reference library and reading room. There, too, nearly a hundred lectures have been given during the past two years, and, considering the depleted state of the University, they have been well attended. As an indication of the range of subjects treated we may mention "Newman" (Father Rickaby, S.J.); "The Benedictine Order" (Dom Anselm Parker, O.S.B.); "Medieval Oxford" (Father Cuthbert, O.S.F.C.); "The Law of Nations" (F. F. Urquhart); "Christian Science" (Father Thurston, S.J.); "Theosophy" (Father Martindale, S.J.), and "Elizabethan Drama" (Miss Mary Segar). We confidently anticipate a great extension of this enterprise after the war: the creation, in fact, of a well-staffed Catholic institute, drawing on the best Catholic talent in the country, attracting lecturers from abroad and making provision for research students from other lands. The flourishing Oxford branch of the Catholic Social Guild, too, with its Schools Examination Board, suggests the formation of a regular Catholic faculty of social studies.

Those at Oxford—and they are many—who are trying to bring the University into closer touch with public life and to extend its influence among working-class educational bodies, naturally turn to their Catholic colleagues for aid. They feel increasingly the massive strength of the Catholic tradition and they recognize how much of the modern working-class movement is but an instinctive reaching out after those ideals of human dignity and human liberty which the Church has persistently upheld. Thus, while Catholics have much to learn from Oxford, Oxford is glad to find inspiration in the ideals of that Catholicism which it has welcomed so cordially.

The Anti-Catholic Trend of the Prohibition Movement

FOR the past two years, anti-Catholic forces have set up their citadel in Maryland, lavishing alike their funds and their venom on the Catholic Church. Unmindful or ignorant of the fact that Catholic Maryland gave to America its first taste of religious liberty, these bigots have established headquarters in the city of Baltimore, whence is issued a paper that vies with the Menace for indecency and for its venomous attacks upon the Catholic Church. Each issue is full of malice, and advertises lewd books and cartoons. The band of fanatics at the head of this anti-Catholic movement, if not in the actual employ of the Methodist Episcopal Church, at least are aided and abetted by that institution. Meetings and initiations have been held in the Methodist churches of Baltimore, and, on the eve of a recent election, an "anti-Catholic parade" was planned for the city.

Men were candidates for the Legislature and were elected, as was Governor Catts of Florida, on an anti-Catholic platform, making their campaign exclusively on the issue of intolerance. At least sixteen members of the House of Delegates of Maryland owe their election to this issue, and the State is now reaping the fruit of the seed sown by the Methodist Episcopal Church. So many anti-Catholic measures are before the Legislature of Maryland, that it would be idle to recount them. The first measure brought out was the amendment to the Constitution, providing for nation-wide prohibition, and this was speedily followed, as has been the case in other States under similar circumstances, by bills providing for the reading of the Bible in public schools, cutting off all revenue from Catholic institutions, practically legislating such recognized institutions as the House of the Good Shepherd and the various orphan asylums and industrial schools, out of existence.

When it seemed clear that the National Prohibition amendment was in danger of being ratified, Cardinal Gibbons sent out the alarm, in a statement issued on February 6, pointing out the dangers of the amendment, as well as its folly, and asking for sane consideration of so important a question. The following day, the Maryland Legislature passed the bill, ratifying the National Prohibition amendment, as a slap at the Cardinal and as a call to arms, for those behind the anti-Catholic measures. A statement from Cardinal Gibbons, to the people of Maryland, is always received with the respect and consideration it deserves, and would have a telling effect with the people at the polls. Those behind the Prohibition movement realized this, and dared not trust the question to a vote of the residents of that State. So they railroaded their bill through with the aid of an anti-Catholic legislature.

The Prohibition amendment out of the way, the spirit of intolerance broke out in new channels. One after another the anti-Catholic bills were brought up for discussion. One of the first measures to be shown in the light of day was the so-called Bible-reading bill. Intoxicated with the success of the Prohibition measure, George Waldron, national organizer for the Methodist intolerants, appeared at the State House of Maryland to plead for his bill. But instead of discussing the measure, he delivered a bitter attack on the Catholic Church, referring to the venerable Cardinal repeatedly, leaving less than ten minutes of his time for a discussion of the measure before the House. Waldron had carefully planned his attack upon the Church, and had packed the house with his followers, two car-loads of people coming from Baltimore, to be ready with the applause at the given signal. Without exception, the newspapers of Baltimore excoriated Waldron for his action, and declared that it was high time that the decent Protestants of the State rise as one and crush the intolerance before it had brought more shame to the State. But the Methodist organization, overjoyed at its success in obtaining the floor of the House for its harangue, proceeded to print the unprintable attack on the Catholics, and to advertise its sale throughout Methodist circles.

Waldron had made the statement that he expects "the streets of Baltimore to run with blood," after the National Prohibition amendment is in force, "and the Catholics cannot have wine for this Mass-business." He has also declared that the organization of which he is a leading light "has powerful influences at work," to prevent the shipment of wine to the front, or in or near the army or navy training stations, so that the Catholic chaplains may not celebrate Mass. It is interesting to note in this connection that the Methodists have sent a Methodist preacher, an Anti-Saloon League employee, to "investigate" conditions abroad, in order to stop, if possible, shipments of wine "for any purpose whatever."

Any one who is at all in doubt of the anti-Catholic tendencies of the Prohibition movement need but remember that the Anti-Saloon League is a Methodist Church institution, its head a Methodist bishop. The anti-Catholic forces in Baltimore were organized in the Methodist Episcopal churches of that city, and in New York State the same forces are at work, again with a Methodist bishop at the helm, Bishop Burt, a former resident European bishop for the Methodist Episcopal Church. The Maryland bigots are publishing cartoons showing priests and dignitaries of the Catholic Church tapping whiskey barrels and drinking to "Politics and Religion" and "Rum and Temperance." The readers of the paper are told that the Pope, the Cardinals, the priests, and the devil are against Prohibition, so the Methodists are determined to make this a bone-dry nation!

William H. Anderson, State Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League of New York, is a member of the Board of Temperance of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which publishes the Voice, a Prohibition paper of Washington, D. C. A recent issue of the journal boasts of the fact "the Methodists had a substantial lead in the House of Representatives," and prints a list showing the religion of the members of the Senate, the claim being made that the Senate is 12.48 per cent Methodist and 3.12 per cent Catholic! The paper says that "The Roman Catholics have established outstanding institutions which make them, today, by far the most prominent and influential Church in the city," so the Voice is raising funds to build a mammoth Methodist structure to face the Senate buildings, and Methodists are called upon to subscribe to this building, as a "thank offering" for the National Prohibition amendment having been passed by the present Congress!

While the Methodists are thus publicly lining up the United States Senate and House of Representatives, on a religious basis, they call loudly for the heads of Catholics in office. The Maryland branch is at present deeply concerned because a Catholic is at the head of Red Cross work in Italy, even though he is a descendant of the illustrious Charles Carroll of Carrollton, Maryland's signer of the Declaration of Independence. For Captain John Carroll of Carrollton, working in Italy for the Red Cross, is one of the founders of the American Ambulance Corps in Paris, and has a son in the navy.

The lesson from Maryland is a call to Catholics everywhere to keep a keen eye on the Methodist Church, the Anti-Saloon League, and the Prohibition measure. They represent a trinity of tyranny and the Prohibition amendment once out of the way the allied anti-Catholic measures quickly see the light of day. This was the case in Maryland, as in every State where the Methodists have gained control.

Springtime on Staten Island

B. J. Reilly

NO spring was ever more welcome than this one. We were all glad to bid good-by to the long winter. Down here on Staten Island, as in other parts of the country, it was one cold day after another. Raritan Bay, five miles wide, was frozen over for the first time in ever so many years.

Of course, every season has its charm. Winter in the country is delightful even if it seems a little long. Burroughs complains that the snow-covered fields are somewhat monotonous. The landscape, he thinks, does not show so well as when the fields are visible. That may be so, but still long stretches of snow-covered fields reflecting the noon-day sunshine are not without a beauty of their own. A walk through such fields is not only invigorating but entrancing. The teeming life of the springtime is wanting, but there are things to engage one's attention.

The much-maligned crows were with us all winter. Their caw-caws may not be musical, but they have a friendly ring in the winter air. They sound like a loud guffaw, as if the crows were having a laugh at some one. Chapman insists that they are not so harmful as they are made to appear. He admits that they do damage in the cornfield, but he quotes Dr. Merriam of the Department of Agriculture who examined 900 crows' stomachs, as saying that the amount of good done by the crow in destroying grasshoppers, May beetles, cut-worms and other injurious insects, exceeds the loss caused by the destruction of corn. The crow, therefore, is not so black as he is painted.

The starlings too have been with us all winter. Their chirping in the eaves of the house was a merry sound. During the cold days of winter, the starling has a puffy look, like birds at nightfall on their perches. This puffing out of their feathers is a protection against the wintry blasts. Just as soon as the days grow warmer, the starling assumes its ordinary figure and looks a smaller and more metallic-colored bird.

If one is so fortunate as to live near the water, then there are other engaging sights in the winter. The grebe, or hell-diver as it is called, has wonderful aquatic ability. When you approach near, it will take a header and remain under the water so long that you begin to fear it will be drowned. After a rather long swim, it will reappear perhaps a hundred feet away from its diving point. The graceful gulls are in evidence all along the shore. These scavengers of the sea assembling along our bays in such great numbers give a touch of life and beauty to the winter landscape, as they circle so gracefully over the water.

The first birds I noticed early in March were three killdees, two males and a female. I think I saw them coming from the South-land. I noticed them first soaring through the air, and that same day I discovered them on the edge of a cow-pond nearby. I like to believe they were the same birds. Friends reported that they had seen robins the first week of March, but it was not until the second week that I saw them. I came upon a dozen of them towards evening in an old orchard. They are always a welcome sight as the harbingers of spring. A few days later I saw a red-winged black-bird perched on the topmost branch of a tree. One could not see, but one could easily distinguish the melodious notes of the song-sparrow about the same time. Then a blue-bird, that famous forerunner of spring, swam into our ken.

There are, I believe, 13,000 species of birds, 1,200 of which are in the United States, but unfortunately they don't all make their habitat Staten Island. Dostoevesky, the Russian novelist, says that "little birds are the finest things in the world." They surely are wonderful little creatures. How do they find their way back to us in the springtime? They go as far away as South America, some even to the shores of Patagonia, and yet when the spring returns these little feathered prodigies come back to the same nest in the north they vacated in their fall migration.

While the birds were coming to remind us that winter was disappearing, there were other welcome signs of spring. The winter rye was bravely growing and its green gave the first color of spring to the fields. The pussy-willows were gathered from the meadows and the skunk-cabbage made its appearance. Then a warm day came along and it was wonderful to see how quickly the grass sprouted and the dim-colored fields took on a faint greenish tinge. The buds on the red maple-trees and the catkins on the poplars came next. Then one heard the peeping of the frogs.

> In the spring a fuller crimson comes upon the robin's breast,
> In the spring the wanton lapwing gets himself another crest,
> In the spring a livelier iris changes on the burnished dove,
> In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.

Toward the middle of April, old winter took a look-in again. Scurries of snow swept over the earth, covering the newly-ploughed fields and the green grass. All signs of spring disappeared. The singing of the birds ceased and the "peeping" of the frogs was no longer heard in the land. Then amateur gardeners and "farmerettes" who had planted early to get ahead of their friends and neighbors were in a state of great worry lest the unexpected snow and frost would ruin their germinating plants. April is ever a creature of moods and not to be too much trusted. It is a splendid month for the poet and the naturalist, but an anxious one for the Hooverites who have been preparing, book in hand, all during the winter, for early April planting. A soft rain followed by sunshine finally melted the snow and the birds began to sing and all nature revived immediately. Tulips shone in the gardens. The buds on the horse-chestnut trees burst into life; the trees were covered with a feathery green; the magnolias and lilacs blossomed in the gardens; the wild violets appeared in the woods; butterflies flew about, and each day brought a new indication of the springtime. Then May came and with it more birds from their homes in the South. Scarlet tanagers, orioles, warblers, flickers, flycatchers, finches, swallows, cowbirds, catbirds, woodpeckers, wrens and many other species of birds came prepared for mating and nest-building.

Longfellow, in the prelude of "Voices of the Night," says:

> Therefore, at Pentecost, which brings
> The spring, clothed like a bride,
> When nestling buds unfold their wings,
> And bishop's-caps have golden rings,
> Musing upon many things,
> I sought the woodlands wide.

The woodland's wide invite all at this season of the year. There are few pleasanter things than a stroll through the woods in springtime. The fresh grass, the little growing things all about, the nesting birds, the pleasant odors, the branches of the trees swaying in the breeze, the leaves "clapping their hands," all conspire to make our quiet stroll restful and satisfying. The evenings are interesting. If one is so fortunate as to live near a pond or lake on the edge of the woods he will find the teeming life a never-failing source of pleasure. The soft cooing and calling of the birds, the occasional flashes of bright wings, the hum of insects, the croaking of frogs, the darting of fish through the water, the scurrying of jack-rabbits in the bushes, the cry of a screech owl, or the repeated call of the whip-poor-will and all the other wondrous sights and sounds will fill the listener's soul with ecstasy. The springtime with all its marvelous beauty has come again.

Books for the Camps

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I have been interested in reading Dr. Walsh's article on "Books for the Camps" in AMERICA for May 4, and we are concerned that Dr. Walsh should be alarmed lest unworthy and unwholesome books reach our men in the camps. Please let me say that we are doing our best to guarantee against such an unfortunate situation. The books are well looked over before being sent out, and it is certainly our intention to weed out all books of a vicious, sensuous, or otherwise objectionable nature. We should be sorry to have a man of Dr. Walsh's prominence and interest in education gather that we were neglecting such an important measure.

The Irish Death-Rate

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A correspondent in AMERICA, May 11, commenting on an article of mine on the Irish death-rate in the United States thought that the excessive death-rate among the Irish may be due to age rather than to nationality. He is of the opinion that the Irish immigrants considered in my statistics have "on the average a much higher age than the Jews and Italians"; secondly that "the New York Irish are mainly a remnant of the long ago," while the Jews and Italians are for the most part recent in arrival.

Both these conjectures are erroneous. The Irish considered in my article were not of Irish descent; they were all born in Ireland. The Irish immigrants are not older than the Jews and Italians that come in, but of all ages. The statistics I used were what are technically called standardized death-rates, not crude death-rates. The death-rates for all ages were combined—under one year, from one to five years, from five to twenty-four years, and so on, and adjusted to the various nationalities.

New cities of the Northwest have a much lower death-rate than the old cities of the East if we take the crude rates, because the new cities are made up of younger men and women relatively. When a "boom" town is trying to prove that it is remarkably "healthy" it uses crude statistics; if these numbers are standardized the new towns are often much more dangerous to live in than the old-established communities. No one uses these crude rates now except real-estate dealers who are trying to get rid of swamps, railway press-agents, and similar jugglers. The crude death-rate of New South Wales in 1909 was 9.85 per 1,000, but the standardized rate was 13.44.

The rate among the Austrians and Hungarians in New York City is three times less than the rate in Austria-Hungary, owing probably to the large percentage of Jews among the Austro-Hungarians in New York. The Jews have a very low death-rate. The death-rate among the Italians in New York is 40 per cent lower than that of Italians in Italy. The rate among the Russians in New York is only a little over a fifth of what it is in Russia. The rates of the English and Welsh in New York, however, are almost 19, but at home their rates are only a little over 13. The death-rate of the Irish and Germans is double that in Ireland and Germany.

The crude death-rate of the Irish in New York is, males 31.6; females, 25.5; but when standardized it falls to 19 for the males and 14.2 for the females. These numbers 19 and 14.2 are much higher than those of any other nationality, whatever the explanation may be. So far the southern European races do better as far as longevity is considered in New York than they do in their native countries; the northern races do worse, and the Irish the worst of all. The Jewish children herded in the tenements of the East Side in New York City have a death-rate between 36 and 38 per cent lower than that of infants from native parents in all parts of the city. The avoidance of motherhood by the American and German mothers is one of the chief causes of this rate. The euphemism "premature birth" covers abortions, and there are fewer deaths from premature birth among the Irish and the Russian Jews than among all the other nationalities. There are twice as many deaths from premature birth among the children of native mothers as among the Italian women's infants. Prematurity among infants of German parents is the cause given for death in more than 40 per cent of cases beyond the rate for infants of all other nationalities combined. The German rate here is 238 per 10,000 births as against 159 for all nationalities combined.

Attacking False Gods

To the Editor of AMERICA:

We Catholics who are eager to have the Church of God bring mankind under her gentle sway are dismayed to see wave after wave of bigotry sweep over the land. We know too that this hatred of the Catholic Church is fostered through the great secular newspapers and other periodicals. Were it not for the preaching of anti-Catholic gospel in news items, editorials and stories, the Menace and papers of a similar ilk would do little harm.

Many laudable means have been suggested to counteract this bigotry. Catholic papers, periodicals and truth societies have sprung into existence. Anti-Catholic writers have been answered in the public press. Catholic-defense societies have been formed, and these societies are being federated. At present there is a universal desire for a Catholic press. I have noted that some Catholics have written private letters to editors with very satisfactory results.

I wish to suggest a means of counteracting the evil, which I know has been used before, but not to the extent to which it might be. It would seem that the old axiom, "Prevention is better than cure," should provide a strong incentive to grappling with calumny and lying at the fountain-heads. Vigorous denunciation or condemnation of men as bigots through our Catholic press or the public press will not accomplish all. In fact our denunciations are apt to make them more vindictive and reckless in their writings. The little experience which I have had has proven to me that the quiet method of dealing with anti-Catholic writers by personal interviews is very satisfactory.

In the city near which I am located I have gone to some of these anti-Catholic editors and contributors, and talked to them with calmness and without bitterness. In spite of their public profession of hatred of clericalism, I have found them very courteous and they respectfully addressed me as "Father." My second step was to point out to them that I credited them with sincerity and presumed that they desired to be fair. Proceeding without bitterness I explained the position of the Church or Catholic doctrine on the points discussed, dropping here and there a quotation from the words of Our Lord, and suggesting to them some good Catholic author. I reasoned with them and answered their questions, even the most absurd, with seriousness. The net result of these interviews was that at least for a while their pens were not so busy in the anti-Catholic tirade. Needless to say, if we are to cope with bigotry we need the tact of St. Paul. In the temple at Athens he did not attack the false gods, but directed the attention of those present to the unknown God, the true God.

These writers are the teachers of the people, their philosophers, theologians and oracles. The unthinking mass follow them and are swayed by them. Much good can be accomplished by preaching the Gospel of Christ to these men individually. Work among them might have results equivalent of the work of a director of a seminary. I have adopted these writers in my locality in my new seminary of theology. I do not at present expect to transform them into Apostles, but at least I hope to keep them as far as possible within the bounds of truth.

It seems to me that if this method were adopted in every city, if one or two priests in the smaller cities and more in the larger cities, would devote themselves to this work, there would be launched a continental mission of great magnitude. It might be well, however, that any priest who undertakes such apostolic work should prepare himself by prayer and study. It is no small task to preach the Gospel of Christ to these teachers of men, and only he who studies and is fortified with God's help can hope for success. Any one who goes into this work will be surprised to find that beneath the great mass of bigotry, heresy and hatred, the very men who are piling it up are often seeking for the truth. In the awful confusion of their surroundings they do not know where to find it. When we approach them in their frenzied state we should be extremely charitable and patient in dealing with them.

Leadership and Publicity

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Dr. Muttkowski's article on "Leadership and Publicity" is very telling and no doubt expresses a very general sentiment. However, I should like to read a further article on the subject tracing the cause of the apathy and lack of organization on the part of Catholics with regard to the promotion of the Catholic press. If the cause can be determined perhaps the apathy can be removed and the organization be brought about. Let the ax be laid to the root.

Some "Preciosities" of Literature

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A few words are overworked nowadays. I had them listed in a notebook which I lost, so I must confine my complaint to the case of the three words "and," "book" and "quality." Outside the Bible I hate to see a paragraph beginning with "and." It gives the impression of candy with your beefsteak. One could bow before the authority of an Arnold or a Pater in the extremely rare cases in which they start their paragraphs with a sugary "and;" but it is ridiculous for amateur scribblers to affect the languid pose of those Olympians. Possibly there is another influence urging to the overwork of this abused conjunction. It may, perhaps, come from the Bible. Webster is authority for the statement that translators of the Protestant Bible started the bad habit of lopping off the final "s" from the good old Anglo-Saxon word "towards." You can tell that Mrs. Humphry Ward is not an American from the brazen way in which she calls one of her latest works "Towards the Goal" not "Toward the Goal." If there be any other reason than blatant and unctuous New Englandism for curtailing the word, the present deponent does not know it. The word "and" at the beginning of a paragraph may, for all I know, sound similarly devout in the ears of the elect, like that pious word "Mesopotamia."

As to the word "Book," I verily believe that Charles Lamb, if he were alive today, would enlarge his list of "Biblia-a-Biblia"—books that are not books. If I were a publisher bringing out one of George Eliot's novels divided into three or four "books," and if the man I hired to praise it for me presumed to call the whole thing "an epoch-making book" or "a book of rare charm," or a "sincere" or "veracious" or "daring" book or any other kind of "book," I would simply blue-pencil the "Book" part of the shop-soiled advertisement and make the writer call it what it is, a novel. If he dared to call a three-volume novel "a book," when there are at least three books in it in one sense and five or six books (Book 1, Book 2, Book 3, etc.) plainly marked by the author, in another, I would amend his copy without compunction. What is to be done to a man who refers to a sixteen-volume encyclopedia as "a book"? He ought to be condemned to bind the whole sixteen into one volume, just to teach him that straightforward English is better than ungainly aping of the fads of the coteries. And that is exactly what the advertising agents who write so much of our "criticism" are doing; they simply affect the mannerisms of the Paters and the Jameses and the Arnolds. There are six books of Euclid, to say the least of it, and ten or twelve of Milton's "Paradise Lost." Of the latter there are at least seven, to my certain knowledge; I "did" that many at school, and no more because I hadn't to. Let no man tell me Euclid or "Paradise Lost" is "a book." Why will men keep on saying "book," when they mean "volume" or "work" or "story" or "novel" or "poem" or "play?" Just because it sounds literary and highbrow. And like all cheap jewelry, it is a misfit and dear at the price.

Turn we now to higher game. Sing, Ye Muses, of the woes of the much-abused word "quality." If on a desert island I found a stray page of print and it had the word "quality" five or six times, I would at once ejaculate: "H. G. Wells or I'm a bad guesser!" Mr. Wells is writing too much and too fast, and that tempts him to altogether unreasonable exploitation of this particular bit of literary candy. There is, of course, a legitimate use of the word to suggest certain elusive flavors, certain delicate tones and fine shades of things; but when a man brazenly talks about the "feminine quality" or the "irritating quality" of his puppets, he indulges his depraved liking for mere jingle. I leave it to anyone to say if Wells and his school of literary "scientists" are not liable to the charge of curveting and caracoling and prancing round on a broken-winded, spavined, spindly, old Rosinante of a word like "quality." The poor old jade should be turned out to grass till she recuperates sufficiently to bear up under any kind of burden of intelligible meaning.

The Sign of the Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In an exposition of Christianity made some centuries ago by Jesuits for the missions in China, I lighted on the expression, "Sign of the cross and other prayers." This appears to imply the proper invocation with the sign of the Cross, "In nomine Patris, et Filii, et Spiritus Sancti. Amen." Considering the great antiquity of that sign and its coincident Trinitarian formula so distinctly brought out, I have wondered whether Christian archeology, or theology, ever applied the point in connection with the Greek Filioque schism? For I suppose the sign and its Trinitarian comprehension long antedate that schism. Unless it be straining mere fancy in support of serious argument, one would think the matter positively corroborative of the Catholic doctrine of "procession"; Christ crucified being here so inseparably conjoined with God the Father and God the Holy Ghost as an indivisible unit, yet of personal mediation, apart from them, while on the Cross. But at least the whole and undivided Trinity is implied in the sign and its accompanying terms, leaving no ground of implication for some restricted "procession" in the Greek sense. Pardon the presumption if this merely laic notion is void of substance.

The Distinctively Catholic American Anniversary

To the Editor of AMERICA:

One of the encouraging signs of the times is the constantly increasing interest in the preservation of the records of our Catholic American history. An instance is the following question recently sent to the editor of "Records and Studies," the official publication of the United States Catholic Historical Society:

> What is the distinctively Catholic anniversary, date of month and year, in American history? Let me explain: I am gathering data on American anniversaries, to be published shortly. There should be a Catholic event having to do with the United States, or with the colonies, aside from the discovery, an event about which there can be no controversy, and which is accepted by all citizens, including Protestants and all non-Catholics. Can you tell me this? I would accept your judgment, for, of course, these things often are matters of individual taste.
> The event should be one that stands out, and from which great Catholic development followed. I have in mind such events as the consecration of the first Catholic Bishop in the United States, or the consecration of the first Catholic church in the American colonies. These dates would bear more concretely upon the Catholic Church organization than the early missionary dates, which, perhaps, would be regarded as fugitive events.

In answer to this query the inquirer was told:

> A survey of the records seems to indicate that March 25, 1634 is the date you desire. On that day Father Andrew White, S.J., celebrated the first Mass, on St. Clement's Island in the Potomac, and the Maryland Colony was founded. From this event and this date follow in unbroken sequence: public worship; religious toleration; the first native-born priests and the first native-born religious, men and women; the Hierarchy; Catholic education, the first schools and first college; the first civic organization, St. Mary's City.
> No other event having to do with the United States shows such development, religious, social and political as this.

Perhaps there may be other opinions among AMERICA's readers on this subject.

A Catholic Chapel at Annapolis

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A Catholic chapel at Annapolis, built by the Government on Government property with a Catholic chaplain appointed and commissioned by the Government; this is the just proposal of Mr. McWilliams. It is the ardent desire of many who are interested in the cadets, as is shown by the beautiful letter of the mother of one of our midshipmen. Before calling on the Knights of Columbus, who are overburdened as it is, why not ask the Government to do this work? It has not been ungenerous in the past.

To the relatives and friends of the "middies" I propose the following: (1) Unite for concerted action. This meeting can be arranged by several of the cadets inviting their parents to visit them at the same time. (2) Seek the approbation and blessing of Cardinal Gibbons. (3) Write to Congressmen asking that prompt action be taken. (4) Start an endless chain of letters asking friends to write to their Representatives.

Forward, with the Maid!

FRENCH veterans from many a glorious battlefield, French mothers and maids gathered a few days ago in Orléans to celebrate the anniversary of the day when Joan of Arc wrested that fair city on the Loire from the grasp of its foes. The old medieval town into which the Maid of France rode in triumph with her captains and men-at-arms and her chaplains singing their Te Deums, has never forgotten her deliverer. Year after year the arches of the Cathedral of Orléans have re-echoed her praises, and the most eloquent voices in a land of eloquent men have told the descendants of the burghers who welcomed her as an angel of deliverance of the tragedy and the triumph of the Maid of Domrémy. Never since the hour when the victorious heroine of Beaugency and Patay flashed like the vision of some pure and dauntless archangel through their gates was Joan the Maid so near them as now. For every French heart knows and feels that the Virgin Warrior of the Tourelles and Reims is fighting with them and leading their hosts to victory. The men of the Argonne and Roclincourt, of les Eparges and the Aisne, the heroes who are holding the line before Amiens and the bloody slopes of Mount Kemmel, know that she has been with them on the field and in the trench, to guide them to victory, to cheer them in defeat, ever to lead them on the sacred path of honor and duty.

In her heart the Maid of France wore the lily of purity, whiter than the snowy fleece of the lambs she tended in pastoral Lorraine. In her hand she bore the sword of knighthood as she dashed to the onset, more reckless of danger than D'Alencon, or Dunois, or battle-scarred La Hire, who galloped at her side. On her virgin brow rests the crown of martydom forged in the fires of Rouen. Virgin, warrior, martyr! The world can give her no fairer title, the Church of God no nobler name. The men of France, the soldiers of America can have no greater inspiration than the epic of her martial story. She teaches that the battle is to the clean and the pure, that the pure are the strong, that victory cannot be won without suffering, that those who would be faithful to duty, to country and to God must, by some mysterious decree, be purified by suffering, and tried as by fire. Joan the Warrior Maid, passed through the fiery furnace of tribulation after she had felt the thrill of victory. She was as dauntless in her awful agony as she was resistless on the field of glory where her banner had gleamed in the forefront of the fray. Yet we love her more amid the billowing flames of Rouen than in the midst of the coronation glorious and the jubilant anthems of Reims.

While her countrymen were singing her praises at Orléans a few days ago, the children of New York were crowning her statue on Riverside Drive with flowers. They were laying the homage of the great Republic of the West at her feet. For the Maid of Domremy, they know, represents the ideals for which their fathers and their brothers are now fighting with her countrymen. As they looked up to the Virgin of Arc, sturdily yet gracefully poised on her charger, her sword drawn in her superb gesture of leadership and command, their hearts prayed that she might go with those they love to fight for them for the liberty of the world. From her pedestal the Maid sees a ceaseless tide of humanity passing at her feet. Before her stretches the fair river whose waters, as they broaden into the ocean, bear the ships that are carrying the soldiers of the New World to help in the redemption of the Old. As with the passing throng we see the image of the Blessed Maid poised there, harnessed for the battle task, we dream at times that horse and warrior have sprung to life again, leaped from the pedestal and are riding through the fields of France in the vanguard of the fight for justice and freedom. It is not all a dream, for we know that the spirit and the soul of the Maid are with us in the fight. If the soldiers of America have her faith, her purity, her unswerving loyalty to country and to God, they will surely conquer.

The "Monitor" a "Menace"?

IT is a remarkable fact that the secular press no longer finds it profitable or safe to expose the errors and inconsistencies of Chrisian Science. Since the time when Mark Twain made his ruthless attack on Mrs. Eddy's new religion, circumstances have greatly changed, for the sect has now become so rich, powerful and well-organized that the papers are afraid to publish anything that will cast the shadow of a doubt on the wholly beneficent character of Christian Science. Many editors have learned by experience that if they are imprudent enough to admit into their columns anything reflecting on the tenets, adherents, or practices of Christian Science, they will enjoy no peace till they have published a retraction or disclaimer of their own, or else a long and spirited defense of the "American religion" from the pen of some zealous "Scientist." The lesson here for Catholics is so obvious that there is no need surely of dwelling on it.

But Christian Science, we regret to say, is not content merely with defending its own position. For the official organ of the sect, the Christian Science Monitor, appears to have had a great deal to do with promoting the anti-Catholic movement in Canada which reached its climax in the riots that occurred in Quebec early this spring. For as we recorded in our issue of April 13, in summarizing the Hon. Charles Murphy's fearless speech delivered in the Canadian House of Commons:

> The politicians were ably abetted by the ministers, who turned their pulpits into "political cockpits"; by the Orange papers and by the Christian Science Monitor of Boston. By order of the Prime Minister the latter paper was placed on the subscription list of the several Departments of Government and paid for out of public funds. The papers were especially outrageous in their calumnies.

Therefore since the Monitor has gone out of its way to assail the Church, it behooves Catholics to be on the defensive against the Christian Scientists. It is important that we should realize the pitiful weakness of our adversaries' intellectual position, powerful though they may be in other respects owing to their wealth and influence. No short treatise will give the reader a clearer idea of the philosophical absurdity, the theological unsoundness and the ethical dangers of the religious system which is based on Mrs. Eddy's "Science and Health" than Father Henry Woods's closely reasoned paper entitled "Christian Science" that is published in the current Catholic Mind. "Every spirit that dissolveth Jesus," says St. John, "is not of God." But Mrs. Eddy's heresy, as Father Woods conclusively proves, without question "dissolveth Jesus." He writes:

> There is no Incarnate Word, if the position of Christian Science be true. Take away the reality of material things and there was no creation, no garden of paradise, no fall, no need of a Redeemer. The Word of God did not clothe Himself with our flesh, for this has no existence. He did not walk the earth doing good, He did not suffer, He did not die on the Cross and rise again, for the earth, good deeds, suffering, death, the Cross, the sealed tomb, the Resurrection, are all material and therefore the delusions of "mortal mind." It is marvelous that after dabbling in this diabolical system, Catholics can imitate the air of injured innocence assumed by the harlot in the Scriptures who "wipes her mouth and asks, what evil have I done?"

Is it because the interests behind the Christian Science Monitor clearly see that the only consistent and uncompromising defender of Christ's Divinity in the world today is the Catholic Church that that paper has assumed the role of the Menace?

"Give Until It Hurts"

TAKE your stand near one of our public or parochial schools tomorrow at dismissal time. Note the long line of sturdy boys, of demure little maidens. In them is the hope of our country, the future founders of families, leaders in Church and State. Some of them, generations yet unborn will rise up to call blessed for their works of love and mercy.

Do you want to see these tender flowers of our race crushed under the heel of unscrupulous German invaders, who in glorious Belgium deliberately adopted and proclaimed a policy of frightfulness unparalleled in the long sad record of man's fierce brutality to women and children? You grow sick with horror at the thought. But what are you doing to avert that day? Four years ago in Belgium it seemed impossible that such things could be. But they came. They may come to us. They will unless we stir ourselves to immediate vigorous action.

Before you retire tonight stop for a moment at the bedside of your children, sleeping in innocence and purity, guarded by love. Flesh of your flesh, bone of your bone, sent you by your Father in Heaven, you feel that their comfort and happiness are dearer to you than life. You have no doubt that, to defend their helplessness against brutality, you would gladly give your life. There were fathers and mothers who also thought that in Belgium four years ago. But there came a day in Belgium, and more than one, when the streets ran red with the blood of slaughtered innocents. What are you doing to make a repetition of that day impossible in any community in our beloved country? Germany will not change. So long as her policy, rooted in ruthlessness and dishonor, remains unchecked, there can be no guarantee for your home, your children. It is a policy that stops at nothing, which promises an advantage to Germany. What are you doing to bring down to the dust of impotence and salutary humiliation an enemy which has yet to learn that civilization can allow existence to no nation which regards treaties and pledges, faith and honor and fair dealings, as worthless, as things to be disregarded if they block the path to national aggrandizement?

Talk is not expensive, yet it is not worthless. Talk that will cheer the "folks at home" and make the nation realize that we are expected to take a large and glorious share in the work of making the world a place where truth and decency are commendable, and not evidences of weakness, is always to be encouraged. But it is not enough. Are you giving your time, your money, your services, as far as giving is possible, to the furthering of our country's cause? In the apt words of a Red Cross poster, are you giving "until it hurts"? That is what sacrifice means, and without sacrifice we shall not win this war for civilization.

Social Insurance

RENEWED attention has recently been given to the question of social insurance. It is one of the problems that will confront us at the return of peace. Social insurance legislation has been proposed as a provision against sickness, old age, unemployment, invalidity and accident on the part of the laborer. Few apparently understand the real principles on which such legislation rests. In general it may be regarded as merely a substitute for an adequate wage. Hence it would seem to follow that in strict justice the burden of such taxation, in so far as the laborers themselves cannot reasonably be expected to bear it, should fall upon the delinquent employers in proportion as they are neglecting to pay a proper wage. In practice, however, such a fair distribution of taxation is impossible. Hence we find State, laborers and employers all sharing at times in bearing the common burden of social insurance.

The difficulty of an equitable adjustment is obvious so long as a living wage is not paid to every worker. Such a wage would include a sufficient sum enabling the laborer himself to make due provision for future emergencies and to pay in its entirety the full assessment of whatever social taxation might still be deemed necessary. To render the payment of such a wage normally possible for every employer the articles manufactured must necessarily be sold at a price that will enable the employer to meet any added expenditure and at the same time yield him a sufficient though moderate margin of profit after paying a living wage.

In a word, no satisfactory solution can be found for the problem until prices, profits and wages are kept within the limits of a reasonable minimum on the one side and a reasonable maximum on the other, excluding alike all oppression and excessive gains. So alone can the welfare of every class of citizens be duly consulted: of the consumer, the laborer and the employer. This, we admit, is not possible without a certain measure of State control. But public control for all such purposes is in full accord with our Catholic traditions.

In the meantime, social students must be warned, under present conditions, not to place too much confidence in the existing methods of State insurance for labor emergencies. They should regard them as a mere makeshift, a transitional stage towards an adequate wage which will free the laborer from undue State dependence.

The latest revelations in regard to Germany's social policies may here serve as a lesson, not, indeed, to destroy interest in social insurance, but to instil prudence. Germany's compulsory sickness and workingmen's accident insurance began in 1883, and her invalidity and old-age insurance in 1889. Yet we are now told that in 1913, after about a quarter of a century of this régime, Dr. Frederick Zahn, of Munich, reported at a hygienic congress that the number of paupers, or persons drawing from the public relief-fund, had steadily grown. In Berlin alone it had increased from 31,358 in 1891 to 55,601 in 1909. Pauper burials were of frequent occurrence. Similar conditions are recorded for other German cities, though government statistics were not drawn up or were advisedly kept secret. Social insurance neither stemmed the tide of discontent, as the enormous Socialist vote indicated, nor did it serve to prevent that worst of economic evils, pauperism, which first appeared with the Reformation and was its direct consequence. The lesson in brief is that social insurance is indeed to be heartily promoted so far as may seem desirable, but must not be permitted to take the place of a living wage.

Cruelty to Children

IN an excellent article in the current "Bulletin" of the New York Board of Health Dr. Jacob Sobel discusses the care of the "pre-school age child." All physicians, he writes, recognize the tremendous importance of the first six years in relation to health or illness in after life. These years form "the most plastic, most sensitive, and most impressionable period of life," and yet, unfortunately, careful study seems to show that it is a period singularly neglected, or unwisely directed. The result is that we are spending annually millions of dollars in what is, to a great extent, an unsuccessful attempt to correct habits often actually fostered by easy-going parents in the days when Johnny and Cissy were too "small" to go to school. In Dr. Sobel's opinion, "It is no exaggeration to say that if the same money, time, energy and effort had been, or could have been, expended upon the children of pre-school age as are now devoted to the school child," the later problems of parents and teachers would hardly exist.

This is only noting that in child training, as in so many other social and religious works, we have long been content to adopt the old policy of considering the purchase of a Yale lock after the horse has been stolen. What Dr. Sobel holds with regard to the futile efforts to bring neglected children to something like a decent degree of physical health and comfort is almost equally true in the moral order. Bad habits acquired in the early years take deep root, and in their growth darken the child's whole being. If little Polly is allowed to "have her own way" during the first six years of her interesting existence, it is to be feared that all the wisdom of Froebel, even when applied by the wisest and most devoted of teachers, will fail to bring her at school to a proper realization of the fact that in this world of many minds and clashing interests obedience and generosity are absolute necessities. And for the permanence of these early evil impressions, over-indulgent parents must bear the burden of guilt.

To yield to a child's impulses, whims, hasty desires, is not kindness, but sheer cruelty. If parents could by some device be brought to admit this truth and to act upon it, there would be good reason to believe that in time we might dispense with the majority of our penal and eleemosynary institutions. "I know I'm foolish," remarked a young mother, "but when Johnny cries I just can't refuse to give him what he wants." "Not foolish, my dear," observed an elderly lady, whose seven boys and girls are now making the world a better place to live in, "not foolish, because you really do know better. Perhaps the more correct term is 'cruel.'"

AN AMERICAN MISSIONARY OF TODAY

ZEALOUS Catholics who feel that it is high time the Church in America began to produce numerous vocations for the foreign missions will rejoice at the appearance of "A Memoir of William A. Stanton, S.J." (Herder, $1.25), a very readable volume in which his close friend and fellow-religious, Father William T. Kane, now a chaplain at the front, has drawn an engaging portrait of a thoroughly "human" young Missouri Jesuit who cheerfully devoted his life to evangelizing the Indians of British Honduras, and who died at the age of forty, only eight years ago. The biography of Father Stanton is a book which should help awaken in the hearts of our seminarians and novices a desire for the foreign missions, and a volume too which should make its American Catholic readers proud of their countryman and of their religion.

The subject of Father Kane's memoir was born in Staunton, Ill., February 28, 1870. He was a fine manly boy of unostentatious piety and solid faith who after a course at the Academy of St. Louis University, entered the novitiate at Florissant, Mo., at the age of eighteen. After the years of his early training, devoted to making the young Jesuit's ascetical, classical and philosophical studies, during which he also developed his interest in the phenomena of natural history, subsequently such a striking characteristic of him, he began his period of teaching in Chicago and finished it in Belize, British Honduras, where the call to the missionary's life was first heard and heeded. Therefore on his return to St. Louis in 1899 to start his theological studies, Mr. Stanton determined to equip himself fully for the work of ministering to the spiritual needs of the Central American Indians. Our teaching scholastic's three years' stay at Belize also gave him excellent opportunities for studying the fauna and the flora of the country and he seldom returned from a walk without some new specimen to add to his collections. In vacation time he was accustomed to "rough it" with the missionaries, showing special interest in the snakes of the region and he won the distinction of having a plant he discovered, the Asplenium Stantoni Copeland, named after him by the Smithsonian Institute.

But at the close of Mr. Stanton's second year of theology an event took place which seemed to make his return to British Honduras very unlikely, for he was sent to Manila to assist at the observatory there while preparing for ordination. On his way to the Philippines, Stanton stopped at Honolulu and thus describes a swimming race he won from a "gigantic" naval officer:

> Off we started, observed of all observers. The naval man shot out from the line like a cannon-ball, but before he had gone fifty yards I was with him neck and neck, and at the goal found him more than fifty feet in the rear. When he climbed up on the platform, he caught my hand and congratulated me and said: "Padre, I've raced against dozens of first-class swimmers in the East, many of them with big reputations, and have never been beaten until this moment. I'll be hanged if I ever saw such a powerful overhand stroke in my life."

Though Stanton found the Spanish customs prevailing at Manila rather soul-subduing he cheerfully went on with his theology and his observatory work, experienced his first earthquake which he vividly describes, continued his natural-history studies, discovering in Manila sixty-seven new varieties of hymenopterous insects, took an occasional fall out of the defamers of the Church in the Philippines, and finally on August 10, 1902, he joyfully realized that he was "the first American priest ordained in Manila." As the cholera was raging there at the time, Father Stanton soon had his hands full attending to the English-speaking Catholics of the city, and when the scourge carried off the American army chaplain, the newly ordained priest did excellent work among our soldiers, who were amazed at first to hear a "friar" speaking perfect American.

The chapter describing the year of Father Stanton's tertianship at the Santa Cueva, in Spain, his biographer advises readers to skip, but that they must by no means do for Father Kane gives an admirable explanation of the scope and purpose of the little-understood "third year" of the Jesuit and shows how wonderfully Father Stanton profited by it. Whenever free from his duties, the fervent American tertian was always to be found in the chapel before the Blessed Sacrament, and it was during those hours of silent prayer, no doubt, that he was confirmed in his resolution to devote his life to Christianizing the Indians of British Honduras. He had noticed, he wrote in the letter asking the Provincial to send him there, "That Our Lord, when on earth, had always the keenest eye out for the chap who was in most need." That poor ill-equipped mission in Central America, he argued, seemed to be the place most in need of a willing priest just then. Would Father Provincial let him go there? On Pentecost Sunday, 1905, the longed-for permission came and this is the way Father Stanton announced the joyful news to his aunt:

> I received from my provincial one of the most welcome letters I have ever received in my life. In it he tells me that it has been decided that I am destined to found a new mission in the Cayo district of British Honduras, among the abandoned tribes of Maya and Lacandon Indians there. What greater favor could the Lord bestow on me than to choose me for such apostolic work! And what greater joy for a son of Ignatius and a brother of Francis Xavier and Peter Claver and a thousand other missionaries of the Society, than to be allowed to give his life and strength to save the souls of poor abandoned Indians in the forests and jungles of Central America! Well, it has been my constant prayer for many years that the Lord might give me such a vocation, and it seems He has heard my prayer.

We next find Father Stanton at Benque Viejo, the center of his new mission district of more than thirty Indian villages. Without question he had a wide variety of deprivations and hardships to endure. He pleads with St. Louis friends to send him what is absolutely necessary for his chapel, he protests that he begs not for his "own house, but for the Lord's," describes how he is "buried in these inaccessible forests and swamps, but perfectly happy," announces casually that "within last two days had thirty-seven 'jiggers' extracted from my feet. This tropical burrowing tick is certainly a caution! Even one is enough for an experience, but this last dose of thirty-seven has left my feet as if I had put them up as a target for a dozen loads of bird-shot." Father Stanton's particular field, his biographer avers, was "easily the hardest in the mission," its material conditions being the worst, its people the rudest and its extent the greatest. His missionary journeys were long, wearisome and perilous, and made through a "dreary silent land, heavy, sodden, lonely; a more frightful desert because of its wild exuberance of listless, sleepy life." Yet to read Father Stanton's bright, humorous letters, of which Father Kane has made such good use, one would think that the missionary was enjoying a series of pleasant outings merely.

Father Stanton's success with the natives was remarkable. God blessed his work from the outset. The Indians loved him so that in a few months he was known throughout the district as "El Padre Bueno," "the Good Father." He came to understand his people thoroughly and managed them with singular tact and skill. To root out the chief disorder of the villages, for example, he refused to permit amancebados y concubinas to march in the Palm Sunday procession, the heaviest penance he could impose on the culprits, for the Indians dearly love a "function." The result was that "after Easter the proclamation of marriage bans swelled to a remarkable number."

The chapter about Father Stanton, "the scientist," makes particularly interesting reading. His eye was quick to note the innumerable incidents of animal life constantly taking place in the jungle and his enthusiasm for snake-collecting never abated. On one occasion, for instance, when caught by night in the bush, abandoned by his horse, with the necessity of traveling barefoot, fasting, wet and fever-stricken some twenty miles, and with fifty pounds of baggage on his shoulders, he added to his burden a fine specimen of a boa, and staggered into Cayo on Sunday morning just in time for seven-o'clock Mass. A carefully written work in two manuscript volumes on "The Fauna of British Honduras" which Father Stanton had all ready for the printer, was very mysteriously lost. "Perhaps God wished that the memory of Father Stanton," well observes in this connection his biographer, "should be supremely that of a priest: a clean, fierce flame, in which there was not even the coloring of earthly matter."

Father Stanton's career as a Central American missionary was a short but arduous one. The hardships he endured while successfully establishing the new mission station completely undermined his robust health and sowed in his body the seeds of an incurable disease. He came to the field of his activities in the fall of 1905 and early in 1910 he left British Honduras forever. On March 10, after patiently bearing great suffering, this valiant missionary passed to his reward. "It's good to go home," he said.

GREEN AND GOLD

Spring of the year, how soon shall you be gone!
  Flower of the field, how quickly, quickly fled!
Willow and elm, that now green raiment don,
  How soon your bourgeoned glories shall lie dead!

Youth of our life, how little while you stay!
  Youth of our life, with golden days agleam,
How soon your suns are set, how soon away,
  Vanished how soon the glamour and the dream!

Though green things die and time consumes the gold,
  Though through stark trees the wind of winter grieves,
Though life creep past ashiver in the cold,
  Yet had our youth its songs, the spring its leaves.

REVIEWS

Life of Charles Carroll of Carrollton. By LEWIS A. LEONARD. New York: Moffat, Yard & Company. $2.50.

How many know that there were six Carrolls among the patriots of the Revolution? Of course, the four less prominent have been overshadowed by the great Signer and his cousin, Baltimore's illustrious prelate, but they were none the less sincere and stanch soldiers of freedom. It is strange too, in spite of all that has been said of the man who played so large a part in the drama of American independence, that up to the publication of the present compilation Miss Rowland's two-volume life of Charles Carroll (1898) was the only extended record available to the student. Even a large portion of this was devoted to his correspondence and papers, and it was a book of limited circulation. In the January, 1903, volume of the United States Catholic Historical Society's "Records and Studies" there is a list of 165 books, pamphlets, and articles in periodicals, especially relating to Charles Carroll of Carrollton. This list is further evidence of the fact that Mr. Leonard's book is a most timely effort to do historical justice to the career of the man who "ranked next to Washington in the value of the services rendered the patriot cause in our revolutionary struggle."

To his task the author has brought the advantages of a zeal and enthusiasm born of Maryland family connections and a long personal association with Carroll's own private secretary, who gave him practically first-hand information for this life-story of the great ability, industry and usefulness of the patriot statesman who was the representative Catholic layman among the founders of the Republic. The author is evidently not a Catholic, but he treats his Catholic material sympathetically and brings into prominence the value of Carroll's Catholic education and the steadfastness that prompted the Signer to declare in his ninety-sixth year that "What I now look back on with the greatest satisfaction to myself is that I have practised the duties of my religion." An index would have added much to the usefulness of the book for the many students that it is to be hoped will consult its pages.

The Warfare of Today. By Lieut.-Colonel PAUL AZAN, LITT.D,. of the French Army. Translated by Major JULIAN L. COOLIDGE, U. S. R. With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co., $2.50.

Those who have become hopelessly bewildered in trying to learn from soldiers' books how a modern battle is fought will find in this excellent volume the light they have sought. For the author is an experienced French lieutenant-colonel who, after taking an active part in the present conflict, came to this country last fall to explain to the young men of the Harvard R. O. T. C. the theory and practice of "The Warfare of Today." He then gave them seven such luminous lectures on the subject that not only military men but even non-combatant readers will follow with ease and pleasure Colonel Azan's interesting pages. He purposed teaching his hearers how to conquer, and that, too, without sustaining a profitless sacrifice of life. So he carefully explains, and illustrates with incidents borrowed from his own experience the modern "war of positions," miscalled "trench-warfare," describes the attack, the defense, the training of the army and tells what the proper relations should be between officers and soldiers. The author insists repeatedly on the importance of perfect coordination from one directing head down to the humblest private in the ranks if success is to be won, and shows that the appointment of a generalissimo for the whole Allied front, such as we now at last have in General Foch, is an absolute necessity.

In a good chapter on "Preparation for an Attack," the author tells how valuable he has found the services of the Catholic chaplain for heartening the men just before an engagement, and describes how a priest on one occasion went before each company and said: "Turn your thoughts for one moment to God, ask Him to forgive your sins. I will grant you absolution. Let every man who believes in God kneel down." Colonel Azan testifies that every soldier in the regiment, "Catholics, Protestants, Jews and atheists" went down on his knees while the chaplain absolved them. As Colonel Azan's excellent book shows that he represents the best traditions of the French army, the volume is just the one our soldiers should read and any of their civilian relatives and friends who wishes to get an admirably clear and satisfying notion of what "The Warfare of Today" is like, will find it in this finely-written and well-illustrated book.

Campaigns and Intervals. By LIEUT. JEAN GIRAUDOUX. Translated by ELIZABETH S. SERGEANT. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.50.

Serbia Crucified: the Beginning. By LIEUT. MILUTIN KRUNICH. With the Aid in English Idiom of LEAH MARIE BRUCE. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $1.25.

The entry of the French troops into Alsace, the battle of the Marne, the invasion of Serbia, the fall of Nish—these are occurrences of the world-war that are distant enough in time to be looked upon somewhat more clearly, now, perhaps, than in the days when they actually transpired, looming the bloodier for all the clearness, partaking of the poetry, dread though it be, of emotion remembered in tranquillity. Here are written down by eye-witnesses and sharers, events that will thrill the world forever; the little details of war, that one reads not at all, or only between the lines of the dailies, are here written down by officers of the French and Serbian armies respectively, translated into English, clear and idiomatic, betraying no hint of the original tongues in which they were described. The French troops are painted in Lieutenant Giraudoux's book in natural colors, they are seen to be at times not too brave, not too obedient, not too willing, but withal there are the brighter hues of their native politeness, their characteristic kindness, their French chivalry. One sees too, from the pages, that France's people are Catholic, while pages teem with hardships to shame the peaceful ease of those who stay at home. "Five Nights, Five Dawns, on the Marne;" is a splendid chapter, and the last interval, "May on Lake Asquam," is idyllic poetry in parts, preparing us for the book's interesting close, which tells us of the death of the poets, our own Alan Seeger, Hesslin, the German poet, and Rupert Brooke, the greatest of them all.

The book on Serbia is more dismal reading. Armenia and Belgium have witnessed atrocities no more dire than did Serbia, though of the last's terrible days and horrible nights the world at large knows less. Gruesome, indeed, is Lieutenant Krunich's narrative of the retreat from his native land, of his last desperate stand in trenches dug through a cemetery, whither comes a poor distraught mother in search of her son's grave, into which she topples—for it was part of the trench—hardly too soon, for shortly afterwards the dreaded Bulgars come, and there upon the coffin of her boy, she is shot and falls dead, her life-blood crimsoning her old gray hair. This story makes up almost half of the book and is told with no restraint of style or emotion, contrasting vividly in this with Lieutenant Giraudoux's story of the French, which is in the form of a journal.

"The Dark People": Russia's Crisis. By ERNEST POOLE. New York: The Macmillan Co. $1.50.

"The Dark People" are the 160,000,000 peasants who must be reckoned with before order comes out of the present chaos in Russia, and in this informing volume, Mr. Poole, a young novelist, who has recently returned to America, doubtless gives the reader as intelligible an account of the condition of Russia today as it is possible to write. He describes the various parties, the successive "revolutions," and the sporadic movements, the political leaders that have had their little day in Russia during the past two years or so, and explains the present condition of the army, the railroads, the labor market, the food-supply, etc. The author records that as soon as Kerensky agreed to restore the death penalty at the front, Kornilof ordered wholesale executions of mutineers, entire battalions of soldiers being slaughtered by machine guns; their corpses then being set up in rows with placards on their breasts which read: "I was shot because I was a traitor to Russia." Miners are now getting $6.40 a day, but do scarcely forty per cent of the work they accomplished before the revolution. In only one of the villages Mr. Poole visited, did the peasants say: "We are through with the Church and religion." He is of the opinion that the Orthodox priests will have a restraining influence on "the dark people" and will keep them from becoming Bolsheviki. The crying needs of the peasantry, the author declares, are modern farming-machines and a corps of competent men to teach the people how to cultivate the land profitably, for the Russian plow makes a furrow only four inches deep and that fact is one of the main causes of the peasants' land-problem.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The April number of the Catholic Historical Review opens with an interesting sketch of "A Self-Effaced Philanthropist: Cornelius Heeney (1754-1848)," by Thomas F. Meehan of the AMERICA staff. The Brooklyn Benevolent Society, founded by Mr. Heeney in 1845, now enjoys a revenue of some $15,000 to $25,000 a year which helps to relieve the wants of the poor. Father Victor O'Daniel, O.P., then tells how Father Fenwick opened for Divine service on December 8, 1818, St. Joseph's Church, Somerset, Ohio, that State's oldest Catholic church. The Rev. J. Wilfrid Parsons, S. J., who was ordained a priest last week, contributes to the review an excellent sketch of Father Anthony Kohlmann, one of the pioneer Jesuits in this country, and the Rev. Charles L. Souvay, C. M., has a good paper on "A Centennial of the Church in St. Louis (1818-1918)." "Miscellany," "Documents," "Notes and Comment" and "Book Reviews" are, as usual, interesting departments.

E. F. Benson's latest novel, "An Autumn Sowing" (Doran, $1.35), is so well done that it will probably be ranked among the author's best work. The theme is threadbare, but its treatment is excellent. A wealthy, ill-mated man of fifty, with a tiresome home and family, engages a young girl as a typewriter. An initial prejudice, felt on both sides, gradually gives way to esteem and eventually is replaced by affection, which, however, is sternly dealt with as soon as the danger signals are recognized. The skill of the author consists in his delineation of the characters and his clever development, but especially in his careful elimination of those indelicate features which the general run of modern popular writers so ruthlessly and relentlessly obtrude on the reader.——Mrs. Maria Longworth Storer in her latest novel, "The Villa Rossignol" (Herder, $1.00), tells how a fair Catholic maiden narrowly escaped being carried off to a harem by an unspeakable Turk and his confederates.—— In "Winona's War Farm" (Lippincott, $1.25), Margaret Widdemer describes the way a flock of Camp Fire girls showed their patriotism by managing a farm successfully.

Belgium's honor is certainly safe in the minds of all English readers. Some, however, may not yet fully realize what she has suffered. For this reason Commandant de Gerlache de Gomery's recent volume, "Belgium in War-Time" (Doran, $0.50), which Bernard Miall has translated, should be read by all who in any way feel the need or desire to intensify their convictions with regard to the reasons why Germany should be defeated. It is a calm rehearsal from the point of view of a Belgian of the whole history of the invasion and closes with a dignified but deeply impressive chapter on "The Soul of Belgium."——Capt. Wm. H. Caldwell, F. A. R. C., has compiled, under the direction of Lieut.-Col. Robert M. Danford, F. A., U. S. A., a book of "Field Artillery Officer's Notes" (Dutton, $1.50), which ought to prove of great value to new-fledged officers, for the manual contains tables of organization, range-tables, and instructions on battery administration, field practice, target-bracketing, smoke-bomb practice, the calibration of guns, etc., etc.——A valuable book for the little soldiers at school is A. N. Farmer's and Janet Rankin Huntington's "Food Problems" (Ginn, $0.27). It shows the connection between "arithmetic and the war" and gives boys and girls in the grammar grades numerous examples to solve and shows how saving food helps defeat the Germans.

The mediocre quality of the undergraduates' verses in "Oxford Poetry, 1914-1916" (Longmans, $1.25), makes the publication of the book, in these days of universal retrenchment, a piece of extravagance. The stanzas entitled "The Prayer of the Virgin Mary" are disgraceful and throughout the volume the spiritual note is rare. These anonymous lines entitled "Epiphany" are quite seasonable:

An hour of May for me
Is true Epiphany
When the birds sing to us
"Creator spiritus,"
And in each little nest
The Lord is manifest;
When thorn along the down
Is white with holy crown,
When plover scream and swerve,
Who their master serve,
And all the brilliant wood
Is breathing God.
Now, no man may not see
True Epiphany.

Teachers and others who know the devious ways by which the young often come to the knowledge of things sexual will welcome "Innocence and Ignorance" (Devin-Adair, $1.40), written in French by M. S. Gillet, O. P., and translated into English by J. Elliot Ross, C. S. P., Ph.D. We have here no mere manual of sex enlightenment but rather an accurate analysis of the various methods that have been advanced for dealing with this delicate problem. The author rejects absolutely the purely scientific method, whether collective or individual; his condemnation of the methods of silence and inaccurate knowledge is no less vigorous. The initiation of the will must always run faster than that of the intellect, and moral motives must be added to moral rules; otherwise a prurient curiosity is fostered which often leads to serious sin. Relying, therefore, on the principles of sound Catholic theology, the author proposes a method of strictly individual initiation, to be adapted in each case to the needs of the child and to his previous moral education.

Convinced that those of the middle classes in France are not so much irreligious as ignorant of the fundamental truths of religion, Mgr. Tissier, Bishop of Chalons-sur-Marne, has gotten out another volume "pour les gens du monde" entitled this time "Les Croyances Fondamentales" (Pierre Téqui, Paris). All the great and important religious questions of perennial interest but which under the stress of the present war are demanding more insistently than ever a definite solution are clearly and vividly set forth. As stands to reason, the answers given are not original with the author, but in his development he has shown remarkable tact and a great knowledge of the world and of the human heart. The book will be found fully as valuable for an English-speaking public as it is sure to prove for the French middle classes for whom it was written.—— "The Abiding Presence of the Holy Ghost in the Soul" (Cathedral Library Association, $0.50), by the Very Reverend Bede Jarrett, O. P., will be welcomed by all who have had the pleasure of listening to the instructive discourses delivered by the eloquent Provincial of the English Dominicans during his recent visit to the United States. Somewhat more dogmatic and somewhat less practical than his "Meditations for Lay Folk," it possesses the same good qualities as his former work, which was so well received three years ago. It fills the need for a brief, clear exposition of the working of the Holy Spirit in the individual soul.

Such a sample of unreason as "A Social Theory of Religious Education" (Scribner, $1.50) would almost convince one of the biological necessity of war. The author, George Albert Coe, is an advocate of the "New Morality" which was to usher in the democracy of God. Like a true fairy godmother to the youth that was to be, he urges the elimination of preceptive education. It must be turned into a game in which every danger of infringing on the personality of the child is by all manner of means to be avoided. Poor dream-babies! We were certainly very near the verge of things, so

. . . God be thanked who has matched us with His hour
And caught our youth, and wakened us from sleeping,
With hand made sure, clear eye, and sharpened power,
To turn, as swimmers into cleanness leaping,
Glad from a world grown old and cold and weary.

Among the new publications, at home or abroad, of interest to Catholics are "Second Marriage," a novel by Viola Meynell; "A Spiritual Aeneid" (Longmans); R. A. Knox's story of his conversion from Anglicanism to the Church; "Coal and Candles" (Lane), a new volume of poems by Mrs. Helen Eden; "Jacqueline," a war novel by John Ayscough which Kenedy will publish, and a new volume of apologetics by Father Scott, whose "God and Myself" has reached its thirty-first thousand. Dom Germain Morin, the learned Benedictine of Maredsous, discovered in the Wolfenbüttel library a ninth-century codex containing thirty-three hitherto unpublished sermons or short tractates of St. Augustine, and four or five other miscellaneous pieces by the great Doctor of the West. The London Times reviewer quotes the following passage from the Saint's new Ascension Day sermon to show that his hearers were accustomed to answer vociferously when the preacher asked them questions not considered strictly rhetorical:

I was saying a moment ago that if anyone wanted to take from you either your money or your eyes, one of the two, you would choose to keep your eyes. However much it hurt, you would let go the money, not to lose your sight. Now, I ask you about these same eyes. If you can keep both your eyes and your understanding, that is bliss. But suppose you cannot keep both, and that you have to give the preference to one or the other, which is it to be? Make a good choice. You have to lose either your eyes or your understanding (mentem). If you lose your understanding you will be just a brute; if you lose your eyes you will still have your reason; you will be a man. Tell me which you would have. Which do you prefer—to be a blind man or a living brute? You shouted (acclamastis), you have chosen. How did you see that which you have chosen? What have I shown you to make you shout? Have I shown you rich colors or beautiful forms, vessels of gold or silver? Have I set out jewels for you to gaze upon? Nothing of that. But yet you shouted, and by your shouts you showed that you had chosen. Now, that by which you saw how to choose is your understanding, your heart in fact, which I am speaking to.

Soulless Psychology

A PROFESSOR in the University of Cincinnati, Dr. B. B. Breese, has recently published a book which he calls "Psychology." According to the publishers, it was adopted last August by thirteen colleges and universities, including Dartmouth, Western Reserve, New York State College for Teachers, New York University and Iowa State College. The careful student will gladly concede that this text contains many suggestive, and even valuable, chapters. The author's treatment of visual and auditory sensation, for instance, is especially thorough, and his exposition of induction and deduction is considerably above the text-book average. Furthermore, Dr. Breese does not follow slavishly in the footsteps of James and Titchener, but has the courage of his convictions in disagreeing with these and other demi-gods of modern "psychology." But with all this conceded, it is clear that Dr. Breese gives us a psychology that is essentially "soulless."

Eliminating Hamlet

IF Dr. Breese were to write a treatise on investments, and begin by warning the reader that he must not so much as give a thought to capital, stocks or bonds, no intelligent man would waste time on the volume. Writing on the science of the soul, Dr. Breese follows that method in his university text. Mind, he holds, is not a permanent principle, a subject that thinks, wills, lives. It is only the sum-total of conscious states, and on this fundamental point Dr. Breese is very explicit. "There is no thinking soul." "The core of the self is the perpetual background of organic sensations which with the instinctive impulses and activities constitutes the beginning of the self." Soul, self, personality, thus have no real existence, and in Dr. Breese's system, the phenomena presented by sleep, phenomena not without difficulties but by no means insoluble, are sufficient to relegate them to the realm of nothingness. He admits "the continuity of self," but believes that it can be explained "in terms of content alone." And when he treats us to that bit of childishness, that a business man, on entering his office for work "puts on another self," we are justified in asking whether, according to Dr. Breese's theory, that same business man in his hours of ease would be held the lawful owner of all wealth accumulated during business hours, or whether during his business hours he would be held accountable by the law for fraud or crimes committed during his time of recreation. Dr. Breese's psychology, eliminating the soul, eliminates self, and with the elimination goes all common-sense.

The Source of Failure

HOW can so egregious a failure, in what seems a serious attempt to solve a serious problem, be explained? The answer is, simply, that Dr. Breese, like many of his fellows, is a victim of the closed mind. Professing to view all things in "the cold, unimpassioned light of science," he in reality chains himself from the beginning to a very ignoble prejudice. That prejudice is a blind devotion to an extreme form of evolution. In addition to this initial prejudice, Dr. Breese views what he terms "metaphysics" with all the devotion that the evil spirit displays towards holy water. That no incautious student may take harm, Dr. Breese incorporates in the preface a solemn warning against the subtleties of metaphysics. There is and there can be no soul. That is fundamental. Evolution, unlike metaphysics, has no place for it. All explanations which would suggest its existence are ipso facto, misleading and false. These are but a few of the links in the chain forged by Dr. Breese.

There is another source to which Dr. Breese's failure may be traced. It is his ignorance of Catholic treatises on this and cognate subjects. The bibliography which he has prepared extends over eight pages, and is noted for an absence of the great writers of the past. "The very fact that any doctrine has been believed by thoughtful men," wrote Coleridge, "is part of the problem to be solved, is one of the phenomena to be accounted for." There were brave men before Achilles, and great philosophers before the day of Titchener and James. Plato and Aristotle are no inconsiderable figures in the world of thought, yet Aristotle is mentioned but once in Dr. Breese's text, and that in connection with a subject of no great importance. Although several serviceable translations are at hand, Dr. Breese does not seem to be acquainted with the famous Aristotelian treatise on the soul. The great field of philosophical research opened by the Schoolmen is likewise a terra incognita to the Cincinnati professor, nor is it anywhere indicated that what their labors began has been further developed by their intellectual successors.

The Closed Mind

THE old prejudice "Catholica ignorantur," "Catholic books and authors may be safely ignored," is responsible for the narrowness and absurdity of many a pretentious modern university text. A brief reference to books so easily accessible as the Stonyhurst philosophical series, or the "Catholic Encyclopedia" might have saved many an aspiring author from egregious error. But Dr. Breese does not seem to be able to find room for even a passing reference to Catholic authorities in his bibliography. Every important phase of psychology is treated with depth of thought, based upon comprehensive data, in Father Maher's "Psychology," yet this important work is omitted. Other notable omissions are Cardinal Mercier's "A Manual of Modern Scholastic Philosophy," and "Scholasticism, Old and New," by M. De Wulf of Louvain, both of which works have been adequately translated by Dr. Coffey of Maynooth. Although the phrase "metaphysics" seems to frighten Dr. Breese, nevertheless neither he nor his readers would be the worse for some acquaintance with the great work of Father Thomas Harper, "The Metaphysics of the Schools." The monographs of Father Gruender, Professor of Psychology at St. Louis University, are also an excellent refutation of many of the errors rampant in modern treatises on psychology. His "Psychology without a Soul," and "Free Will" should find a place in every college library. The omission of works of this type from the bibliography of a university text, is sufficient to indicate either the author's incomplete knowledge of his subject, or his unwillingness to direct his students to Catholic sources.

The Moral Aspect

FROM the standpoint of morality, an indictment of the gravest nature must be filed against the "soulless psychology" current in our non-Catholic institutions. If there is no abiding principle in man, by reason of which he continues the same individual, if he has no free-will, if he differs from the brute, not essentially, but only by his higher degree of development, all true responsibility must cease, nor need man care greatly about the tremendous problems of life and the soul. The solemn words of Our Blessed Lord, asking what does it profit a man to gain the whole world and lose his soul, fail in their essential meaning, since man has no soul to save. What effect will this "soulless psychology" have upon the individual's actions, upon his dealings with his fellows, his attitude towards his Maker? With God and the soul set aside, man's highest moral development becomes impossible. Patriotism is made merely an empty name, for "soulless psychology" furnishes no valid foundation for an unrelenting sense of duty. Duty becomes at best a sentiment, a matter of manners and custom. Those who know that this is the psychology taught to thousands of callow college students, cannot but view the future with the deepest concern. Reduced to practice this psychology is necessarily a menace to society and to the very existence of the civilized State.

ECONOMICS

The Garden at the Gate

EVERYONE can have a garden. The smaller the space, the rarer the product, or so it can be, with skill and interest. In mid-Victorian days, a hyacinth never failed to lighten the dinginess of the seemingly unproductive slums, evidencing in the midst of squalor, the tenderness and grace and shy beauty of its pale, winsome mistress, preferably a sempstress. In these bustling days a sandbox full of parsley in the kitchen window of a New York flat indicates the patriotic thrift within. Bulbs of narcissus will grow indoors in a forgotten vase, with no more care than an occasional watering. A patch of lawn, or a diminutive backyard, can with careful, intelligent sowing, be made to furnish a season's crop of succulent beans to rejoice a hungry family, or a daily bouquet of old-fashioned flowers to bring nature within-doors. The man of large domain combines beauty and usefulness in his garden in a way that well expresses his own personality, for gardens, like eyes, reflect the soul, and he that likes them not must indeed be blind.

A Real Contribution

NOW if smallness of space should not deter the eager planter, neither should poor soil. There are some plants indigenous to every kind of earth. Lilies raise their pale chalices from gloomy marshes and the ravishing cactus flower makes incense of the desert air. Even "contractor-made earth," two parts ground brickbats to one part rocks, with a sprinkling of topsoil one-eighth-inch thick, yields cheerful, common plants, like tomatoes or nasturtiums. Sunlight and soil are powerful allies of vegetation, but attention can replace them both.

The hosts of "war gardens" that responded to the Government's appeal last year saved millions of dollars for the gardeners and tons of food for the Allies. They routed, too, the bare specter of want at the side of the approaching winter. This year the need is greater; may the slackers be few! The cultivation of the backyard truck-patch serves in unsuspected ways the Government's interests. It obeys automatically that mandate of the food administration: "Use local foods," and dispense with any sort of transportation or delivery. Housewives will know that it obviates waste to gather vegetables as needed from the garden, instead of stocking the larder with a week's supply, some of which, despite all care, are likely to become unfit for use. Then, of course, amateur production greatly decreases the cost. Not only does Smith eat corn free all summer because he grows it, but he can buy asparagus, I will not say more cheaply, but less expensively, because enterprising Jones next door has sown a bed, and the provisioner must needs dispose of what Jones formerly bought. Indeed the only check on last year's soaring prices was the increased production of the summer and the large stock of winter preserves, Should anyone remark on the corresponding large usage of sugar, be it known that nearly all fruits and vegetables are amenable to the drying process, which is even simpler than canning and fills the reserve closets with staples just as toothsome. Apricots and prunes, parched corn and dried peas softened again with water, will vie for favor with their syrupy, canned brethren. The cold-water method, too, requires a minimum of sugar.

The Preliminary Study

AND then what merely human man can resist the joy of gardening? No one that has ever tried. "Who loves a garden still his Eden keeps," and indeed it seems to the initiated as if, in the terms of the primeval banishment, was hidden their own balm. Above all other labor, gardening brings health, and above all peace. There is the daily contact with the soil, the deep, homely feeling of partnership, and the keen relish of success, for gardening failures are at the worst but relative. There must be some response. The feeling of possession and accomplishment brings an elemental joy that nothing else can give. I saw a child once who had made a dress for her doll. A straight strip it was, gathered at the neck, with two raw holes for the arms. Yet she gazed at it with ravished eyes and the pretty clothes were cast aside. "Look! I made it." I never fully understood that cry until my first row of radishes burst from their seed-leaves into little plants. "I made it!" thought I, boundless egotist that I was, and my pride outran my joy. The fact that they became tough and stringy, owing to poor soil, had no power to shake my high content in a thing that grew and lived by the help of my hands. The beauty of a garden is its other claim to our affections. The weary day becomes less sultry if its close brings us to a radiant garden that draws loveliness from its very warmth; while the racy whiff of vegetables, the heavy scent of sleeping flowers and "the despairing fragrance of new-cut grass" is a rare after-dinner compound for insomnia.

Plan the garden carefully. Before a bulb is planted or a drill made, have the entire yard mapped out, and take care that your personal predilections or artistic wishes do not spoil the scientific arrangement. Study the soil, and observe the sun; then plot your assault on nature as they counsel. Such obstacles as fences, trees or paths can all be used to further the picturesqueness, if not the regularity, of the yard. Do not put beans in the gravelly borders; let spices grow there, and seek a rich loamy soil to make the former mealy. Several shrubs can be found to bloom well in the shady spots, so let your zinnias and asters greet the sun.

What Shall I Plant?

THEN keep your ambitions within bounds. Do not attempt orchids when only irises are possible. A diligent reading of nature's dictionary, the seed-catalogue, edited by spring, abridged by climate, will acquaint you with your infirmities, and suggest more than enough substitutes. If the garden is small, long-blooming plants are certainly the most economical inhabitants, and in larger ones, also, they should form the bulk of the planting. If even clothes are practical this year, surely gardens should be. Swiss chard, for instance, besides its delicious flavor, has the charm of novelty, and is an ideal vegetable for the home-gardener. The outside leaves are removed from time to time to make a meal, and the untouched roots perpetually send forth new shoots, until a day or two before frost—be wary!—the midrib is finally cut, and served like asparagus. Beets are a thrifty product because when you thin out the patch, the young green tops of the discarded roots furnish a tender substitute for spinach. Potatoes are unlikely vegetables for the small gardens; they are hard to grow, subject to pests, and are plentifully supplied by the farmers. It is a fact little known, that last year's over-crop caused the food administration a good deal of worry. Nourishing leguminous vegetables are healthy occupants of any yard. Successive sowings of peas, bush-limas, and butter-beans, extend their comparatively short seasons. New seeds planted between the rows, while the present crop is flowering, will be in their prime when the others wither. A careful consideration of this matter of seasons will prove a great advantage to the efficiency of the garden. Quickly-maturing radishes will fructify the earth, where tomato plants are slowly rising before the latter's leaves hinder their development, and the autumnal pumpkin is the proverbial bed-fellow of summer corn.

Buy only the best seeds. They are cheap enough, and a poor investment at the beginning not only wastes the seeds and the earth, but the previous sprouting-time of spring as well. Last year there was a scarcity of seeds in various places owing to the unexpected demand. Do not let a recurrence of this unpreparedness trouble you, for the Department of Agriculture at Washington will gladly and promptly supply seeds, advice and information. Learn to look to the Government for aid in this matter, especially directive aid, for undoubtedly the Government looks to you for support in carrying out the wise and nation-wide movement for backyard gardens. A. McCloskey.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Loyalty of German-Speaking Catholic Parishes

IN her pamphlet on the "Registration of Women for War-Time Service," Mrs. Harlan Ward Cooley, chairman of the Registration Department for Illinois, speaks of the opposition offered by Socialists and others to the work of registration, and then adds: "Several county chairmen write that the German Catholic priests were most helpful, whereas the pastors of the Lutheran churches blocked the work, in many instances forbidding the women to register." Catholic loyalty was likewise displayed in a particular manner by the thirteen German-speaking Catholic parishes of Philadelphia, consisting mainly of the poorer classes, who subscribed the considerable sum of $524,400 to the Third Liberty Loan. "What thirteen parishes of other denominations or other descent," asks the Philadelphia Nord-Amerika, "have surpassed or even equaled this record?" The Central Bureau of the Central Verein has been consistently active in rendering intelligent assistance to our national war-work and issuing literature for our soldiers and sailors.

A Laymen's Retreat Journal

THE Canadian League of Retreats for Laymen began the present year with the publication of a monthly review appropriately entitled, La Vie Nouvelle. The demand for such a special organ of the retreat movement, in Montreal, shows the interest aroused by this important work. The object of the new review is to preserve during the course of the year something of that spiritual atmosphere created by the retreat and to supplement the lessons instilled during those days of silence and recollection. The three words significant of the purpose of the retreat: "instruction, piety, action," have properly been chosen as an abstract of the program for the retreatant's monthly publication. The "new life," begotten and fostered during the days of the retreat is a life of zeal and apostolic activity. Hence the need of a more thorough understanding of the fundamental truths of religion as applied to ourselves and to that modern world in the midst of which our lives are cast. Hence, too, the further need of a more perfect comprehension of our own professional and social duties that we may become potent factors in the conversion of the world to Christ. The work begun in the retreat should evidently be continued by the study of instructive and inspiring Catholic literature during the course of the year. La Vie Nouvelle is published at Abord-à-Plouffe, Comté Laval, Canada, under the supervision of the energetic Father Joseph P. Archambault, S.J.

Increase of Seven Million Church Members

CHURCH membership in the United States has increased from 35,068,058 to 42,044,374 during the decade of years ending December 31, 1916. The following are some further details just published by the Census Bureau: the number of churches has increased from 212,230 to 228,007; of ministers from 164,830 to 191,722; of Sunday-school pupils from 15,337,811 to 20,569,831; of Sunday-school officers and teachers from 1,746,074 to 2,049,293. The statistics cover 201 denominations, thirteen more than were reported in 1906. Protestants, Latter Day Saints, Spiritists and various other groups number 25,691,774, or 61.1 per cent; Catholics, 15,742,262, or 37.4 per cent; members of the Greek or Russian Church, 250,340. The Jewish congregations comprise 359,998 persons. The statistics obviously do not agree with the accurately compiled figures of the Catholic Directory which gives the same year a Catholic population of 17,022,879, not counting the large floating population of Catholics.

Cloudland Mail-Service

ON May 15, for the first time in the history of the world, an aerial mail-service running on a definite time and route schedule was placed in operation between New York, Philadelphia and Washington, by the United States Government. At 11.30 a. m., Lieutenant Torrey H. Webb, in a Curtiss type 150-horse-power biplane, began the Government's cloudland mail-service from Belmont Park. At Philadelphia, his "relief," Second Lieutenant James Edgerton, took charge of the plane and its mail-bags, and landed in Washington at 2.45 p. m., three hours and fifteen minutes after the craft had left Belmont Park. The plane carried 2,457 pieces in all. In the pouches destined for Washington there were 960 letters and parcels, including those of Governor Whitman, of New York, and Postmaster Thomas J. Patton, of New York, to President Wilson. Modestly tucked away in the first pouch to go by aeroplane to Washington, were greetings from the staff of America to the faculty of Georgetown University. It was only right and fitting that since as far back as 1670, a Jesuit Father, Franscesco Lana, had clearly explained in his "Prodromo" the basic principles of modern aeronautics, Jesuits should share in this splendid triumph of science, so one of the Associate Editors of America happened to remember the days when, under beloved Jesuit masters, he thumbed his Ovid and read how Daedalus taught Icarus to fly. But, against his father's orders, Icarus would "loop the loop," and lo, he fell into the sea, and the name and the waves of the Icarian sea still remind us of his sad fate. So the editor wrote and sent by the cloudland mail-service, a Latin poem, which will be found on another page of this issue, and briefly told of the happier lot of the modern Icarus, who was to waft his flight from the Statue of Liberty to the "Capitol's unmovable rock" at Washington.

A Model Lay Crusade

A VERY suggestive article is contributed to the Ecclesiastical Review by the Bishop of Savannah. A year ago a lay crusade was organized by him within his diocese to "promote a better understanding between Catholics and the other citizens of Georgia for the purpose of maintaining the civil rights of all persons regardless of their religious beliefs." A notice was sent by him to the priests of his diocese requesting each one to select two of the most prominent and best-qualified parishioners to be present at a convention for the formation of this league. Each Catholic society of every parish furthermore sent one additional delegate. At this convention a constitution and by-laws were adopted for the new organization which was there established. Among other important measures taken a publicity committee was appointed to distribute Catholic literature wherever it might be deemed advisable. As a first experiment, the following advertisement was inserted in ninety-five papers:

> About Roman Catholics.
> Get your information first-hand. Upon request we will tell you their belief and position, their practices and obligations, their rights and duties, as they bear on civic and social relations, public questions and good citizenship. For information address
> The Catholic Laymen's Association of Georgia, > 107 Ninth Street, Augusta, Ga.

Besides the correspondence work which followed as a consequence upon these advertisements, the association from time to time sent brief items of Catholic interest to the Georgia press in the form of news letters or of direct letters to the editors. In the latter instance it is particularly to be noted that they commented upon the favorable as well as upon the hostile notices which appeared in the various papers. The annual report for the first year, drawn up by the efficient manager of the association, Mr. J. J. Farrell, gives the following interesting information upon this point:

> Through our members and a press-clipping bureau we kept tab on every paper in the State. Every favorable mention received is followed by a letter of thanks and appreciation from the bureau, and every unfavorable or misleading mention is corrected at once, with the request that the correction be printed as prominently as the false statement had been. This led to some interesting letter-writing with the result that today outside the Watson publications there is practically no Georgia newspaper printing anything against Catholics. We attribute this to the fact that the editors got tired of having to correct themselves, and therefore refrained from criticising, even though they could not find themselves willing to praise.

In arranging its literature list the publicity bureau selects the most prominent and intellectual men of the State; physicians, lawyers, bankers, teachers, etc. Special assistance was given, through Mr. Benedict Elder, by the Knights of Columbus Religious Prejudice Commission. Here then is an illustration of what an active laity, encouraged by its spiritual leaders, can accomplish in promoting the interest of the Church.

A Protestant Soldier's Gratitude

THE following letter addressed to the editor of the San Francisco Chronicle for April 15 and signed "Protestant Soldier" tells its own story:

> I am a soldier home from France on account of a wound which has made me unsuitable for action. Since I came home I have heard much of the Red Cross "over there," but never once have I heard the name of a Catholic Sister praised for her work. My father is a Civil War veteran, and although we are not Catholics, has always made me respect the Sisters. It is to one of these he owed his life. He had been lying on the battlefield a day and night when, midst shot and shell, one of these brave workers rescued him. I no longer have to be told. The battle was over. The dead were lying in heaps. As for me I was unconscious. When I awoke I found two of these faithful workers bending over me, and it is through their work I am alive today.

The bravery of the priests on the battlefield, in caring for the wounded and the dying, has always been equaled by the devotion of the Catholic Sisters, whose names are written to the present day in the hearts of the Civil War veterans.

Announcement of National Catholic Events

THE 1918 convention of the Catholic Hospital Association is to be held at Chicago, June 18, 19 and 20, in the hall of St. Francis Xavier Academy, 4928 Cottage Grove Avenue. Its particular subject will be the standardization of hospitals and the hospital's work in relation to the present war. Papers will be read and discussed by leading hospital authorities of the country and conferences of the executive authorities and heads of the various hospital departments are to be an added feature of this year. Sisters belonging to Religious Congregations which have neither hospitals nor schools in Chicago should make special arrangements by communicating with the Catholic Hospital Association, Fourth Street and Reservoir Avenue, Milwaukee. June 30 is the date set for the opening of the Catholic Summer School of America, at Cliff Haven, N. Y. An interesting program has been arranged and special attention is given to war conditions. The fifteenth annual meeting of the Catholic Educational Association of the United States will be held at San Francisco, California, July 22 to July 25. The Young Men's Institute of that city has been placed at the disposition of the association for the meetings of the convention. The closing meeting will be held in the great new Auditorium of the city, one of the most spacious and best-appointed halls in the country. The National Conference of Catholic Charities announces that its September sessions of this year will be of far-reaching importance in view of the new problems created by the war. It is obvious that all our Catholic charities will be profoundly affected by these conditions. The cordial relations established between the American Red Cross and our Catholic organizations will call for a special study of the most advantageous methods of cooperation.

Caillaux's Secret Power Through Latin Freemasonry

WHAT was the spell that cast about Caillaux, ex-Premier of France, the immunity which enabled him to betray French interests and prostitute the honor of France, to pile up an enormous fortune by gambling on diplomatic information, to engage for years in a huge intrigue against his country with an assurance and prestige that at the same time made him one of the foremost men in France? Charles Johnston, in the New York Times Magazine of a recent date, answers this question in one word: "Latin Freemasonry." For years he had been one of its highest leaders in France. By its enormous secret power he attained to his immense political prestige, amassed a mighty fortune and secured complete immunity from the law. Mr. Johnston writes:

> We have heard, in this country, of "invisible government." But, almost since the establishment of the Third Republic, France appears to have had the grim reality. For a great part of the time since 1870, the real center of power has been, not in the Palace of the Elysian Fields, the official residence of the President of the Republic; not in the Bourbon Palace, the meeting place of the Chamber of Deputies, but in the Rue Cadet, the headquarters of the "Grand Orient"—the life center of "Latin Freemasonry" in France. And in this Temple of Mystery in the Rue Cadet, Joseph Caillaux has been one of the Chief Priests.

The three watchwords of this great secret society, as enunciated by its own leaders, are: "Anti-clericalism, Anti-militarism, Socialism." In following out the first, the writer says, Latin Freemasonry "has tried to impose upon France, not genuine religious liberty, as we understand it in America, but a despotism of atheism and materialism." He distinguishes it from American and English Freemasonry in so far as it has eliminated from its ritual and teaching every allusion to "the Grand Architect of the Universe." Its anti-militarism was in part connected with its Socialist affiliation. Caillaux, the friend of international financiers, involved in a huge web of German intrigue, at the same time posed as the champion of "International Socialism." The latter worked hand in hand with Freemasonry in France, Mr. Charles Johnston states, and this affiliation developed a system of espionage which proceeded from the War Ministry at Paris and radiated through the entire French army:

> A system of espionage which had as its object to pry into the religious faith and observances of officers and soldiers, especially those in higher commands, with the deliberate purpose of discriminating against those officers whose religious nature showed elements more positive than atheistic materialism such as commended itself to the clique at the Rue Cadet, who had abolished the "Grand Architect of the Universe." The natural result was that ambitious officers strove to gain, not military science, but Masonic degrees, as a means to promotion.

Under the Ministry of Emile Combes this system resulted in a grave public scandal. While the banished religious and priests were ready to save their country by the shedding of their blood, Latin Freemasonry was involving itself in traitorous intrigues and opposing the military strengthening of France. Such is part of the story told, not in a suspected Catholic review, but in a popular magazine section of a metropolitan daily.

The War.—Everywhere along the Flanders and Picardy fronts the lull reported last week continued. No operations of first-class importance were reported. But violent artillery duels took place on the entire front and especially in the Arras-Albert sector. Increased air-activity on the part of the Allies was noticed in all the dispatches, the Allies claiming that the superiority in this branch has passed to them, though the statements from Berlin do not grant the claim. It is probable, however, that the Allied fliers are greatly hampering the assembling of the German forces and are constantly harassing their transport and supply lines. In the minor engagements which took place along the various sectors, the advantage on the whole rested with the Allied forces. In the beginning of the week the French drove into the German lines, on a two-mile front in Flanders, east and north-east of Locre, and also advanced their lines to the western slopes of Mount Kemmel. At the same time, near Reims, French patrolling parties penetrated to the third line of enemy trenches at Bermericourt, destroyed the German defenses and brought back some prisoners. Enemy raiding parties tried several times to pierce the Allied lines along the Somme, but were driven back with losses. At Mesnil, north of Albert, the British were especially successful in checking a severe enemy attack. French and British detachments penetrated the German positions southeast of Arras near Locon and in several places in the Lys salient.

Bulletin, May 20, p.m.-May 27, a.m.

Attempts by the Germans to disarm the Polish troops in the Ukraine and in the Government of Minsk met with fierce resistance.

On the Albanian battle-front, in Macedonia, Italian and French troops drove the Bulgars back on a wide front west of Kortza, south of Lake Ochrida, and in a three-day action advanced their positions twelve and a half miles. This operation is the first important forward movement on this front in more than a year.

The British armed troopship Moldavia, with American soldiers on board, was torpedoed and sunk on May 23 in the English Channel. There were no casualties among the crew, but of the Americans on board fifty-six were lost. The Moldavia is the third transport lost while carrying American troops, the others being the Tuscania and the Antilles. No transport bound from the United States to Europe with American troops and convoyed by the United States navy has as yet been lost.

Division of Bohemia into twelve districts, with advantages in the electoral domain given to the German minority in each, so as to diminish the Czech representation in Parliament, was provided in a Ministerial decree issued in Vienna. Official French dispatches say that this effort to dismember and Germanize the Czech State caused serious rioting at Ostrau, Pilsen and Nachoo, which resulted in the proclamation of martial law. By increasing the German representation from Bohemia at the expense of the Czechs, the Austrian Government hopes to regain at the reopening of Parliament on June 19, the majority it lost some months ago through the coalition of all elements in opposition led by the Czechs. This coalition caused Emperor Charles to order the dissolution of Parliament early in the present year.

Bohemians and the Vienna Decree

On May 21, every railway president in the United States was relieved from active duty as executve manager of his road by Director General McAdoo. The Director General will appoint a Federal Director for each road who will be responsible only to the railway administration. In many cases the president of the road may be named Federal Director. To safeguard the interests of stockholders and maintain the individuality of each railway, the Federal Directors, whenever possible, will be appointed from the operating officers of the property. This will prevent unnecessary disrupting of the working organization of the road. As a further step in the reorganization of railway management, the Director General ordered the creation of two operating districts. One is the Allegheny district consisting of the principal trunk lines east of Pttsburgh, exclusive of the New York Central. The other is the Pocahontas district consisting of the east and west trunk lines terminating at Hampton Roads.

Railway Presidents Removed

In announcing the new policy the Director General stated that in view of the responsibility for the operation of the railroads of the country placed upon him he had been unable to escape the conviction that it would be advisable to place in direct charge of each property for operating purposes, a representative to be known as the Federal manager who will report to the regional director. As far as possible this manager would be chosen from the operating officers of the property who would be therefore entirely familiar with its employees and its conditions. Except when necessary to meet emergency conditions, the Federal manager, according to Mr. McAdoo's announcement, will endeavor to avail himself fully of the advantages incident to the operation of his particular railroad as a unit and the preservation of its identity. This is of the highest importance not only to secure the best results, but also to give the greatest assurance to the officers and employees that their railroad careers will not be narrowed, but if anything broadened. It will also give to the stockholders the reassurance that their just interests in their properties will be respected and that nothing will be needlessly done that may have even the appearance of impairing their just rights.

Ireland.—Mr. Dillon, head of the Nationalist party, in an interview reported by an Associated Press correspondent, issued a statement on May 21, appealing for fair-play for Ireland. He said that on the Thursday preceding the arrest of the Sinn Fein leaders his party had made a protest against British methods of blackening Ireland's name in the eyes of Americans, which, in part, was as follows:

Mr. Dillon's Statement

All the machinery of propaganda controlled by the British Government has been set in motion to blacken the name of Ireland in America and to prejudice the American people and the American Government against the Irish nation. We feel it our duty, as the elected representatives of the Irish nation, to appeal most earnestly to the people of America and the American Government not to be deceived by these propagandist misrepresentations, but to listen to the statement of Ireland's case coming from Irishmen in sympathy with the national aspiration of the people of Ireland and qualified to speak on behalf of the Irish nation.

This warning, he continued, has been amply justified by the recent action of the Government, of which, at the time the statement was issued, the Nationalist party had not even a hint. Speaking of the arrest of the Sinn Fein leaders, he said:

The charge made in Lord French's proclamation against the Sinn Fein prisoners is an extremely serious one, and the method adopted by the Government is, so far as I know, unprecedented in British history. They have arrested and deported these men to England without any definite charge being made in legal form against them and without any statement as to whether it is intended to bring them to trial or not. Meanwhile Ireland waits for proof of the alleged pro-German plot.

He declared that the Irish enthusiasm for the cause of the Allies and her hearty co-operation with the war had been changed by what he says Lloyd George himself was obliged to describe when Minister of War as "stupidity amounting to malignity on the part of the War Office and the Government." Passing on to the alleged approval by his party of Sinn Fein methods, he said:

My attention has been directed to statements that I and the Irish party of which I am leader have adopted Sinn Fein methods and have joined the Sinn Fein party. These statements are utterly unfounded and false. So far from that being the case, I am more than ever convinced that the policy of the Sinn Fein is wrong and foolish and bound to end in defeat and disaster.

Even during the last three weeks, while, in the Mansion House conference, the Sinn Fein leaders coöperated with us in resisting the enforcement of conscription in Ireland by the British Parliament, they absolutely refused to agree to a party truce and continued to denounce us because we still believed in constitutional methods, because we aim at a settlement based on full freedom and self-government for Ireland under a friendly settlement with Great Britain, and because we still adhere to the declaration of John Redmond at the outbreak of the war, and believe that the cause of the Allies is the cause of freedom throughout the world.

He declares that the two great forces which have been the root of Ireland's troubles in recent years have been the stupidity and insincerity of the British Government, which has absolutely refused under the dictation of Sir Edward Carson to apply in Ireland the principles for which the Allies are fighting in Europe, and, secondly, the unlimited financial resources supplied to the Sinn Fein from New York.

He appealed to all those of Irish blood in the United States to support "the one party in Ireland which is fighting for Irish liberty without betraying the cause of liberty in other lands." This appeal he reiterated in still stronger language in his speech at Bailieborough on May 26.

Further complications have arisen to delay the proposed visit of the Lord Mayor of Dublin to the United States. These were made known in a conference held at the Mansion House on May 23 when the following correspondence was given to the press. The Lord Mayor wrote to Secretary Balfour on May 15:

Visit of Dublin's Lord Mayor

I have received from you passports to proceed to America to place before the President of the United States the case against conscription being enforced in Ireland. I beg to thank you. I understand that no documents may be carried by passengers going to the United States. I would be glad if you would kindly have authority issued to enable me to convey a document which has been drawn up for presentation to President Wilson.

Mr. Balfour replied:

I am advised by competent authorities that the document which you desire to convey to the President of the United States ought in the first instance to be submitted to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

On receipt of this letter, the Lord Mayor wrote Mr. Balfour: "My conference has decided that as the document is a direct communication between the conference and the President of the United States, they decline to submit it to the Lord Lieutenant." As a consequence the proposed visit has been indefinitely postponed.

On May 25 the British Press Bureau issued a statement giving detailed information concerning "attempts by the German Government to foment rebellion in Ireland and preparations made in Ireland to carry these attempts into action." It contains documentary evidence tending to show active cooperation between the leaders of the Sinn Fein movement and the Germans in the organization of the uprising of Easter week, 1916, and another proposed uprising in 1917: "but the second period, which concerns recent events, permits of no more than a summary." The reason for the secrecy maintained as to evidence of the plots which are alleged to have necessitated the arrest of the Sinn Fein leaders is thus officially stated:

British Press Bureau Statement

A full statement of the facts and documents in possession of the Government would disclose the names of persons who stood by the Government, and also the channels of communication through which the German Government was acting, and which it would not be in the public interest to reveal at present.

The statement declares that a clue to the new line of communication was obtained from De Valera's public speeches, and continues as follows:

For some considerable time it was difficult to obtain accurate information as to German-Sinn Fein plans, but about April, 1918, it was ascertained definitely that a plan for landing arms in Ireland was ripe for execution, and that the Germans only awaited definite information from Ireland as to the time, place, and date. The British authorities were able to warn the Irish command regarding the probable landing of an agent from Germany from a submarine. The agent actually landed on April 12 and was arrested. The new rising depended largely upon the landing of munitions from submarines, and there is evidence to show that it was planned to follow a successful German offensive in the west and was to take place at a time when Great Britain presumably would be stripped of troops.

According to documents found on his person, de Valera had worked out in great detail the constitution of his rebel army. He hoped to be able to muster 500,000 trained men. There is evidence that German munitions actually had been shipped on submarines from Cuxhaven in the beginning of May, and that for some time German submarines have been busy off the west coast of Ireland on other errands than the destruction of Allied shipping.

It will thus be seen that the negotiations between the executive of the Sinn Fein organization and Germany have been virtually continuous for three and a half years. At first a section of Irish-Americans was the intermediary for most of the discussions, but since America's entrance into the war, the communication with the enemy has tended to be more direct. A second rising in Ireland was planned for last year, and the scheme broke down only because Germany was unable to send troops.

This year plans for another rising in connection with the German offensive on the Western front were maturing, and a new shipment of arms from Germany was imminent. An important feature of every plan was the establishment of submarine bases in Ireland to menace the shipping of all nations. In the circumstances no other course was open to the Government if useless bloodshed was to be avoided and its duty to its allies fulfilled, but to intern the authors and abettors of this criminal intrigue.

The evidence produced by the British Government in support of its action against the leaders of uprising in the famous Easter week, in the opinion of many, by no means answers the charge made by Mrs. Sheehy-Skeffington in her letter to the New York Evening Post of May 22:

With the single exception of Sir Roger Casement, tried in England for high treason, not one of the Irish leaders executed in 1916 got a public trial, all of them being tried by secret military tribunals. None of those men were allowed even the privilege of counsel, and, though the demand has repeatedly been made by Irish Nationalists, such as John Dillon, by British labor leaders, such as Philip Snowden, as well as by Sir Horace Plunkett, Unionist, for the publication of the evidence taken at these trials, the British Government has hitherto refused to publish it. It is well known that the publication of these documents would impugn the legality of the entire procedure of such tribunals.

Nor does the suppression of evidence against the men recently arrested tend to allay the anxiety she expresses in the following words:

Such star-chamber methods must not be repeated, and if Lord French possesses the evidence of a widespread German conspiracy, it must be made clear to him that he should produce it; otherwise he will be rightly accused of making these wholesale arrests for sinister political purposes.

Press comment on the statement of the British Press Bureau is far from unanimous. The London Daily Telegraph says: "The proof is complete, not only complete but continuous. . . . The Government did its duty." The Telegraph expresses its detestation of "Sinn Fein's infamous treachery." The Daily Mail declares that the official statement is convincing by its very moderation. The Daily Express says that the Government was more than justified in arresting the Sinn Feiners, but adds: "Prove these people guilty in open court, and Ireland will listen to them no more. Keep the interned without trial, and half of Ireland will believe them libeled innocents."

The Daily Chronicle believes that more substantial justification of the recent arrests should be given:

If there are reasons of state against a full disclosure, no less are there reasons of state for revealing sufficient evidence to justify the strong action taken. It is not enough to say that there is a plot. So deep-seated is the suspicion of the Government that Irish public opinion will want more than this to convince it of the reality of the conspiracy.

The Daily News, according to the New York Times, also calls for evidence, saying that it is irrelevant and profoundly misleading to recapitulate the evidence of 1916 as proof of Irish complicity in the alleged plot of 1918.

Evidence much more specific than mere proof of German and German-American machinations is needed if the Government's action is to be vindicated. As far as the present document is concerned such evidence is clearly not forthcoming. . . . If the evidence cannot be published the least that can be demanded is that it should be examined by competent, impartial judges, in whose findings the public would have implicit confidence.

The same editorial suggests that the evidence be submitted to former Premier Asquith, Arthur Henderson, the Labor party leader, and John Dillon or Joseph Devlin, and says that confirmation by such a panel would convince every section in Parliament and the country, and that Parliament must insist upon some such investigation. "To issue such evidence as is now published is not a compliment," it concludes, "to the intelligence of the public."

The Irish Independent, a Nationalist organ, says of the revelations:

It is an ex parte statement. The accused have not been heard. It is thus a question of credibility, upon which British and Irish opinions may come to widely diverse conclusions. . . . All sections of the Nationalists have a profound interest in having the issue solved clearly and immediately. Ireland is not and never has been pro-German.

The Irish Times, a Unionist organ, speaks thus:

The revelations must satisfy impartial men that Germany had continuous associations with the disaffected elements since 1916. The evidence is convincing that arrangements for another uprising were made almost openly, consisting of drillings, pro-German speeches and the theft of arms and ammunition. John Dillon must disassociate himself from the Sinn Fein, which stands convicted of conspiracy with the enemy. Unless he does he will lose the support of the moderate Nationalists, thereby dealing a body blow to Home Rule.

The Freeman's Journal is very outspoken:

To imprison people and, while their mouths are closed and they are prevented from facing their accusers, to send broadcast to the world a document charging them with the most desperate and serious offenses unsupported by a tittle of real evidence or by any of the documents so lavishly promised appears to us one of the most outrageous instances of injustice in the long history of British misgovernment in Ireland.

Mr. William O'Brien, Mr. Devlin and Mr. Dillon have all declared that the evidence is not conclusive.

Russia.—The Novaya Zhizn, a Russian advanced-Socialist organ, states that the disintegration of village life is proceeding with demoralizing rapidity. Having plundered the landowners' estates the peasants quarrel with one another for the division of the spoils, while widespread famine increases the gravity of the situation. The journal declares:

The Class-War Rages

In some districts the population has long ago consumed all the available stocks of corn, including seed-corn, while in others the peasants, having had a good harvest, are hiding corn and even burying it in order not to share it with their starving neighbors. All this must lead, and in some places has already led, to a war of all against all, and to the most senseless chaos and universal destruction and murder. Information is constantly arriving of the division of military property among the demoralized soldiers and of various outrages committed by them. Monstrous rumors are circulated about the army which is returning from Asia Minor. It appears that it has brought into the Crimea a large number of female slaves, and that at Theodosia a regular slave-market is being held, the supply being so large that prices soon fell from 100 to 150 rubles to 25 or 30 rubles per slave.

The bread ration in Petrograd, which had been one-eighth of a pound weekly, is now totally exhausted. In Moscow, however, the food situation is not so bad and the anarchists have been kept down. But hopeless political chaos reigns almost everywhere. The Social Revolutionary party, which claims to be the strongest labor group in Russia, sent a letter of protest not long ago to the French Socialists, saying:

The Social Revolutionary party declares that the newly formed Communist group, formerly Bolsheviki, must on all accounts be excluded from the Internationale for having called upon the most elementary principles of democracy to resuscitate forms of despotism and violence. They have betrayed the cause of international Socialism by an infamous separate peace with the crowned despots of Central Europe, transferring Russia, disarmed, humiliated, and crushed, into an administrative supply house destined to sustain the German offensive in the west.

The Social Revolutionary party expresses the hope that all the national sections of the Labor Internationale will determine their attitude as regards the Bolshevist usurpers, taking into consideration this declaration of our party, which itself has the right to speak for all Russian labor, having held an absolute majority in the Constitutional Convention, whose powers will be resuscitated.

There are but few indications, however, of the Bolshevist power weakening from within, and all counter-revolutionary movements prove unsuccessful.

The problem of how to help Russia to save herself and keep from coming under Germany's complete control is puzzling the Administration at Washington and the statesmen of the Allies. There seem to be three groups of opinion on the question. Great Britain and France favor prompt military action. The United States believes in a policy of non-interference, trusting that matters will adjust themselves. Japan would like to seize towns in Eastern Siberia and thus prevent the spread of German influence. Washington holds that it would be a great mistake to send troops into Russian territory, for that move would drive the people into the arms of Germany, and that a military expedition that undertook to strengthen the power of the Bolsheviki would make a bigger blunder still, for that would turn the better class of Russians to Germany. As a compromise the dispatch of a civilian commission made up of all the Allies is suggested. Protected by a large military force, the commission would enter Siberia and win the confidence of the people by supporting the local governments.

How Can Russia Be Helped?

Dr. Harold Williams, for several years a Petrograd correspondent, writes to the London Daily Chronicle that in his opinion unless effective assistance is soon given Russia, Germany will dominate the country. He writes:

What is needed is a rallying point for the Allied cause on Russian territory, a center of organization. There are hundreds of thousands of Russians who love their country, who feel bitterly her shame and ruin, and who are longing for an opportunity to rebuild the State. They are thinking, scheming, waiting sadly and wearily in towns. Their hands are tied, their voices lowered to a whisper. Detachments of their more active forces are still carrying on a lonely struggle somewhere amid the chaos. Alexieff's little band in remote regions of the Cossack steppes, Semenoff's forces in Eastern Siberia, companies of guerrila fighters clinging desperately to the hope of Russian freedom in the Kirghiz steppes or in the Caucausus, and others still who bow the head, feign submission, and watch.

Dr. Williams suggests that a Japanese army, accompanied by Allied representatives, should enter Russia.

The Daily Paper's Catholic Readers

J. C. WALSH

WHAT is really the purpose of those who let their fancy play with the idea of a Catholic daily is that there should be a daily newspaper not readily distinguishable from any other, but in which, when there appears in the news anything to affect Catholic susceptibilities, the direction of the paper can be counted upon to make sure that nothing gratuitously offensive to the Catholic interest will appear, no anti-Catholic coloring be given, no hasty comment of a kind to wound the feelings of Catholics be made. This could readily be extended to cover such aspirations as were recently expressed in a letter to AMERICA for the introduction of the Catholic view-point into articles on the theater, on science and on other subjects. Nobody will dispute the desirability of such a product. Let us concede, however, that the yearning for it can be traced to impatience over what one has to put up with when he reads his paper in the morning. Rarely, indeed, does it happen that the daily paper handles an item of critical interest to Catholics in the way Catholics would like. No wonder they long for one in which that would be done. Whether they would be properly appreciative if they had it may be quite another question, but the fact that resentment is there is in itself something to go upon.

The natural expression of that resentment is usually found in a letter which tries to set the paper right. Oftenest, indeed, we just grumble and pass on, but when sufficiently aroused we do write letters. Writing letters is one thing. Getting them printed is quite another. The publisher has a marked preference for letters which reflect or endorse his own views. And even when such letters are printed they usually come forth into type walled around with hostility.

There are those who think there is nothing so good as these challenges to latent prejudices. The correctness of their view is open to question. Who has not known of luncheon clubs, literary societies and other intellectual aggregations which pride themselves upon inviting speakers identified with unpopular causes, whose members give themselves over to an hour's enjoyment of oratory and then return, with more or less violence according as their bow has been bent, to the aggressive assertion of their original views? Generally, the orator's achievement is the stirring in their minds of a more or less conscious contempt of his willingness to be paraded for their entertainment. If it should ever happen that he needed to call upon them for the defense of the principles he has enunciated he would quickly learn how completely his time has been wasted.

After all, the potency of any cause is in the advocacy of those who believe in it, and the success of any propaganda is in bringing into association the minds of those who ought to think alike. Granted that the unchecked influence of an inherently hostile press is unsettling; granted that many a man who begins by resenting what he reads ends by mistrusting his first impulse; surely the remedy is to fortify those who are of the right mind in the beginning.

In this past year, for example, the Catholic has been on the defensive most of the time. At one time it is the Pope that is under attack; at another it is Catholic Quebec; at another it is Catholic Ireland. Catholic Belgium has escaped so far, but not Catholic Poland. It is not wholly by accident that summary adverse judgments are passed upon all these recalcitrants. And yet how many Catholics, who cherish their religion but who read only the daily press, had a right conception of the position of the Pope in August, 1917; had a right conception of the attacks upon his Holiness after the disaster to the Italian arms; had a right conception of the religious situation in Canada last winter; have any right conception of what the Irish Hierarchy are about now? Which of them did not yield to the innuendo when it was reported the Pope was scheming to add Catholic Poland to Catholic Austria? Which of them did not wince when the Pope was reported to have received a delegation of Finns?

The truth is that nobody is going to bear up against all this unless he feels strongly about it. It takes rather more than courage, it takes real devotion, to face the fact that all these things were and are in some way linked up together, and to insist upon printing the truth when the materials of truth can be obtained. And it needs no argument at all to prove that the only place where genuine service could be rendered in such circumstances was in papers which could count upon the good-will of their readers, and not upon good-will merely, but upon that support which is firmly based on intelligent appreciation, sympathetic understanding, and the confidence that goes with long and familiar intercourse of minds.

Just as there is nothing quite so irritating as to hear one's Catholic friends, for whom one has the highest respect, repeating like so many gramophones the topical newspaper attacks upon the Pope, upon the Irish Bishops, upon Quebec Catholics, so there is nothing quite so heartening as when one finds in these friends a discriminating regard for the evidence which an occasional Catholic editor has had the grace to discover and the hardihood to print.

We have the right to require that such a paper shall be in existence, although it is hard to see against whom the right is enforceable. If the paper is given us we have the privilege of inviting our friends to join us within the circle of its influence. How would it do, every time one finds his gorge rising over some new display of ignorance or contempt of Catholic feelings in his daily paper, there and then to resolve to secure one new reader for AMERICA? With the present frequency of provocation, that method would soon result in settling whatever Catholic-newspaper problem there is.

Centenary of the Sacred Heart Religious

BLANCHE M. KELLY

PEACE, it has been said, has her victories as well as war, and such a victory was celebrated during the current week when the Religious of the Sacred Heart observed the one-hundredth anniversary of the foundation of their Society in the New World. On May 29, 1918, which by happy import was in that year likewise the Feast of the Sacred Heart, Mother Philippine-Rose Duchesne, with four companions, landed at New Orleans and proceeded on a five weeks' voyage up the Mississippi to St. Louis, the episcopal city of Bishop Dubourg, at whose invitation they had come.

It was only eighteen years since the Society itself had come into being when four young women had pronounced their religious vows in the tiny chapel of a private house in Paris—Paris from which the clouds of warfare and anarchy were only beginning to lift. One of these was she who is now known as Blessed Madeline-Sophie Barat, whose priest-brother, Louis, had so trained her mind and fostered in her soul its inclination for the pursuit of holiness that, under the subsequent direction of the great Father Varin, she became the foundress of one of the great educational Congregations of the Church.

The center of the recent celebration was the convent of Maryville, provincial house of the St. Louis vicariate, within whose boundaries is St. Charles, the cradle of the Society in this country. This first home was a log-cabin in what was then the hamlet of St. Charles, leased for the nuns by Bishop Dubourg pending the completion of the house that was being built for them at Florissant. They had come out from their own country with the spirit of missionaries, athirst for souls and for the sufferings that are their price, and in this respect at least they had from the very first their heart's desire. Pioneer conditions prevailed throughout the region; the climate was severe and sickness almost epidemic. Nevertheless with the sublime temerity of Sisters they opened in their log-house a boarding school as well as a school for poor children and when in the following year they removed to Florissant twenty boarders accompanied them. And not only did the school prosper in the face of disheartening difficulties, but subjects began to apply for admission into the Society and new foundations were undertaken, that at Grand Coteau in Lower Louisiana in 1821, that at St. Michael's in 1825, and a house in the city of St. Louis in 1827, this last through the generosity of Mr. John Mullanphy. These houses were the nucleus of the present vicariates of St. Louis and the West, with their subsequent foundations at Maryville, Cincinnati (Clifton), New Orleans, Chicago (Lake Forest and Pine Grove Avenue), San Francisco (Jackson Street and Menlo Park), St. Joseph, Omaha and Seattle.

The rapidity with which the early foundations were made, the unmistakable recognition accorded to them as institutions of higher education and the equally unmistakable hazards of the future in a country only finding its own feet, decided the Superior General to send over an official visitor. Accordingly, in 1841, Mother Elizabeth Galitzin, a member of a distinguished Russian family, and like her mother a convert from Orthodoxy, arrived in America. One of her first acts was to found a convent in New York (Houston Street) at the express wish of Bishop Dubois. In this she was assisted by Madame Aloysia Hardey, at that time superior of St. Michael's, but immediately placed over the New York foundation. Mother Barat called Mother Hardey her first American daughter and she deserves the title of second foundress of her Society in the United States, for it was she who began at Manhattanville the school which acquired its national reputation under her administration, and having been made Superior Vicar of the Eastern province she multiplied its convents, so that within its boundaries there is now only one house that was not founded under her personal supervision.

The Society reached Canada in 1842, the first colony setting out under the superiorship of Mother de Kersaint, member of a Breton family famous for its devotion to the Church and to France. It was a kinsman of hers who after a distinguished career as an admiral protested to the Constitutional Assembly against the condemnation of King Louis XVI, and not satisfied with posting his protest at the corner of every street in Paris, mounted the tribune of the Assembly and read aloud his resignation from that body, declaring that he had borne the disgrace of being their associate but that nothing could compel him to be their accomplice. The natural sequel to this was death by the guillotine.

It was December when the little band under Mother de Kersaint's leadership set out and they had not proceeded far up the Hudson when the captain of the steamboat announced his intention of turning back owing to the rapidly forming ice, but offered to put ashore any who were anxious to proceed. Decision was an easy matter to Mother de Kersaint. "We were told to go," said she, "but we were not told to return." The result of this spirit was the convent at St. Jacques d'Achigan, later transferred to St. Vincent de Paul, and in 1858 to its present beautiful site at the Sault-au-Recollet, provincial house for the Canadian vicariate. Besides a house in the city of Montreal the Society has convents at Halifax and Vancouver, those founded at London and St. John's having since been closed, owing to local difficulties.

As has been said, the houses of the New York province multiplied under Mother Hardey and at present, besides three in the city of New York, there are one in the Archdiocese of Boston, two in the archdiocese of Philadelphia (Arch Street and Eden Hall); two in the diocese of Detroit (Jefferson Avenue and Grosse Pointe Farms); one in the diocese of Albany (Kenwood, which is the general novitiate and juniorate for North America); one in the city of Rochester (Prince Street) and one in Providence (Elmhurst, founded by Rev. Mother Jones). The houses in Cuba and Porto Rico are also dependent on Manhattanville.

The Cuban foundation was one of the marvels achieved by Mother Hardey in the face of what most people would consider insuperable obstacles, some due to the excessive zeal of friends, some to the political complications of the day and the strained relations between the Captain General of the island and the Bishop of Havana, some—and these perhaps the most serious—due to her own grave illness, which, however, resulted in an almost miraculous recovery.

Similar difficulties attended the foundation in Mexico in 1882. Years before the expelled Bishop of La Pueblo, Mgr. de Labastida, had been offered by Mother Hardey a home in one of the houses on the grounds at Manhattanville, where he sojourned for some time. He expressed the hope that when he was restored to his diocese the Society of the Sacred Heart would make a foundation there and even prophesied to Mother Tommasini that she would be one of the founders. What at that time did not seem even a remote possibility eventually came to pass, but when the colony of foundresses, disguised in secular attire owing to the hostility of the civil authorities, arrived in Mexico City, to which see Bishop de Labastida had been transferred, they found his manner constrained and aloof, while their reception by their Jesuit neighbors was even repellent. It was only after they had groped their way to success in this discouraging atmosphere that they realized what true friendship had dictated such prudent behavior, for the authorities were watching for only the slightest betrayal on the part of bishop or priests of the fact that the newcomers were Sisters to send them packing from the country.

An unusual feature of the Society's work was its mission among the Pottowatomie Indians. Mother Duchesne's desire to come to America was prompted by an eagerness to minister to the Indians. From the day that she first heard the Macedonian cry from the lips of a returned missionary she never ceased to pray that she might be sent among them, but it was only in her old age that this prayer was heard. She had then, at her own entreaty, been relieved of the burdens of the superiorship, and when Father De Smet secured, through Mother Galitzin, the services of several Sacred Heart religious for St. Mary's mission in Kansas, whither the Jesuits had followed the transferred Pottowatomies, he begged that the saintly Mother Duchesne might be included among them. "Let her come," urged the missionary, "even though we have to carry her on our shoulders." To do honor to their new teachers the Indians came out to meet them in full war-paint, to the terror of the other Sisters but to Mother Duchesne's great joy. The success of St. Mary's mission was subsequently praised by President Pierce in a message to Congress, and the Sacred Heart School was flourishing when in 1869 it was officially visited by Mother Hardey.

The object of the Society of the Sacred Heart is declared to be "the education of girls," and the records of the past one-hundred years show how thoroughly it has fulfilled its object. It does not, of course, shrink from that modern acid-test of education, examinations. It can even point to a surer evidence of success in the achievements of so many of its pupils in what the world calls fields of endeavor. In such fields Elmhurst, for instance, is represented by Miss Louise Imogen Guiney, whose literary repute is international; Miss Pauline Willis, founder of the Catholic Reference Library of London, and Miss Elizabeth Boyle O'Reilly, lecturer and author; Eden Hall, by the essayist, Miss Agnes Repplier, and Miss Helen Grace Smith, writer of verse; Kenwood by Miss Katherine Hennessay, a lecturer of distinction, and Miss Walworth, writer; the Sault, by the great Albani, whose singing brought her the homage of the world; Miss Margaret Anglin, who has restored to the stage something of the classic distinction which it possessed in a less strident age; Manhattanville, by Miss Mary Elizabeth Blake, Miss Anne Stuart Bailey and Miss Mary Catherine Crowley, all writers of note, and the late Miss Elizabeth Lummis, foundress of the Daughters of the Faith; Rochester, by Miss Katherine Conway, journalist and writer, and Grosse Pointe by Miss Katherine Van Dyke, also a successful journalist.

And yet perhaps it is not such a manifestation of works that the Sisters themselves would offer in vindication of their theories of education, but the thousands of women whose homes are the boundaries of their fame, the exemplary wives, the careful mothers, the dutiful daughters, whose lives are the good odor of Christ, who in the midst of riches are not uplifted, who are not undone by adversity, who carry their faith like a banner and keep their hearts unspotted from the world, because by the Providence of God they had the good fortune to dwell for a season under the tutelage of the Sacred Heart.

Foch, the Man of the Hour

RAYMOND CRAFT

TRUE greatness, it has been said, is only brought out by a great crisis. The man of talent and genius often lies hidden and obscure while lesser men have their day, but let a great danger threaten, let an extraordinary peril put the very existence of a nation in jeopardy, then charlatans retiring in meek and chastened silence leave the master mind a clear field for action. In no case is this truth verified more completely than in that of General Ferdinand Foch, the Commander-in-Chief of all the Allied forces on the western front. Known before the fall of 1914 only in army circles as the Director of the War College and a shrewd tactician, he leaped, almost in a single hour, into public fame as the leading figure in the most decisive battle of the present war, the battle of the Marne.

General Foch was born at Tarbes on August 4, 1851. His father was secretary general of the Prefecture and had three sons, one of whom is a Jesuit, the other a lawyer at Tarbes, while the third, of whom we speak, has just been elevated to the highest rank possible in the Allied forces. At the Jesuit College of St. Etienne, young Foch was noted for his love of study and exemplary conduct. There he acquired that same precision and method that have since made him famous. He was, as one of his early masters said, "made for the Polytechnique," the great school for mathematicians and strategists. But with his mathematical talents he combined a love for literary studies that was almost a passion. History especially appealed to him and he early learned to carry himself in imagination to the ancient battlefields whose glorious traditions he was so capable of upholding. In 1873, after his first year at the Polytechnique, he received a commission as sub-lieutenant, and from then on he made his way by slow stages till in 1907 he was appointed Brigadier, commander of artillery in the Fifth Army Corps, and Director of the Ecole de Guerre. In 1911 he was made General of Division, and in 1912 was sent to Cambridge to the British Maneuvers as head of the French military mission; when the war broke out he was in command of the Twentieth Corps at Nancy.

Practically his entire course from sub-lieutenant to general has been spent with the troops, and thus he has had ample opportunity to put into practice the strategy which his keen, precise mind had formulated. As Director of the Ecole de Guerre his work was not the cut-and-dried tactics of the book-strategist; it was rather an art, the product of a man who had found his work and loved it. With his passion for clearness and accuracy, his missionary-like zeal, and his intense, flaming patriotism, he had accomplished wonders in his teaching. His boundless energy infused into others a similar fire. He worked hard himself and permitted no shirkers about him. In all his teaching his aim was not to give his officers a set rule of conduct for every emergency, but rather the necessary mental direction for reasoning out their problems for themselves. "My pages," he says, "are beacon fires on the peaks to guide the mariner in the storm."

General Foch is an ardent disciple of Napoleon. Like the Little Corporal, he believes that the victor is he that "gets there first with the most men." Like him, too, he is a firm believer in the all-importance of the morale of the troops. War to his mind is not merely a physical combat; it is spiritual and intellectual as well. A battle to him is lost only when defeat is acknowledged; conversely, it is won when the army steadfastly refuses to accept defeat. It is not won by the haphazard rush as of so many wild animals: the victors are those who pursue their maneuvers with precision and confidence, giving way to no obstacles and holding firm in the face of all dangers. To this end strict discipline is an absolute requirement. Not a blind obedience, but an intelligent, harmonious cooperation with the commander's will and the use of every possible means to carry out his plans. A battle is the clash of two wills, and the victor is he whose will is the stronger. A clearly defined end to be gained, a single aim in all minds, the same holy anger in every breast, a supreme, united effort—these are the forces that win battles.

From this it is clear that Foch is a man of studious mind, a thinker and a strategist, and the time of need revealed him also as a man of stirring, smashing action. On the fifth of September, 1914, von Kluck gave the French generals the inspiration for the battle of the Marne by exposing his right flank to an attack. They immediately seize the opportunity and fall upon the German wing. Foch, with three army corps, holds the center of the line, and it is here that the Germans seek to avenge themselves for the repulse of their right flank. For four days Foch stands firm under a terrific bombardment and desperate assaults. On the fifth he sends Joffre the famous dispatch, "Outflanked on the right, outflanked on the left. Situation on the whole excellent. Am going to advance." And advance he does, falling with a truly Napoleonic daring upon the enemy's flank. His position is now desperate. The die is cast and he must abide by his decision. If his supporting division under Grossetti comes up in time, all is well; if not—failure. He pleads with his troops to stand firm and promises them help by noon. Midday comes and Grossetti fails to arrive. Foch sends out more appeals and nobly the troops respond. Finally, at six in the evening, Grossetti appears and the balance swings towards the side of the French. The Germans retreat. Foch was again "the anvil on which victory was forged."

Though the battle of the Marne is Foch's greatest achievement, he has still other laurels in his wreath. In the long battle of Flanders his part was no less important and decisive. The Germans, overwhelmingly superior in number, were pushing the British back and the French were coming up to support them. Dixmude was threatened. But Foch had not lost his iron temper in the face of danger. He ordered the sluices to be opened and flooded the land, barring the Germans from Dunkirk. But now a new battle was beginning around Ypres and the situation looked desperate for the Allied forces. The Kaiser was with his troops, waiting to make his triumphal entry into Ypres. More positions were lost, and the Allies deemed it advisable to retreat. In a council of war Foch addressed the British commander, Sir John French: "The Germans have sixteen army corps on our front; we have but ten, including your command. If you retire I shall remain here with eight, one against two. As for me, come what may, even if it costs me my life, I shall not give way. I give you my word for it, as a soldier, and do you give me yours." And French gave it. A plan for a counter-attack was drawn up and executed. Town after town was retaken. The Kaiser was robbed of his expected triumph, and Foch in the early morning occupied the imperial headquarters.

General Foch has always been a fervent Catholic. He bears his piety as he bears his honors, simply and without ostentation. Although he knew that his military advancement was hampered by his practical faith, yet through the years he never sacrificed it for worldly distinctions. This was well exemplified in 1907, when Clemenceau, the French Premier, was looking for a Director of the Ecole de Guerre. He had considered general after general, but was finally driven to nominate Foch. The latter, too well aware of the hostility of the Premier and his Government to all things Catholic, replied abruptly: "Why, sir, it is impossible! I am not even a candidate. Moreover, do you not know of my family and myself, all practising Catholics, and my brother an exiled Jesuit? What will the hostile Assembly say at my appointment?" "Your brother a Jesuit!" said Clemenceau. "What do I care about that? He cannot prevent your appointment." Such a man is General Foch. His religious honesty, confidence, tranquillity, boundless energy, imperturbable good-humor have made him a favorite of the army, and in him they place their unwavering trust. These qualities, together with his keen brain and thorough mastery of military tactics, make him a fit leader for the Allied forces. And we Americans can rest assured that the path to victory will be as short as possible when Foch, the master strategist, the hero of the Marne, is in command of the Allied forces. What a light and inspiration shall such a Catholic soldier as General Foch be to our Catholic boys, who, enrolled in the armies of the Republic, shall follow his leadership in France!

Madame Palladino, High Priestess of Spiritism

JAMES J. WALSH, M.D., Ph.D.

THE recent death of Madame Eusapia Palladino recalls the career of a woman who attracted public notice throughout the civilized world because of her reputation for the possession of powers to produce manifestations that careful observers declared to be undoubtedly supernatural or at least ultra-natural. She had been before the public for a score of years and had given séances for many distinguished scientists not only in Italy but in France and in England. She had visited America, attracting wide attention here and incidentally taking home with her a large sum of money. Though her trickery had been exposed again and again, that fact had not kept distinguished scientists from believing that Madame Palladino possessed some power that could not be explained on ordinary scientific grounds and therefore must be referred to some force different from those of our material world.

Her death comes just at a time when the losses of the great war are making people particularly susceptible to spiritistic suggestions, and it recalls the general readiness to believe in communications from the spirit world that characterized the period just before and after the end of our Civil War. Spiritism in this country at that time was so widespread that most of the cities and towns here in the East and a great many of those in the West had spiritistic temples, and a series of organized congregations of believers in Spiritism held meetings several evenings every week and were thought to represent a great new religious force in the world. Lawyers, physicians, even Judges of the Supreme Court of various States, professors at a number of universities, and, above all, the new-rich became ardent members of this novel cult, and some of them wrote books in favor of it. After reading the accounts of such men as Judge Dexter or Professor Hare it is hard to believe that the movement of which they were such enthusiastic advocates was nothing but a passing popular delusion.

About 1870 the Spiritists claimed to have had some millions of adherents in this country and their property holdings and popular influence seemed to make it improbable that the movement's influence would wane almost completely in less than a generation. Those who think that Eddyism is likely to have an enduring existence should study the rise and fall of Spiritism as a religious movement in this country between 1850, and, say, 1880, for it originated here in America and its history as a spreading cult is practically contained within those thirty years.

Spiritism, or the belief that the spirits of the other world can be induced in one way or another to interfere in this, has had its ups and downs. Owing to the war-losses in the European countries and to the fact that the old are left to bewail the deaths of the young, there now seems to be a disposition to take up the practice of Spiritism once more. Mediums are found who will for a pecuniary consideration put their dupes in communication with anyone in the spirit world. Some of these frauds need no preparation except the announcement that you have come and the knowledge that you have the proper fee ready, for they will then proceed without delay to bring you messages from another world. The District Attorney of New York has recently been after these mediums, for there has been a luxuriant growth of them since we entered the war. Many of them are quite ready to communicate with the "spirits" and find out whether near relatives of those who consult them are to perish in the war or not. Though they know, of course, all about the present, the future and the past, the records of the District Attorney's office show that they do not know that some of the ladies who consult them are agents of the police and that a policeman is standing outside the door waiting to arrest them as soon as they have taken the fee which is offered them in marked money.

It would seem worth while, then, to review Madame Palladino's career, because the acceptance by distinguished scientists of some of her manifestations as surely representing spiritistic interventions has done more than almost anything else in the last twenty years to give an air of respectability to Spiritism. Madame Palladino's favorite phenomena were to have a table move apparently without any material or personal force being applied to it and then to have a curtain seemingly blown toward her or away from her, and at times to have bells mysteriously rung in the room where she was. It was these more or less toylike performances, so reminiscent of the simpler forms of prestidigitation, that gave Madame Palladino her reputation. Her hands were supposed to be held, her feet were supposed to be guarded from movement, the room was darkened, the scientists sat around, the table-moving, curtain-blowing, bell-ringing performances took place, and then straightway spirit intervention was invoked. Why spirits good or evil should want to do such trivial things for gaping scientists whose curiosity had been aroused, and what it could all mean, is indeed difficult to understand, but there it was.

Perhaps the description of a definite experiment with Madame Palladino as it was given in an important English magazine some half dozen years ago will illustrate better than anything else just what seemed of such wonderful significance. Three very skeptical English scientists went down to Naples, and, having secured an equally skeptical Italian teacher of science, proceeded to get in touch with Madame Palladino and to arrange for a séance. She was the wife of a little tradesman in Naples and it was not difficult to secure her, for it was definitely understood that her services would be amply rewarded. The scientists then proceeded to arrange the terms of the experiment. There was to be a table in the room to which would be brought a series of chairs, a curtain was to be hung across the corner, about two feet from the wall, and behind it there were to be some bells and a musical instrument or two. Madame Palladino described what she wanted and allowed them to provide the apparatus and the conditions of the experiment.

According to the description of the séance published quite seriously in the Nineteenth Century and After, for some considerable time nothing happened until the scientists were beginning to be afraid that the terms which they had set for the experiment were either too difficult for the spirits to overcome or that they were not to be treated to any manifestations at all. After a time, however, for no one knew better than Madame Palladino the value of heightened expectancy and the tiring of the concentration of attention with which observers start such a séance, she began to writhe as if under the influence of some mysterious power. After a certain amount of these movements, which heightened expectancy and still further wearied attention, the table began to tip. The phenomenon was manifestly not caused by Madame Palladino's hands or feet, as time was given for all to assure themselves of that fact. Then the table tipped a good deal and returned with a noise to the floor, and finally the curtain began to move as if blown outward from the wall. This happened over and over again. Last of all the bell was rung. The scientists were quite sure that they had been the witnesses of events that could not possibly be attributed to human agency and they were marvelously impressed with the fact that they had been given the privilege of having demonstrated to them the existence of another world than that of matter which can in the presence of a medium intervene in material affairs.

I remember reading the article at the time and knowing the names of the men who took part in it, and knowing that some of them had written exposures of Spiritism before, I wondered what it all meant. As the result of this demonstration Madame Palladino was brought to this country to give a series of séances here for the benefit of skeptics and others who were willing to pay well for them. Her impressario was Mr. Hereward Carrington, who had been one of the skeptics convinced at Naples, I believe, and whose book on "The Physical Phenomena of Spiritualism" had gathered together many exposures of mediums and their ingenious ways of securing spiritistic results.

Those who attended Madame Palladino's séances in this country observed that her cabinet, with its curtain and the various musical instruments behind it, were always within reach of her free foot. But how was she able to get her foot out from her shoe without that maneuver being detected by the "control," whose foot was placed on hers? The explanation is simple, for there was a special arch in her shoe to prevent its collapse, and in the midst of the writhing movements always supposed to accompany the advent of the spirits it was not hard to wriggle her foot out from the shoe. After this exposure subsequent séances for which special arrangements had been made at universities with definite modes of control elaborated for them proved failures. Practically only one thing remained to be explained, and that was how currents of cold air were produced which various people felt coming from the direction in which the spirits evoked were supposed to be. These were perhaps all the more surprising because currents of cold air are not usually associated with the sort of spirits that would be under the command of a dear good lady who had been caught cheating on a number of occasions.

The rest of the story is so well remembered that it scarcely needs to be repeated. Suffice it to say that here in America Madame Palladino and her "wonders" were ruthlessly exposed in this way: At a séance arranged with her, besides the scientists supposed to be present, two other men were introduced into the room without Madame Palladino's knowledge. They were dressed all in black and were lying along the floor beneath the table. In the midst of the performance, after the table had tilted a few times and the curtain had blown outward, suddenly there was a scream. It was from Madame Palladino. As she screamed she struggled to get her foot back into her shoe. One of the men lying along the floor, both of whom were conjurers, had discovered Madame Palladino's foot slipping out of her shoe and proceeding to do all the wonderful things that were supposed to need the agency of spirits. With the foot free it is of course comparatively easy to understand how in the darkness that she set as a condition of her demonstrations she was able to accomplish all the wonderful things that she did.

So it would seem that conjurers rather than scientists succeed best in exposing Spiritists. Maskelyne offered to duplicate any trick performed by mediums. He even went so far as to offer to do in the light the tricks that mediums will do only in the dark. A generation ago the favorite mode of showing communications with spirits was by having them come and loosen the ropes with which the medium had been tied and then retie them afterward; and a little later slate-writing was all the vogue, but both of these modes of spirit communications were exposed by conjurers. Scientists will persist in dabbling in the matter, however, though their state of mind is actually the worst possible for the detection of trickery. Literally dozens of them have been fooled, and of course Madame Palladino fooled them to the top of her bent, made a fortune out of them, secured the unending publicity which was balm to her soul, and above all, must have vastly amused herself over the success of her tricks and the way that she succeeded in taking in the distinguished scientists.

For on the list of proclaimed believers in her spiritistic powers are such men as Professor Charles Richet, head of the Department of Physiology of the University of Paris, who brought her down to his summer home on an island in the Mediterranean and invited a group of distinguished scientists to witness her marvels; Sir Oliver Lodge, Sir William Crookes, Professor Barrett, head of the Department of Physics of Trinity College, Dublin; and Cesare Lombroso, who attracted so much attention by his work on criminal anthropology, which has proved to be at least as baseless in realities as Madame Palladino's spirit phenomena. If there is anything in the world that shows the scant value of a professor of science's opinion on a matter apart from his own subject it is Madame Palladino's career. The scientists who attended her séances and who knew her story, as they thought, and who found her not at all clever, were quite sure that she could not possibly play any tricks that would deceive them.

It is now known that Madame Palladino's first husband was a conjurer who made his living as a traveling magician and Madame Palladino went with him, was his confederate and knew all about ordinary magic. She had received just the training, therefore, that would fit her to play tricks upon the scientists, and she did it. Who can blame her very much for having made as honest a living as a great many other people do, since she herself professed no theories with regard to the phenomena and only asked to be paid for the production of them and insisted on the conditions under which they should be done?

But it is to be hoped that the lesson of Madame Palladino's career will teach scientists not to dabble with Spiritism unless they are properly accompanied by a conjurer, and that her death just at this time may prove a Providential means of preventing the wide acceptance of supposedly spiritistic phenomena, which are nothing more nor less than the tricks of designing charlatans who are eager to profit by the credulity of foolish people.

Frontier Catholicism

P. O'RIORDAN

HOW often one has to admire the zeal and devotedness of converts. They become Catholics, often after intense trials and bitter struggles, to put men and women who were reared Catholics to shame by their intelligently practical Catholic life. Are the readers of AMERICA familiar with Hilaire Belloc's pronouncement on the present position of Catholicism in England? In his view the impetus of thirty, forty years ago is over, and English Catholicism has fallen into a rut. He is pessimistic, but will go on working for the interests of the Church all the same. This in substance is what he said at a public meeting a few months ago.

I am not sure that his view commends itself to many. We look in vain in England today for outstanding figures in Catholic life like Manning, Newman, Faber, Ward and Dalgairns, all converts. Wiseman, indeed, was always a Catholic, but he took the liveliest interest in the Oxford movement, and was ever on the watch to direct it towards its natural and logical conclusion.

Here in America we have Mr. Small, a convert, writing, a short time since, on the lay apostolate. It does one good to read:

> Translate all this into Catholic terms and what do you have? An organization of say 100,000 men banded together to do spiritual work under the direction of the clergy; to teach classes in Christian doctrine; to go to isolated country missions on Sundays when a priest is not available, recite the rosary with the people, instruct the children, and read a sermon or a meditation from an approved source; to look up Catholic patients and supply them with papers and magazines; to be in readiness to serve Mass when the altar-boy fails to appear.

Let me clearly state my limitations before I offer any remarks on this. I live on the frontier, where we are all pioneers. I have never been in a parish or had charge of a congregation where there was a Catholic school. Let city priests, men from old, well-established parishes, answer from their point of view. I hope their reply will be more encouraging than mine.

On the frontier, I regret to say, we have not the material for a lay apostolate. Yet it is there precisely that a lay apostolate is most needed. Until the country is thickly settled there must inevitably be many small missions where Mass every Sunday is out of the question. Our men lack the necessary knowledge to act as catechists though that difficulty could be easily got over, for one learns as one teaches. The fatal difficulty is that our men lack the will. The frontier Catholic does not say: "What shall I do to possess eternal life?" his question, if he ever really puts any, seems to be: "How cheaply can I get to heaven?" Help a priest? The idea seems rarely to occur to him. But he is quite ready to criticize, to find fault. He is loud in his professions, but alas! too often feeble in his performance. He gives grudgingly and sparingly, and then brags of what he gave.

From the point of view of the frontier I should say as regards Mr. Small's proposed lay apostolate: we are not ready just yet. Before we can organize a lay apostolate we must work, priests and people alike, at raising the standard of Catholicism, to get Catholics to know their religion, to read Catholic literature; to think less of their own ease and enjoyment and to exert themselves more to spread the Faith; to do less talking, less grumbling, and to lead a quiet, solidly practical Catholic life. Then the lay apostolate, or something very like it, will be the obvious outcome of a higher standard of living.

One manifestation of the absence of a higher Catholic life is to be found in the much complained of dearth of priests. Young men on the frontier never seem to think of becoming priests. It is too much trouble. Why, to be a priest one has to have a good general education, study Latin and Greek, philosophy, dogmatic and moral theology, and Sacred Scripture. Besides, there is "no money in it." Yet, in the Providence of God, when the standard of Catholic living is high, there are vocations enough to supply local needs; when it is very high, there are superabundant vocations, and young men seek the mission field.

I should also say to possible lay apostles: It is a splendid act of charity to say the rosary for a congregation that has no Sunday Mass, to read for them a sermon or meditation. But there is a more excellent way, and that is to study for the priesthood, be ordained, and say Mass for them yourselves. You have no vocation? Then help the Bishops secure those who have vocations, help them to increase the number of their priests, to build churches, and to multiply Sunday Masses, for on the frontier it is the Sunday Mass that counts.

To all possible lay apostles I should say: Cultivate the missionary spirit. Spread it amongst others. A weak spot in our Catholic life is the utter indifference shown by the bulk of our Catholics to the missions at home and abroad. American Catholics strike one as intensely parochial. When they have supported the local church with greater or less liberality, they are satisfied, they never seem to look beyond their own borders. True, there is the "Church Extension Society" which does magnificent work, but American Catholics could and should do a great deal more. Taking our numbers and means into account, who can deny that there is apathy?

Certainly it is not beyond the means of American Catholics to support the churches they have and to increase the number of mission churches. One result of a higher standard of Catholic life, it must be repeated, will be an increase in the number of vocations, a supply of priests for those mission churches, so that the number of Sunday Masses will be increased. For on the frontier, I say again, it is the Mass that counts.

Tobacco as an Aid in Warfare

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Few, perhaps, among the many thousands who have contributed to the Sun Tobacco Fund, and similar patriotic efforts to enlist the services of My Lady Nicotine against the Teuton enemy, know that there is a precedent in Revolutionary annals for this idea. In his attempt to coerce the colonies, it will be remembered, the King of England hired from their rulers in Germany 29,875 Hessian mercenaries and sent these placid slaves of the militarism of that era across the ocean to help the attempt to strangle in its cradle the liberty we enjoy here today. Many of these Hessians were Catholics, so Congress thought it would be a good idea to appoint a committee to devise a plan to encourage them and other foreigners to quit the English service. Accordingly this committee made a report about which, on August 14, 1776, Congress adopted several resolutions, which declared that his Britannic Majesty,

> Unable to engage Britons sufficient to execute his sanguinary measures has applied for aid to certain foreign princes who are in the habit of selling the blood of their people for money, and from them has procured and transported hither considerable numbers of foreigners.
> And it is conceived that such foreigners if apprised of the practise of these States would chuse to accept of lands, liberty, safety and a communion of good laws and mild government in a country where many of their friends and relations are already happily settled, rather than continue exposed to the toils and dangers of a long and bloody war waged against a people guilty of no other crime than that of refusing to exchange Freedom for Slavery; and that they will do this the more especially when they reflect that after they shall have violated every Christian and moral precept by invading and attempting to destroy those who have never injured them or their country, their only reward, if they escape death and captivity, will be to return to the despotism of their prince to be by him sold again to do the drudgery of some other enemy to the rights of mankind.

The committee was ordered to have the resolution translated into German and "to take proper measures to have it communicated to the foreign troops." How this was done Benjamin Franklin, who was a member of the committee, tells in a letter he wrote to General Gates from Philadelphia, on August 28, 1776:

> Congress being advised that there is a probability that the Hessians might be induced to quit the British service by offer of land came to two resolves which, being translated into German and printed, are sent to Staten Island to be distributed, if practicable among these people. Some of them have tobacco marks on the back, so the tobacco being put into them in small quantities, as the tobacconists use, and suffered to fall into the hands of these people, they might divide the papers as plunder, before their officers could come to a knowledge of the contents and prevent their being read by the men.

As the records show that 12,562 of the Hessians sent over here did not return to Germany it is only fair to suppose that the tobacco resolution helped to this satisfactory result.

That Lamentable "And"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a communication addressed to AMERICA for May 25, entitled "Some Preciosities of Literature," A. P. called attention to certain words which seem to be overworked. Among them are "and," "book" and "quality." We are not now concerned with "book" and "quality." We would like to say a few words on behalf of the ostracized "and," not "and" purum; plain, simple, democratic "and." For the "and" to which A. P. takes exception is the haughty and dandified "and" that leaves the ranks where he has his honored place and puts himself at the head of the procession and the paragraph, to swagger there in ostentatious display, a syntactical and strutting drum-major decked out in all his foolish finery. A. P. "hates" him. "Outside the Bible," he writes, "I hate to see a paragraph beginning with 'and.'" "It gives the impression of candy with your beefsteak." A. P. might excuse Arnold or Pater for beginning their paragraphs with "and," "but it is ridiculous," he continues, "for amateur scribblers to affect the languid pose of those Olympians."

The implication, therefore, in A. P.'s communication is that the use of the "paragraphic and" is a sign of weakness of style and of incongruity. "It gives the impression of candy with your beefsteak." Now by chance I have before me on my bookshelves among other volumes, Cardinal Newman's "Idea of a University," Thackeray's "English Humorists," "The Four Georges and Lovel the Widower," George Eliot's "Romola" and "Silas Marner," a one-volume edition, that of Pollard and Moss, of the complete works of Washington Irving, H. G. Wells' "The Soul of a Bishop," and William Lyon Phelps' "The Advance of the English Novel." Newman, Thackeray, Eliot, Washington Irving, are classics. Wells is not by any means a model of style. But he writes plain, vigorous English. Professor Phelps is a critic of fine taste and discernment, and has the gift of elegant, clear and idiomatic expression. I have picked these books up at random and opened them at random just to see what they would reveal as to the paragraphic "and."

I have glanced through every paragraph of Irving's "Legend of Sleepy Hollow." With the exception of two, perhaps three paragraphs, in which a dialogue or a conversation was continued, not a single paragraphic "and" occurred. In his "History of New York," on the other hand, I have counted in a reading of two or three minutes as many as fifteen. On the whole, however, Irving seems to be relatively sparing in the use of the "and" to which A. P. has taken such a violent dislike. In Newman's "Idea of a University," a model surely of all that is best in clear, elegant, idiomatic English, I have counted while rapidly turning over the leaves as many as twenty-six paragraphic "ands," many others, of course, escaping me. Thackeray, in the volume mentioned above, is more sparing of his paragraphic "ands," but he uses them not infrequently. In the first half of the work I have stumbled upon nine at least. In turning over the pages of "Romola" and "Silas Marner" I have met at least a good dozen of the conjunction outlawed by A. P. Mr. Wells is not afraid to use it when he likes. It occurs frequently in almost every part of "The Soul of a Bishop," and Mr. Phelps employs it, but more sparingly, it must be confessed, as many as one-hundred pages occurring without a single instance to be found.

In the face of these examples we think it would be unfair to excommunicate the "paragraphic and." The very best usage of the language sanctions it. It can, of course, be abused, and be unnecessarily obtruded upon the reader, just as it is often overemphasized in the pulpit and on the public platform. The subject-matter, the literary vehicle used, argument, oration, essay, novel, the good taste of the writer must determine when it should be introduced. In argument, especially where the writer wishes to carry his thought forward, it has right of citizenship which cannot be denied. In the novel, and those kinds of composition where emotion, rapid incident and action are the main thing, it can and should be more readily omitted.

Prohibition, the Constitution, and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Horace H. Hagan, an Oklahoma lawyer, assures us in a communication which appears in your issue of May 11, that Father Kenny's article of April 13, "Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass," cannot fail to inspire amazement in every reader of your magazine who is a lawyer; and at the close of his letter he drops a rather robust hint in the query: "And, by the way, if theological questions are to be left to theologians, to whom should legal questions be entrusted?" On the other hand, Mr. Paul Bakewell, a St. Louis lawyer, in a communication which appears in your issue of April 27, referring to the same piece of writing, says: "I heartily approve of Father Kenny's article."

I merely wish to inquire what judgment, under the circumstances, a simple, ordinary individual who listens with respect to expert legal testimony, is to pass upon the article in question?

St. Louis. E. M. H.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The various articles and editorials on the subject of Prohibition, appearing in AMERICA during the last few months, have been followed by many with much interest. One thing, I think, they should have made clear, namely, that it is to the several States, and not to the Federal Government, that we must look for the protection of our religious liberty. The so-called "freedom of worship" amendment to the Federal Constitution, means, as Zollmann in his excellent "American Civil Church Law" well points out, "exactly what it says, and no more. It is a restraint on the action of Congress, and is not a restriction on the action of the various State Legislatures." In proof of this position, he quotes the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the well-known case of Permodi v. Municipality (No. 1, 3 How., 589, 609).

> The Constitution makes no provision for protecting the citizens of the respective States in their religious liberties: this is left to the State Constitutions and laws. Nor is there any inhibition imposed by the Constitution of the United States in this respect on the States.

The lesson to be drawn from this decision was well expressed, as it seems to me, in the advice offered by S. L. B. in a communication to AMERICA: "Watch local legislation, and don't rely on Federal guarantees, especially when they don't exist." For, as Zollmann goes on to say:

> The States may, therefore, so far as the Federal Constitution is concerned, establish some religion and prohibit the free exercise of all others. (People v. Board of Education, 245 Ill., 334; 92 N.E., 251). As a matter of fact, many of the original States retained an established religion for a longer or shorter period after the adoption of the Federal Constitution. . . . In Massachusetts the process of establishing freedom of religion was very slow, complete religious liberty not being achieved until 1833.

Zollmann here understates the case of the progress of religious freedom. Not until 1877 was the State constitutional provision of New Hampshire abolished, according to which only "members of the Protestant religion" were eligible as candidates for Governor, the Senate, or the Lower House. Possibly, some of your readers can recall similar restrictions existing in other States at even a later date.

Surely, these facts bring out very clearly Zollmann's contention that, in placing a restriction upon the action of Congress, the Constitution means "exactly what it says, and no more." They also point the moral, that the price of our religious liberty, already seriously threatened by certain intemperate advocates of Prohibition, is eternal vigilance over all local legislation.

Are We Sluggards Still?

THE righteousness of the cause in which the nation is now engaged, depends in no wise upon the truth or falsity of the lurid "atrocity tales," spread throughout the country during the last two years. All might be discredited without changing our position. The reasons which forced us, a peace-loving people, into war, have been stated and restated by the President in documents which will prove to coming generations, if any proof be needed, that only after patience had been exercised beyond bounds, did we have recourse to the sword of justice.

In spite of these documents, and even after a year of war, it is impossible to deny that in some, generally the remoter parts of the country, too many Americans still entertain the double delusion, fostered by years of pacifism and a blind devotion to German ideals in education, that the German peril is so remote as to be practically negligible, and that Germany is a nation that can be counted upon to observe with scrupulous nicety, even the least rules of civilized warfare. Either aspect of this delusion may lead to deplorable results.

Obviously, in an indictment of this nature, names and places cannot be prudently cited; nevertheless, two army officers of unimpeachable character recently bore witness to the existence of this fatal delusion in the locality of the camps, to which they had been assigned. In one of the richest counties of a certain State, the Liberty Bond quota was barely attained, and would not have been reached at all, had not a group of patriotic citizens made up the deficit at the last moment. There were very few aliens in this county; on the contrary, probably eighty per cent of the population was of pre-revolutionary "Anglo-Saxon and Scotch-Irish" stock. The further fact that the number of volunteers from this section was deplorably small, bears out the criticism made by the parish priest: "These people don't seem to know that we have a real war on our hands." The possibility that this "sluggishness" is not an isolated instance, is, at this time, sufficient to constitute a source of grave concern.

In unmistakable terms the President has urged us to awaken to the seriousness of the conflict in which we are engaged, and in a recent speech, Mr. H. P. Davison, Chairman of the Red Cross War Council, has told the American people what they may expect if the enemy ever gains a foothold in this country. In Mr. Davison's opinion, Germany has by no mean been shamed into a relinquishment of the policy of "frightfulness," which has made her an outlaw among the nations.

> The outstanding feature of the German method at present is the effort to terrorize the women, children and old men at home. The fight behind the lines is the most dastardly, unrighteous, cruel and devilish plan that could be conceived . . . and has resulted in the murder and maiming of thousands of women and children, and the driving of hundreds of thousands of the terror-stricken from their homes. It is based on the theory that the killing of four children out of five will induce the mother to implore her Government to have the war stopped that the fifth may live. It is carried on from the English Channel to the Swiss border, and from the Swiss border to the Adriatic.

It would be a fatal error to believe that our fight is against a foe which, throughout many reverses, has preserved unsullied the highest conceptions of honor and humanity. We shall not win this war by minimizing the real dangers at hand. Our plans must grow out of a thorough understanding of the character of the enemy, and our confidence of ultimate victory be based upon the willingness of every American to give his aid in a measure even greater than is asked by the President who, with the authority of God, shapes and guides the policies of the nation.

The "Conductorette" and Others

ONE of the war's many unpleasant effects is the introduction of women and children into a section of the industrial world hitherto closed to them. This new phase of the labor question is not confined to any one nation. In England and France, women have been employed in munition and other factories, as well as in agricultural work, since the autumn of 1914, but not until recently has it been thought necessary in the United States, to assign women to a variety of tasks, customarily accomplished by men. In New York, the "conductorette" is now a familiar sight, and women are being secured in daily increasing numbers, to act as messengers, office clerks, elevator operators, park employees and janitors.

Perhaps it is too early to forecast the final outcome of this change, but recent complaints, lodged with the District Attorney in Brooklyn, seem to justify the ancient hostile tradition against the employment of women in works of a public or semi-public character. Much of that old tradition, it is true, was founded on prejudice or misconception. It can hardly be denied that, normally, woman's place is in the home, for, saving exceptional cases, it is in the home that she finds her largest sphere of usefulness, and the most effective opportunities for her highest moral development. But these are not normal times, and even apart from the exigencies developed by the war, the changed social and economic conditions of the day, justify a wider interpretation of the formula which confines woman's place to the home. The truth of the matter is, that woman's place is where Almighty God wishes her to be, whether that place be at the head of a military or industrial organization, or in a quiet little home, with a flock of children about her knees.

But with all this said, it seems true that in many instances we have been much too eager to find a place for women in the shop and factory. Various New York medical authorities have insisted upon the physical dangers connected with this new move, the District Attorney fears that through it morality has suffered, and the Public Service Commission of New York now announces an inquiry to discover whether it is dictated by real necessity, or by some motive which will not bear investigation. Meanwhile, other American cities will do well to stop, look and listen, before deciding that street-cars, elevators, messenger service, munition factories, and kindred necessities, cannot be maintained without the employment of women. England's experience in this matter has not been altogether happy, nor has the experiment been proved a brilliant success in New York.

Stooping, Not Falling

FROM the shattered tower of a church in Albert, one of France's desolated towns, there hung, until a few weeks ago, a beautiful statue of the Maiden Mother holding the Divine Child. Before the war the figure stood upright on the church's dome, and raised aloft the little Saviour. "He was held by her high above the town," remarks the Rev. Mr. Tiplady, a Methodist chaplain at the front, "as if to receive the worship of mankind, and His arms were outspread in blessing." But a German shell struck the statue, it fell over, and "remained hanging halfway over the street, so that passers-by could see above them the outspread arms of Jesus. To some it is the picture of a falling Christ. To others it is the picture of a Christ who stoops to bless the oppressed and afflicted."

To an unbeliever like Arnold Bennett, the falling statue would, perhaps, suggest "the fall of the Christian religion," an authentic "event" which, he thinks, "in importance far transcends the war itself." But to Mr. Tiplady the Babe in His mother's arms is not falling at all; He is only stooping. For he well observes:

> Most of us felt alarmed for Christianity when the war broke out. We were alarmed as the good Catholics of Albert were when they saw the statue of the Virgin and Child fall from its upright position. It seemed as if it were falling to the ground. If Christ ruled on high could such atrocities happen in Belgium? . . . Then came the magnificent and voluntary rally to the flag in defense of Belgium. As we saw our young men march out to die for others, freely and without compulsion, we saw again the Cross on Calvary, and we knew that Christ was sleeping in no Syrian grave but dwelling in the hearts of our gallant brothers and inspiring them to follow in His steps. . . . We saw that Christianity had stooped from the sky to the street. It had become incarnate. . . . It had become a practical thing, something to live and die for. We could not pass along the commonest street without seeing a vision of the Babe who came to bring peace and goodwill to men by living and dying for them. Christ had not fallen, He had stooped and stooped in order to bless.

So far from having failed, Christianity has gained immensely since the war began. The increasing number of converts to Catholicism, the religious revival noted everywhere, the restored sense of the relative value of things temporal and eternal, a sense which had been obscured by the witchery of trifles and the demands of pleasure, the recourse to prayer in the trenches and at home for Divine protection against danger, the tremendous influence exercised by the Holy Father, the increase in bigotry, which has been fanned into a flame by the inroads made into infidelity by the Faith: all these testify to an awakening of men's minds to spiritual things and a turning of their hearts to the truth. The highest expression of peace terms has re-echoed Christian ideals. Wealth, power, self-indulgence, progress and force have had their day and failed; and, standing amid the ruins of materialism, men, consciously or unconsciously, are longing for the return of the golden age when Christian principles shall rule the world and sordid selfishness shall cease. The signs are clear. The world will be better after the war, better because less pagan, more Christian.

The Chaplain's Military Value

A PERIODICAL so rabid in its hatred of everything Catholic that no man, except perhaps the more ignorant Freemasons, would take its remarks on such subjects seriously, has recently asked with considerable heat, why Catholic chaplains are appointed in such numbers. The answer is not far to seek. It is a matter of justice. The Government is determined to give Catholics their just proportion. This is the all-sufficient ground on which Catholics rest their claim. But aside from this, there are two other reasons which commend themselves to the fair mind. The Catholic soldier asks it, and the country wishes it.

Every one is anxious to grant a dying man's last request. The Catholic soldier's last request is that at the moment of death a priest may be at hand to lighten his way to eternity. He does not ask for safe non-combatant service at home or abroad, he wishes to be sent to the front and to get into the thick of the fray as soon as possible. He is not afraid or unwilling to lay down his life for his friends. All he demands is that before he goes into battle and after he has fallen, he may be given the consolations of his religion. No one has put his case more forcibly than Mr. John C. Ten Eyck, a non-Catholic, in a speech made on the occasion of the Knights of Columbus drive, a portion of which has already been quoted in AMERICA:

> There can be no conscience so accusing as the conscience of a non-Catholic who has permitted a Catholic boy to die without the last rites of his own Faith. We Protestants are not so blind as not to know that Catholics love their Faith above all other possessions; therefore we Protestants must give those Catholic boys in their hour of trial what they ask. No honest American can question that this is the only way to help those boys, and it is our duty to provide all they need. If the sacrifice is great we still must make it, for nothing that we can do, whatever our beliefs may be concerning their beliefs, bears comparison to the sacrifices that they are making for us.
> It is no business of mine to challenge the most sacred convictions of those boys as they lie with broken bodies and anguished souls in pools of their own blood, shed for me and mine, but it is my business to see to it that all their demand is given to them. We Protestants are not blind enough not to know that the Catholic soldier whose conscience is at peace with God is a dauntless soldier, whose faith in the life after life is greater than his fear of death.

The least that all of us can and should do who stay safely at home reaping the fruit of our young men's sacrifice of life, is to grant them the one thing they ask. There is another consideration which should appeal to every patriotic heart. We want to win the war, we are making immense sacrifices to win it, and it is extremely short-sighted for any one to let his religious prejudice deprive our army of one of its chief supports. The influence of religion is one of the most powerful ways of inspiring, maintaining and increasing the soldier's morale and personal heroism. The Freemasons in the United States are not likely to question the testimony of a brother-Mason in France on this subject. Such an authority is quoted by P. Gény, S.J. in an article on the French chaplains in the Civiltà Cattolica for January 8, 1916 (Vol. I., p. 202). Noting the fact that the Masonic persecution of the Church, which is raging in the civil portions of France, is conspicuous by its absence at the front, he says:

> To this fact I can give the weight of my own personal experience. One day I wished to offer my services to a Colonel who was a Freemason. I was unknown to him, but presented myself and made my proposal. This was received with pleasure. "I have many soldiers," said the Colonel, "habituated to the practice of religion, but hitherto I have been prevented by circumstances from satisfying their desires. Go, therefore, I shall be happy to have you do so." And without making any profession of faith or non-faith, he added that, considering the relation which religion bears to military affairs, he did not hesitate to pronounce it the most powerful foundation and support of discipline and heroism.

The Government of the United States, apparently, is of the same opinion as the Colonel in question. This being the case, it is a patriotic duty to eliminate individual prejudice and strive to afford Catholics this efficacious means of making them better soldiers and more courageous defenders of their country. To do anything else is to harm the cause which we all have so much at heart.

Christ in Home and Society

THE reformation of society must begin with the reformation of the home. The unit of society is the family, and as the family, so the State. There is no balm in Gilead that can heal the wounds from which humanity is suffering today save the love and mercy reserved for us in the Heart of Christ. There is no salvation for mankind save through a return to Him. But where shall this renewal of society begin except within the home? The great crusade against evil must finally be won not in the parliaments of the earth nor on the battle-fields of the nations, but in the narrower circuit of the family circle. If Christ is reigning here, if the love of His Sacred Heart is here enthroned, if He is King of hearth and home, then will He be triumphant, too, throughout the land, without a battle fought or a trumpet sounded.

Very fittingly, therefore, the League's intention for June is the consecration of families to the Sacred Heart of Jesus. For the mighty conflict of today is not only that which is waged upon the blood-drenched areas that tremble with the shock of cannonry and are swept with blasts of bullets and shells. It is also against the sacredness of the home that the great battle of our day is fought. More awful than the sight of forests torn and shattered, more pitiful than mighty cities wasted and laid low, more terrible than the thought of once-smiling towns and villages whereof no vestige has been left, are homes made desolate because Christ is exiled from them. For what is the sum of the world's purely physical wo, after all, compared to the everlasting loss of grace for even one immortal soul? What then shall be said about the state of a home made Godless by modern infidelity, rent by the evil of divorce, or deprived, for no lawful reason, of the ringing laughter of the children that should echo there? Yet how many the homes where darkness broods without one gleam of faith or hope, and where charity lies cold among the embers! Here, then, the great renewal must begin, and it must begin first of all within our own Catholic homes. It is not enough that our individual lives are consecrated through religion. Our families, too, must be filled and imbued with that Divine life that Christ has come to bring upon the earth, with that love and zeal that burn within His Sacred Heart.

Hence the earnest wish, so urgently expressed by the Holy Father, that every Catholic family should be solemnly consecrated to the Heart of Our Divine Lord, that emblem of His boundless love for all mankind, that living source of purity in which the world can be regenerated in the grace of God. Openly and conspicuously, therefore, the image of that Sacred Heart should be enthroned in our homes where the family circle daily gathers; the eyes of all must frequently rest upon it and their hearts should be often lifted up to Christ Himself. The consecration of all the family's members should then and there be made by its head. The prescribed act, it is directed, should be recited with the family by the pastor or some other priest who has previously blessed the picture or statue. Yet even here the Ordinary may decide whether it will not suffice for a lay person to recite the act before an image previously blessed.

But whether a priest can be had or not, whether the picture or statue can even be blessed or not, no circumstances should prevent a family from enthroning the image of the Sacred Heart and making a solemn act of consecration. Yet so far as lies within our power we should seek to conform with the desire of the Church and fulfil the conditions imposed for the gaining of the indulgences. So will every Catholic home become a center of living love and zeal unto the enkindling of the entire world with the charity of Christ.

Literature

EDGAR ALLAN POE

THE last word about Poe was said in 1848. Criticism, since then, more voluminous than of any other American author, has only explained, not corrected, Lowell's well-known analysis in his "Fable for Critics":

"There comes Poe with his Raven, like Barnaby Rudge,
Three-fifths of him genius, and two-fifths mere fudge."

These two elements form the beginning and end of all appreciations of Poe. If the critical mind sacrifices the one out of enthusiasm for the other, it betrays itself into absurdity. With no humorous intent, Mr. Campbell, in the introduction to his complete and scholarly edition of Poe's poems (Ginn) has enumerated some such one-sided opinions. Mr. Campbell refers only to the poems; an equally extreme divergence exists in regard to the tales. Professor Saintsbury, for example, places Poe "in the first order of poets," while Mr. W. D. Howells dubs him "the jingle man." "Poe appeals to the feelings with a force that has never been surpassed," declares Professor Minto; but Professor Barrett Wendell pronounces him "fantastic and meretricious throughout." R. H. Stoddard states that "unlike many poets, he affects all who are capable of being touched by poetry," whereas Henry James describes his poems as "very valueless verse," and concludes that "an enthusiasm for Poe is the mark of a decidedly primitive stage of reflection." According to their point of view, they either gloss over the genius, or forget the fudge. The truth lies in the combination; for Poe weights his best work with fudge, and saves his worst by the sure strokes of genius.

The accounts which Poe has given of himself increase the difficulty of laying definite fingers on him. To prove himself as brilliant in philosophy and science as in literature, he attempted to reveal the secret of eternity by his prose-poem "Eureka." He considered himself the supreme arbiter of American literature, the critic whose word could make or unmake the scribbling author. He encouraged the belief that he was a spontaneous poet, who dashed off masterpieces in a single mood of inspiration. He professed to have traveled extensively in his earlier years, and at a ridiculously young age to have composed some of his best poems. In a hundred poses, he struts his little stage and thunders back his own applause. His genius is undeniable; so is his fudge. He did not realize that his claim of immortality rested neither on his scientific nor his philosophical speculations. Far from making or unmaking others by his critical decisions, he unmade himself. He may, at times, have been an inspired, but never a spontaneous poet. The "limae labor" was such a passion with him that "The Raven," which he declared "proceeded to its completion with the precision and rigid consequence of a mathematical problem," appeared in fifteen different forms. His travels were in the "realms of gold." Poe's ignorance of himself was as piteous as his vanity was absurd. He was wounded by Lowell's estimate, because it did not credit him with six-fifths genius. His intense imagination starved itself on introspective musings. His keen intellect, probably the most brilliant of his day, was undisciplined and distorted by false principles. His high ideals and noble aspirations were founded on a watery will. Only once, late in life, he withdrew from himself long enough to confess, "My life has been whim, impulse and passion."

Popular opinion has always regarded Poe with favor; academic analysis looks aslant at his defects. The people of his day, like our own cinematographic populace, are won by effects and carried away by sense impression. The pedant, however, gives ether to the impression and dissects the effect. He examines its moral trend, weighs it by true artistic standards, lays bare its artifices, and separates it into its elements. Of Poe's slender volume of poetry, even popular opinion chooses less than a dozen poems for its anthologies. But these it rates as the best in our literature. No American poem was received so enthusiastically nor has been quoted so everlastingly as "The Raven"; no poem has haunted the minds of three generations so persistently as "The Bells"; none has ever produced the same illusion as "Ullalume." Popular opinion is fascinated by the irresistible flow of his lines, by the bewitching, sonorous melody of his rhythm, by the recurrent refrain, by the weird setting and indefinite atmosphere.

His tales are perhaps more popular even than his poems. He sensed the popular craving for utter awfulness and weird mystery, and fully did he satisfy it. He repeatedly declared that he wished not so much to tell a story as to produce an effect. In his mind this meant that he must startle, induce nervous prostration, and make the flesh creep. He is the black magician who plunges us into the chamber of horrors, with its fiendish torments and blood-curdling atrocities. At other times he leads us into the madhouse, and parades his creatures with their haunted consciences, depraved mentality and criminal degeneracy. Still the magician, in other tales he baffles us with mysterious documents and cryptograms and murders, or carries us on the wings of imagination beyond the wildest dreams of the visionary. Even his humor is touched with the horrible and whimsical and grim. Popular taste reveling in such sensations, reads Poe with absorbing interest.

Poe wrought his greatest effects by his mastery of technique. In his poems, he is accused of intrenching on the domain of music; in his tales, by the cadence of his sentences and his vivid imagery, he becomes poetic. In the latter, he is graphic in his descriptions, deft in shedding an atmosphere, the master of the climax and powerful in his dramatic situations. Lingering over every minute phase of character and place in the earlier pages of his tales, he leisurely prepares his stage and sets his scenery. In the dénouement, not a word is wasted, till the full force of the plot bursts forth with the vehemence of the unexpected. By gaining this "singleness and totality of effect," on which he placed such insistence, he formed the short-story into a distinct literary type. His precepts remain classic, and are fundamental in the short-story writing of our day.

By his theory of poetry, and it was one of the few consistent things in his life, his poetry stands condemned. He attained his poetic ideal for he was a master workman, but his ideal was unsound. By way of negation, he doubted whether a long poem were not a paradox, and a dramatic poem, a contradiction in terms. Emotion was not essential, passion might be discarded, thought must be sacrificed, if discordant with beauty. Moralizing and didacticism were abominations. "For the metaphysical poets, as poets, I have the most sovereign contempt." The immediate object of poetry, he claims, is an indefinite pleasure that arises from the music of expression, an essential element, and "that intense and pure elevation of the soul—Beauty." In its supreme development, beauty is melancholy, caused by the death of a beautiful woman. "I would define, in brief, the poetry of words as the rhythmical creation of beauty. Its sole arbiter is Taste. With the intellect or with conscience it has only collateral relations; unless incidentally, it has no connection whatever with duty or truth."

The noblest poetry cannot be written in accordance with such a theory. Poe failed, therefore, in sustained effort, placed too great insistence on pure music and excessive rhyming, was dim, vague and restricted in his subject-matter, portrayed a sorrow that is almost grotesque, lacked intense, warm feeling and betrayed an utter absence of thought. It has been said that Poe never penned an immoral line; he is, nevertheless, morally vicious. In his tales, he insists on criminality and depraved instincts; in his poems he inculcates a sorrow that leads to melancholy, morbidness and despair. Nowhere has he that elevating tone of nobility, of heroism, of sublime aspiration and spiritual sacrifice that uplifts the soul to God and the higher life. True beauty does not flourish amidst the morbidness and desolation of the underworld.

Poe's critical works have the interest, not the value of antiques. They prove the accuracy and acumen of his critical faculty, but they reveal his two cardinal defects. He was microscopic and venomous. If he was satisfied that the author was not a plagiarist, he limited his remarks to the minutiæ of grammar and rhetoric. But his tone was bitter, aggressive and caustic. He estranged his friends and incensed his enemies. His onslaughts against the New York Literati and his venom against the New England Transcendentalists, and his pet aversion, the North American Review, were turned back on himself in overheaped measure. The combined counter-attacks are responsible for the exaggerated accounts of his moral failings, and the tardy appreciation given even his best work. After the span of years, when his jarring originality loses its harshness, his criticisms lose their sting, and his moral life becomes rather an object of pity, we judge him more kindly. We are gradually adopting the opinion long current in Europe, where Poe is considered the greatest, if not most typical, American genius.

Religious Profession. A Commentary on a Chapter of the New Code of Canon Law. By HECTOR PAPI, S.J., Professor of Canon Law, Woodstock College. New York: P. J. Kenedy & Sons. $1.00.

The name of Hector Papi, S.J., appended to any treatise on Canon Law is a guarantee of thoroughness, accuracy and scholarship; for undoubtedly he ranks among the foremost canonists of the United States. Certainly the assiduity and confidence with which the highest ecclesiastical authorities in this country have sought his opinion on the difficult questions connected with his specialty, have long since accorded him this distinction, if indeed they have not, as many are inclined to think, placed him in a class apart. Aside, therefore, from the intrinsic value of the commentary just published, the appearance of the first book he has given to the general public, though not by any means his first printed book, has a very special importance, in that it shows Father Papi has at last consented to be a "living author." It is also very gratifying to read his announcement of the appearance of a subsequent volume on the moral aspects of the religious vows. If Father Papi continues to write on such subjects in English, he will soon become for American readers, what Father Ferreres, S.J., has long been for Spain, a distinguished and authoritative interpreter of past and current ecclesiastical legislation.

"Religious Profession" has an interest both for all religious and for those who contemplate assuming the obligations of the religious life, while superiors and priests entrusted with the direction of convents and the duty of giving advice as to vocations should have it practically by heart. It covers in clear, satisfactory fashion all the matter prescribed by the Code, and besides explaining the regulations retained from the old, it elucidates the changes that have been made in the new legislation. The question of the legal and canonical effects of the vow of poverty and the disposition of property are especially important. It is a handy little volume, not a word being wasted, nor a detail omitted. As the new Code is now in operation, Father Papi's book should be procured at once by those whom it concerns. It deserves hearty recommendation.

Essentials of Formal Logic. By MICHAEL J. MAHONY, S.J. New York: The Encyclopedia Press. $0.80.

To bestow a generous alms on a needy man is commendable; to make him self-supporting and independent is still better. Useful knowledge is admittedly a valuable possession, and the man who communicates it deserves high praise. But so to train a human mind that henceforth, by dint of its own efforts, it will be able to explore with ease and pleasure the vast fields of knowledge, and to discern accurately between truth and error, is beyond all doubt a most praiseworthy achievement. Such mental drill and development is the aim of formal logic. In consequence, every least effort to teach men to think and to act logically is to be encouraged. For those who enjoy the leisure to pursue a complete course in such mind-formation, we already possess excellent and exhaustive treatises in English. The present modest little volume has been compiled for beginners in the study of philosophy. It comprises all the essentials of the subject. Conciseness is aimed at throughout and controverted points are judiciously omitted. In matter as well as in style of treatment, the author closely adheres to approved Latin manuals. The volume opens with a few apt preliminary notions about the nature and division of philosophy, its cultural and ethical value, and its intimate relations to Divine revelation. The concept of logic is then neatly unfolded, and its subdivisions are suggested. As major or material logic is now generally treated as a distinct branch of philosophy known as epistemology or criteriology, Father Mahony confines himself in the present volume to formal logic. And because it pertains to formal logic to investigate our mental operations in their relation to correct thinking, and since reasoning involves judgments, and judgments involve ideas, Father Mahony treats in turn of each of these mental processes, and of their outward expression in language. The volume closes with two brief chapters on method. The book is arranged and bound attractively. In the hands of an experienced teacher who will develop and exemplify what is here set down briefly but clearly, it will foster correct thinking and serve as an introduction to the study of scholastic philosophy. An index would render the volume yet more serviceable.

Roving and Fighting: Adventures Under Four Flags. By Major EDWARD S. O'REILLY. Illusrated with Photographs. The Century Company, $2.00.

In the foreword the author of this volume sets down a modest purpose in promising merely to relate "the truthful tale of a vagabond soldier as it might be told across the camp-fire." The narrative that brings us around the world, is teeming with incidents that are unusual but the reader's interest is not held because there is too much mere narration and little attempt to give the writer's viewpoint. The last chapters of the book are reminiscences of the recent Mexican trouble. This is the most satisfactory part of the book. The pictures of the various bandits that have held and still hold the power that was once governmental in Mexico, are vivid and necessarily revolting. That the writer appreciates this repulsiveness is clear. What excuse, therefore, could this American have had for accepting a position as major on the staff of the arch-bandit of them all, Pancho Villa?

It is a relief to learn at last that after five years of active service with these outlaws, the author finally decided that "win or lose, the time had gone by when an American could conscientiously fight in the personal quarrels between Villa and Carranza." That this conscientious objection to active participation in outlawry did not appeal to this "vagabond soldier" a little earlier, is not a favorable commentary.

Little is said about the causes of the social upheaval in Mexico. In one place, however, readers are told that Villa is the Mexican problem, although they already have been informed that the land question is at the bottom of all the recent revolutionary troubles in Mexico. These two statements are not easily reconciled. The unhappy sentiments that the Major ventured to express in the passages cited may explain the conspicuous absence of comment upon the great causes responsible for the social unrest that ever furnished him an objective for his constant "Roving and Fighting." In the Heart of German Intrigue. By DEMETRA VAKA (Mrs. KENNETH BROWN). With Illustrations. Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. $2.00.

The author of this book, who is a Greek woman, with an American husband, was so sure that King Constantine was not pro-German in his sympathies that she journeyed home on purpose to interview him and his Ministers in order to prove to the world that she was right. Before she left Greece she had long talks with the King, his Cabinet, with Venizelos, and with almost every statesman and soldier of importance there, and was at last forced to own that the King and his Ministers had adopted a pro-German policy, but that those largely to blame for this were the blundering Allies themselves, for they said to Greece: "We cannot promise you your integrity in exchange for your help, because we do not wish to discourage your hereditary enemy [Bulgaria], who covets your lands." The muddling in Downing Street, in the opinion of the author, lost Greece and Constantinople and brought about the subsequent ruin of Serbia and Rumania. It appears that the price paid by the Entente for the adhesion of Italy was that Greece should not receive any concessions in Asia, and that move strengthened the hands of the pro-German party in Athens. King Constantine, moreover, had been permitted to see how great the military power of the Kaiser was when the war began, and that knowledge helped to influence the official attitude of Greece. During her stay in Athens, and in Salonika, Mrs. Kenneth-Brown worked hard for days and days interviewing statesmen of all hues of opinion, and the results of her investigations she presents to the readers in this interesting book. Face to Face with Kaiserism. By JAMES W. GERARD. Late Ambassador to the German Imperial Court. New York: George H. Doran Co. $2.00.

This volume, which the author wishes to be considered a continuation of his preceding book, "My Four Years in Germany," covers pretty much the same ground as the former work and bears many a weaker "sequel's" marks. The most important chapters are the Ambassador's diary which he kept from June, 1915, to January, 1917, and now publishes. Mr. Gerard is still of the opinion that the Kaiser was forced to start the war by the German military party, and states on the authority of a prominent bank president that the General Staff threatened to break their swords unless William issued the order for mobilization. There are good sketches in the volume of the life led by the Prussian Junkers and of the Crown Prince's personality and influence. At an interview Mr. Gerard had with Alphonso XIII at Madrid at 11.00 a. m., the King mixed his guest a cocktail saying: "I understand that you American gentlemen always drink in the morning." Mr. Gerard believes that the Spaniards harbor no spirit of revenge against us because of the 1898 war, and that Spain has really benefited by the loss of Cuba and the Philippines. From what he heard in Germany, Mr. Gerard has no doubt that if we had not entered the war, we should have been forced to fight the Kaiser single-handed after he had conquered the Allies, so the author devotes many pages of his volume to the task of making his American readers realize what a tremendous but absolutely necessary undertaking the overthrow of German militarism is. BOOKS AND AUTHORS

A charming series of short stories that will appeal to every lover of the famous "fighting Sixty-ninth" now in France, and to all who have a drop of Irish blood in their fortunate veins, is "Long Ever Ago" (Harper, $1.40), by Rupert Hughes. Perhaps the religious element might have been stressed more notably, yet it is brought out with sufficient fidelity to fact in the one priest who moves across these stories, and in the working girl, who, however worn out after the week's work, never failed to be present at Sunday Mass. Where so much is good, it is distasteful to point out faults, but it is only brotherly charity to suggest that the last tale of the series, spun from a threadbare theme, adds nothing to the interest and general wholesomeness of Mr. Hughes' book.——"Gold and Iron" (Knopf, $1.50), by Joseph Hergesheimer, is written in a style reminiscent of a diluted Jack Londonism. The author has an uncanny genius for the unpleasant.——"The Secret of the Marne" (Putnam, $1.50), by Marcel and Maude Berger is something of an imposition, for the reader discovers, after a few chapters, that what seems to be a veracious account of "How Sergeant Fritsch Saved France" is only an impossible piece of fiction.

Mr. Julian Street chanced to find on the Burge plantation near Covington, Georgia, not long ago, "A Woman's War-Time Journal" (Century, $0.60), written by Dolly Sumner Lunt, while Sherman was on his famous march to the sea. She was the widowed mother of a little girl and the owner of a hundred slaves, who worked the plantation, and in her diary she vividly records the consternation the approach of the Union army caused, tells how she tried to conceal from the marauders everything of value she had, and describes thus the plundering of her plantation:

> I hastened back to my frightened servants and told them they had better hide, and then went back to the gate to claim protection and a guard. But like demons they rush in! My yards are full. To my smoke-house, my dairy, pantry, kitchen and cellar. Like famished wolves they come, breaking locks and whatever is in their way. The thousand pounds of meat in my smoke-house is gone in a twinkling, my flour, my meat, my lard, butter, eggs, pickles of various kinds—both in vinegar and brine—wine, jars and jugs are all gone. My eighteen fat turkeys, my hens, chickens, and fowls, my young pigs, are shot down in my yard and hunted as if they were rebels themselves. Utterly powerless I ran out and appealed to the guard. "I cannot help you, madam; it is orders."

The plantation escaped being burned, however, and its owner was treated with respect by the Union soldiers. Compared with von Kluck's invasion of Belgium, Sherman's march through Georgia seems to have been a highly chivalrous affair.

In "Universal Service, the Hope of Humanity" (Sturgis & Walton, $1.25), by L. H. Bailey, a solution of world-problems on the basis of personal and voluntary coöperation is proposed. "Its principle of union will be the love of the earth, treasured in the hearts of men and women." It is an appeal "to contribute to the public welfare, to furtherance of law and order, to support of government." Universal and individual coöperation as opposed to segregated organization and monopoly is the author's theme, and though it is interspersed with various pertinent truths, as a whole it is rather loosely developed.——"The Secret Press in Belgium" (T. Fisher Urwin), by Jean Massart, gives interesting data on the clandestine publication and distribution of newspapers, pamphlets, books, picture postcards, etc., in defiance of and in protest against the German censorship of Belgian journals in the occupied territory. It is edited and printed by a staff of willing helpers. The mystery of its appearance, on a necessarily none too regular schedule, baffles the military government's attempts at solution. Heavy penalties of fines and imprisonments attend the guilt of even reading these patriotic newspapers. They are read nevertheless, and by thousands, being passed on from hand to hand.

Patriotic housewives will doubtless be interested in such books as Maria McIlvaine Gilmore's "Economy Cook Book" (Dutton, $1.00), Amy L. Handy's "War-Time Breads and Cakes" (Houghton Mifflin, $0.75), and Florence Nesbitt's "Household Management" (Russell Sage Foundation, $0.75.) The first of the volumes mentioned is "designed to take the place among recipe books that the Ford does among automobiles." None of the recipes in the second book call for white flour. The author of the third volume who is a director of food conservation in Cleveland gives practical counsels to those who undertake to teach poor and inexperienced wives how to manage a household thriftily and yet keep husband and little ones healthy and robust. For those who are accustomed to find at the domestic card-table some relief from economic problems, R. F. Foster, the bridge expert, has prepared "A Complete Exposition of the Latest Developments of Modern Auction" (Dutton, $2.00).

This "Lullaby of a Woman of the Mountain" is one of the finest lyrics in the "Collected Works of Padraic H. Pearse":

Little gold head, my house's candle,
You will guide all wayfarers that walk this mountain.

Little soft mouth that my breast has known,
Mary will kiss you as she passes.

Little round cheek, O smoother than satin,
Jesus will lay His hand on you.

Mary's kiss on my baby's mouth,
Christ's little hand on my darling's cheek!

House, be still, and ye little grey mice,
Lie close tonight in your hidden lairs.

Moths on the window, fold your wings,
Little black chafers, silence your humming.

Plover and curlew, fly not over my house,
Do not speak, wild barnacle, passing over this mountain.

Things of the mountain that wake in the night-time,
Do not stir tonight till the daylight whitens!

Father Stephen J. Brown, S.J., of Clongowes Wood College, Kildare, has in preparation a new edition of his "Ireland in Fiction," which he is eager to make as complete as possible. Subjoined is a list of Irish novels and stories about which no information has as yet been obtained. Readers of AMERICA who have a copy of any of the books sought for would render a great service by communicating with the compiler:

EDUCATION

The Priest and the Parish School

IT is an authority of no mean rank who tells us that it is more profitable to feel compunction than to know its definition. Similarly, it is better to descend into the practical, eschewing theory for the while, and build schoolhouses all over the land, than to withdraw into the academic coolness of one's study, there to excogitate elaborate treatises on the necessity of education. We American Catholics have ever been of a pragmatical cast. On education, as on art and science, on the history of education, we have never found time to write much. Our hands are calloused, our fingers better acquainted with bricks and mortar than with pens and paper. But our parochial schools and academies, our colleges and universities, tell what value we, a people not rich in the goods of this world, set upon education. We have written, not in vaunting words, but in deeds that remain.

The brick and mortar period is now passing. With energy unslackened, we are coming into those quieter days that give leisure for a review of what has been done, and for the elaboration of wider plans for the future, plans growing out of experience garnered from the past. We are fortunate in having so calm, yet so incisive, a critic as Dr. J. A. Burns, C.S.C., Ph.D., whose "Catholic Education, a Study of Conditions," has recently been published by Longmans. There is no duller mortal than your compiler of statistics, but under Dr. Burns' inspiration, cold figures and dusty records become vivid pictures of actual conditions.

The Extent of the Work

WHAT will strike the reader at once, is the universality of Catholic education in this country. There are Catholic schools in every State, and in some States a complete system, ranging from the kindergarten to universities so complete as Notre Dame, St. Louis and Marquette. In many States, they are considerably older than the public schools, and in some, Kentucky, for example, our teaching Sisterhoods had a fairly comprehensive normal-school course long before the professional training of teachers was undertaken by the civil authorities. No nationality, no class, is neglected. There are the grade schools and, in some instances, more advanced schools, for French, Italians, Germans, Poles, Spaniards, Bohemians, Slovaks, Greeks, Syrians, Belgians and Indians, all of which form a peculiarly effective agency for the Americanization of the immigrant child. Special schools are conducted for retarded children, although this is a field which, it must be allowed, has not received the attention warranted by its importance, as well as institutions for the deaf and dumb, and for the blind. The extent of this educational work becomes more apparent when it is remembered that "Two distinct types of institutions for both secondary and higher education are maintained, for coeducation does not exist in Catholic colleges or universities, and in secondary education it is found only in the smaller schools."

The statistics quoted by Dr. Burns are for the year 1915, and show an enrollment of 1,456,206 pupils in 5,488 elementary schools. These schools engage about 36,000 teachers, nine-tenths of whom are religious belonging to 275 Religious Orders or Congregations. Of these teachers, approximately ninety-three per cent are women. The schools of secondary grade are about 1,300 in number with 74,538 pupils, and our 84 colleges register 14,846 students. In the colleges for girls "there are at least 1,000 students."

The Lambs Outside the Fold

NOW this is an excellent record, one of which all Catholics may be proud. Pride, however, is to be tolerated only if it is a spur to greater achievement. It is deadly when it leads to complete satisfaction with what has been accomplished. Leaving the colleges and universities aside, I have long felt that in our parish-school work we have only made a good beginning. One likes to listen to the rounded periods of the commencement-day orator, who discourses volubly on "the magnificent work of American Catholics in education." We nod with approbation, for that work, as far as it goes, is magnificent. But when the fervor incited by the orator passes, there is a sudden and lasting chill in the thought that about six of every ten Catholic children are in anti-Catholic or non-Catholic schools. The Catholic ideal was well expressed in the slogan adopted last year by the Catholic Educational Association, "Every Catholic Child in a Catholic School." Until we reverse the present proportion, and place at least six out of every ten Catholic children in Catholic schools, it is not time to raise our voices in psalms of victory. For we are still in the house of bondage, in the darkness of the land of Egypt.

Dr. Burns finds the main cause of this condition in two facts. The first is immigration. Our schools are simply unable "to accommodate at once the vast number of Italian and other immigrant children arriving every year." The second fact is that "probably one-fourth or even one-third of the entire number of Catholic children of school age" are in towns and villages in which, because of the fewness of Catholics and their poverty, the parish school cannot exist. Dr. Burns holds out no optimistic hopes for the future. Until immigration ceases, and Catholics become more numerous in the localities in question, he believes that "It is not likely there will be much change in the above proportion."

The Chief Shepherd

NO doubt there is much truth in this diagnosis, but other causes, more under our control, it seems to me, should not be forgotten. In parishes where, for one cause or another, the Catholic ideal, "Every Catholic Child in a Catholic School," has been allowed to grow dim, the school is likely to be anything but a strong social and religious force. For this, we priests must bear our share of responsibility, perhaps the largest share. If we wink at, or bear in silence, the spectacle of Mrs. Newlyrich, nee O'Connor, who enters little Gwendolyne at Miss Richardardson's fashionable school on the Avenue, we may be sure that Mrs. Newlyrich's example will prove contagious among those of her kind who burden our parish by their presence. We may also be sure that, ultimately, Mrs. O'Brien, who takes in washing, will hear of this wink of ours, and in her humble way emulate her alleged betters, by sending Patrick and Honoria to P. S. No. 35, where "Everything is free and the principal is such a dear man." We had our reasons, no doubt, for our silent tolerance, but to Mrs. O'Brien, who must figure down to the last penny, they are not quite clear.

Furthermore, it is not hard to forget that the same Baltimore Council which insisted in such moving terms on the necessity of putting every Catholic child in a Catholic school, also insisted that our educational authorities bring our Catholic schools to a high grade of excellence. I know one Catholic father who refused point-blank to send his boy to the parish school, on the ground that it was in no valid sense a "school." In his opinion, it was a mob, herded in a dirty building, under a leaky roof. Perhaps there are other schools of this kind, and hence similar fathers, and hence, again, more Catholic children in non-Catholic schools. I am well aware that for me, who have never known the heat and burden of the day, which for years has been the unrelieved portion of many a parish priest, it is only a matter of using my fingers to type out line after line of cool, aloof, and pointless criticism. Nor do I admit for a moment that our parish schools, taking them as a whole, are inferior to the public schools. On the contrary, I think that their general superiority is a fact capable of demonstration. Yet if we slacken for a moment—and how easy it is to slacken!—in the task of keeping our schools up to the standard in teachers, curriculum and equipment, our superiority will soon be not a fact, but a vanishing memory.

Technical Knowledge Needed

AS conditions now are and are likely to remain, the parish school is very much what the pastor, or his delegated assistant, makes it. Moreover, unless our present method changes, the majority of our priests, at least of the diocesan clergy, will be more or less intimately connected with the work of the parochial school. That is, the welfare of the Catholic school will be conditioned, not only by their personal piety and their zeal, which may be taken for granted, but by their technical knowledge. We look for a great deal of this knowledge in our public-school superintendents today, and quite frequently we get it. I am not quite so sure that we have seriously undertaken the task of fitting our junior clergy to do for the parish school, when their time comes, what the highly trained superintendent is expected to do, and very often does, for the public institution committed to his charge. Perhaps we shall find the best solution by entrusting this charge not to a busy priest, but to a competently trained layman.

Many other points suggested by Dr. Burns are well worthy of our attention, and I hope to present some of them in these pages. I am not doing this under the impression that I can improve upon Dr. Burns, but simply in the hope that the discussion may lead every Catholic, interested in our schools—and that ought to mean every Catholic who can read—to purchase and study Dr. Burns' book.

ECONOMICS

"National Kitchens"

FROM time to time, I have called attention to the interesting social experiments that are being made in England in the process of adjusting the life of the people to war conditions. Many of these will result in what were temporary expedients becoming, after the war, recognized economic agencies of permanent value. Among such developments the co-operative kitchens are of special interest. They were first known as "communal kitchens," but as "communal" is a word that suggests foreign Socialism, it soon went out of fashion. They are now known in some places by the more appropriate term of "central kitchens," in others as "national kitchens." But the name does not much matter, provided only that one name is avoided which has unpleasant and misleading associations.

Purpose and Plan

SUCH a central kitchen must never be known as a "soup kitchen," even though soup figures prominently on its daily menu. One of the difficulties that the organizers of the new kitchens had to face was to persuade the workers that the food depots they were establishing were not "soup kitchens." In England, in the years before the war, the soup kitchen was a relief institution temporarily organized when a hard winter produced exceptional unemployment and poverty. Soup being one of the easiest foods to prepare in large quantities at a cheap rate, a shop or a shed was equipped with a soup-boiler, and soup and bread were either distributed free on the applicant producing tickets of recommendation, or were sold at a non-profit rate; the expense being met by opening a subscription fund. To go to such a place for a meal was a confession of poverty, from which the average worker shrank unless under the pressure of hard necessity.

The new kitchens of today are of a completely different class. There is no question of poor relief. Their object is economic and efficient distribution of available supplies and saving of much home work under exceptional conditions. With tens of thousands of women working in factories and offices, the question of cooking at home, and even the preliminary question of marketing to buy the materials of a meal, became a serious problem in many households. Hence the idea of concentrating the supplies and the cooking in central kitchens, and enabling the housewife to buy a meal ready-cooked, or needing only the small amount of cooking required to restore whatever warmth it had lost in transfer from the kitchen to the home. It would mean an economy of time, labor and fuel, and with good management, in most cases, the further gain of supplying a better and more varied fare than the small household could itself contrive. Such meals can be supplied at a lower cost without any money loss to the promoters. Anyone who has had to do with catering on a large scale knows that, with proper organization, the expense of providing a meal for a hundred people from one kitchen is much less than the cost of twenty meals for groups of five people each cooked in twenty different kitchens.

A Cooperative Basis

IN Germany, a highly organized country, the movement for central kitchens in the large towns began in the first year of the war. According to a writer, who has described the German system in the Quarterly Review, there were by January, 1917, no less than 2,200 such kitchens in Germany, distributing 2,500,000 meals daily. In England the movement did not begin till the winter of 1916-17, and the start was made in a few places on a very small scale. Its wider development belongs to the last six months. The first kitchens were started by the voluntary efforts of local enthusiasts, who provided the capital and agreed to waive question of profit, and even accept a loss. But the success of these undertakings led to the Ministry of Food authorizing local authorities to expend funds drawn from the rates in establishing kitchens. They thus became public institutions and could be started on sounder lines.

The whole success of such a work depends upon its being organized on a fairly large scale, and this means a moderately large capital. If provided by benevolent agencies, we get the semi-charitable institution which repels the very class that should take advantage of it. If the money is found by the rate-payers out of the public funds of the district the case is altered. It is then an enterprise on a coöperative basis of self-help. Amateurism means failure. There must be a properly paid cook with a staff of helpers, and a competent director and buyer. An efficient up-to-date cooking plant must be installed, and the use of a convenient central building secured, with, in most cases, the use of other places as auxiliary distributing centers. For in a large district it is found to be best to have the cooking done at one center, and send out the meals to several supply depots, the transport being effected by means of one or more covered motor cars and fitted with shelves and trays, effectually closed and fitted so that there will be no appreciable loss of warmth in the short journey. One of the earliest of these municipal kitchens was established by the Mayor in Hammersmith, a western suburban district of London with a large working-class population. Here there are a central kitchen and nine distributing depots. About 8,000 meals a day are provided, and the system pays its way. At Reading, a successful municipal center, is worked on the same system, and the municipality has issued an interesting record of how the work was established and how it is conducted.

A Practical Instance

ON the border between town and country in the far western suburbs of London, I have watched with interest the starting of the "central kitchen." The district includes under one local council, what may be described as a large town and a large village. In the village, the building belonging to the local authority includes the library, a room let for meetings, a committee room and a large hall with a swimming bath. The cost of heating led to the swimming bath being closed down in the winter. It was then converted into a kitchen, with an up-to-date cooking equipment, and counter for distributing cooked portions. Two other distributing centers were established in the district, one by renting an empty shop, the other by fitting up a room in the council house of the town about a mile and a half away. A motor car was provided to bring supplies and convey cooked meals from the kitchen to the two outlying depots. Posters and handbills were distributed and the scheme was announced from the pulpits of local churches. At the Catholic church, the priest took care to explain that the central kitchen would not be a charitable institution, that anyone might buy food from it just as he would buy it from a shop, and that he himself meant to get some supplies from it for his own table. The menu of the opening day was not very varied. Those who came had, of course, to bring their own cans, bowls and plates to take away what they purchased, and the list of good things included at first only soup at one penny, or two cents, a portion, meat rissoles, and jam sandwiches, at two pence each. But day by day the list was longer and more varied, including soups, meat and fish dishes, puddings and cakes, and portions of stewed fruit. It was possible to have a varied meal at a small cost, much more varied and better cooked than the average worker's kitchen usually produces. The scheme is working well, and many who do not draw upon the central kitchen for a complete meal, use it to supplement the fare provided at home. Prejudice has broken down, and this system of coöperative cooking introduced as a help in an exceptional time, will undoubtedly become a permanent part of local organization in many of our working-class centers when the war is a thing of the past.

NOTE AND COMMENT

The Second Red Cross War Fund Drive

THE RED CROSS has made its second great appeal to the nation. The money contributed in June, 1917, will all be appropriated by July. In one week America had then given more than $100,000,000. The Red Cross's membership at that time was less than 2,000,000. In six months it increased to 5,000,000 and with the Christmas drive it rose, in one supreme effort, to 22,000,000. Special attention deserves to be called to the fact that every dollar given to the Red Cross War Fund goes directly and exclusively to war-relief work. All costs of administration and all expenses incurred for humanitarian work, such as the assistance given in the Halifax and Guatemala disasters, are taken out of the revenue derived from membership dues. We may well believe that when the complete returns for the second $100,000,000 drive have been received it will be found to have far exceeded the mark set for it. The war fund will constantly need to be replenished for "The millions that you gave have but started the work," is the Red Cross appeal. "To keep it up, millions and more millions must be given."

Practical Working of the New Zone System

HOW the new zone law will affect the nation is made manifest from the first announcement of rate changes that enters our office: "Commencing July 1, 1918, the rates for subscription to the Boston Evening Transcript will be changed as per enclosed list," says the notice. In the first and second zone the rates for that particular daily, excluding Sundays and holidays, is $9.00; for the third zone, $10.50; for the fourth zone, $11.00; for the fifth zone, $11.25; for the sixth zone, $11.50; for the seventh zone, $12.00, and for the eighth, $12.50. Strenuous efforts are still being made to have this law repealed, by urging subscribers to bring the matter to the attention of their congressmen. "If I were a pro-German in Congress," writes Ellis Parker Butler, "and knew that California had problems that the Eastern States did not have, such as the Japanese problem, and I wished to weaken the solidarity of the Union so that California would have less and less in common with the other States, I would pass just such a 'zone-system' bill as has been passed." Viewing the question from another angle, Edward Mott Wooley argues that the economic prosperity of the country will greatly suffer by shutting off the trade periodicals.

Last Honors for Famous Catholic Aviator

THE crash of thunder and a deluge of rain did not drive apart the silent multitudes who stood bareheaded, lining Fifth Avenue in New York, as the flag-draped coffin, containing the remains of the noted Italian flier, Captain Antonio Silvio Resnati, was borne on a gun-caisson to St. Patrick's cathedral. Up and down the avenue, over the heads of the waiting thousands, swept the huge Caproni that had so often borne him aloft through the clouds. The sound of its motor could be heard above the thunder "droning a dirge," and flowers rained down from it upon the coffin, wrapped in the folds of the Italian and American flags, and upon the bared heads of the men, women and children in the streets. As the procession reached the cathedral the great Caproni, says the New York Tribune, "Swung in a giant arc about the tall spires and sped off for Mineola." It was there the famous aviator had met with his death in an accident. The following are some further details of the procession, showing in what regard the great airman had been held:

> The Twenty-second Infantry Band led 150 members of that command in full marching equipment. Then came the flowers, fourteen carriages overflowing with them, tokens from hundreds of individuals and groups, from the King of Italy, who sent a simple wreath, to the sobbing woman who threw a bunch of carnations as the carriage passed. A striking piece was a floral airplane of purple flowers, the gift of the Italian newspaper, Il Progresso. A color guard of three, holding high the banner of Resnati's native country, and a group of ten Italian sailors, in two files, directly preceded the gun-carriage and coffin. The pallbearers followed, and after them a brilliant company of 100 high Allied officers, as many American aviators, and the Guarde Republicaine Band of sixty veterans.

Solemn services were held in the presence of an assembly gathered from all the Allied nations such as even St. Patrick's cathedral has seldom witnessed.

Two Successful American Mission Schools

IN the midst of the war cheering reports come to us about our progress in promoting the foreign-mission interests. "Progress in every sphere of our work" is the keynote of the recent report issued at Maryknoll, "The Catholic Foreign Mission Seminary of America." Its gross receipts increased from $50,992.55 in 1912 to $166,789.60 in 1917. It has at present a seminary faculty of ten priests, with a body of twenty-five students of philosophy and theology and ten auxiliary brothers. In its preparatory house, the Vénard Apostolic School at Scranton, Pa., there are thirty-seven youths in high school and college courses. "Aspirants to the Teresians," we are told, "have raised their number to twenty-five, and the matter of accommodations is one of the most immediate concerns." No less cheerful is the progress made by the Society of the Divine Word with its two houses for the education of missionary candidates: St. Mary's Mission House, at Techny, Ill., and the Sacred Heart Mission House at Girard, Pa. The former at present numbers twenty-one Fathers, fifty-two Brothers, 100 candidates in its courses of theology, philosophy and classics, and seventy apprentices. At Techny too is the Holy Ghost Institute conducted by the Congregation of the Missionary Sisters, Servants of the Holy Ghost, who have eleven houses in the United States, including five schools among the colored population of the South.

The Congregation has missions in the Philippine Islands, in Argentina and Brazil, China and Japan, Togo, Mozambique, New Guinea and the Little Sunda Islands. Thus abundant opportunities are now offered our Catholic boys and girls to prepare directly for the missionary's noble calling.

Medicine's Progress in Spain

IT is noted in Science, the weekly journal of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, that seven prizes, having a cash value of more than $8,000, were distributed at the recent annual meeting of the Academia Nacional de Medicina, the National Academy of Medicine at Madrid. The subjects for which these prizes are awarded are those which concern particularly public health and the prevention of disease and the specific themes this year were vaccine therapy, medical geography and epidemics. Some of the conditions under which the prizes are awarded are extremely interesting. One prize every year is conferred upon the professor in the University of Madrid who has contributed most to the progress of science; one of the special medical prizes is reserved for competition among physicians of the city who are married and have children—in the plural, for a single child in the family does not fulfil the condition allowing its father to compete. It is given for the best report on some epidemic. By this is meant that the physician is to suggest the mode of an epidemic's distribution so as to point out how the scourge can be prevented on another occasion, the best means of inhibiting its spread and the treatment features that have seemed of most value. Is there a State in the Union in which there is a corresponding organization of such practical means for securing the greatest possible stimulus for the progress of practical preventive medicine? Spain is usually thought of by Americans as eminently backward, but there are manifestly some phases of Spanish life that might very well be imitated even by progressive Americans.

The Persecuting Latin Freemasonry

IN answer to a critic of his article upon the Latin Freemasonry with which Caillaux was connected, and its efforts to impose upon the world a despotism of atheism and materialism, quoted in AMERICA (May 25), Mr. Charles Johnston adduces further facts in the New York Times for May 12. Referring to the great Masonic scandal which brought about the fall of General André and wrecked the Combes Ministry, he thus sums up the situation as revealed "in column after column, issue after issue, of Le Figaro, Le Matin, Le Temps, and all the great Parisian papers":

> General André, as Minister of War, with the aid of officials of the Grand Orient of France, had organized a gigantic spy system, by means of which Masons affiliated with that body reported on the religious convictions and practices of officers in the army in such terms as these: "Goes regularly to church." "His children are at a religious school." "Is a communicant." "His daughter collected money for a church charity," and so on, officers thus reported on being barred from promotion by the Minister of War, however excellent may have been their military records.
> This had been going on for years. General André had systematically directed his subordinates to seek this kind of information from the Grand Orient, and the Grand Orient had systematically provided it. The documents are here in New York in facsimile: letters on the official note-paper of the Ministry of War, with the visé of the Grand Orient of France stamped on them, addressed to the Grand Secretary of that body, and answered by him—documents by the hundred.

In seeking to explain the attitude of his critic in the face of such overwhelming evidence Mr. Johnston adds that there is likewise another body established in Paris, "affiliated with the Ancient and Accepted Scotch Rite," to which he does not wish to apply his remarks, and to which Caillaux doubtless did not belong.

The Bishop's Sounding Text

IN a recent chapter of John Ayscough's entertaining "Pages from the Past," which are appearing in the Month, he tells this anecdote about Bishop Ullathorne:

> Ullathorne was preaching, or rather about to preach. With impressive deliberation he gave his text, "Domine, non sum dignus." Before he had time to give the English translation of it, a little boy in the sanctuary, to whom, as an habitual server at Mass, the Latin words were familiar, and conveyed "one clear call" for him, seized the gong-hammer and struck a loud and resonant boom. The congregation understood and devoted itself to gravity. The Bishop turned a severe eye toward the sanctuary: turned again to the people and repeated his text with more austerity: "Domine, non sum dignus." The boy, finding the repetition quite in order, struck the gong again. The congregation found solemnity more difficult and more obligatory than before. Dr. Ullathorne's eastward glance was more pregnant with protest and severity. Once again he turned to the people, and a third time, in deeper tones, gave his text, "Domine, non sum dignus." All along the traditionally minded boy had counted on a third time, and punched his gong again. Then the Bishop spoke in the vernacular: "Take," he commanded, "that 'ammer out of that child's 'and."

As there is nothing that gives keener pleasure to the average altar boy than to bang a big sanctuary gong as often and as hard as he can find the least reason for doing so, the foregoing anecdote bears all the mark of a true story.

Oklahoma Supreme Court Holds Altar Wine Legal

A FAR-REACHING decision, which restores to Catholics their full religious right in regard to the use of altar wine for the celebration of the Holy Sacrifice, has just been given by the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma. It reverses the previous holding of District Judge George W. Clark, and represents the united opinion of all the justices who participated in the decision. The court fully admits that according to the letter of the State law the sale and transportation of wine for exclusively sacramental purposes was prohibited, but declares that such an interpretation was neither within the spirit of the law nor within the intention of the law-makers. From many precedents it shows that these latter considerations must be regarded as decisive. In giving the opinion of the Court, Justice J. Owen says:

> The happiness of the people and the good order and preservation of any government must essentially depend upon piety, religion and morality. These cannot be generally diffused throughout a community except by the institution of the public worship of God and of public instruction in piety and religion. We should not impute to the framers of our Constitution, and to the members of Congress who enacted the Enabling act, the intention to prevent or interfere with public worship, under the general terms to suppress the liquor traffic.

Since the evil to be legislated against was intemperance, the Court argues that altar wine could not possibly have been included under the law: "The whole history and life of this nation affirms" that fermented wine used for sacramental purposes "could not have been intentionally legislated against." Such an interpretation, it further holds, would destroy the very purpose of the entire legislation: "The general terms used in the Prohibition section of the Constitution should not be construed to prevent religious worship, and in that manner defeat the very purpose of the act, which was to conserve morality and religion by preventing intemperance and intoxication." By this notable judgment it has, therefore, been finally decided that the shipment of altar wine into Oklahoma is not a violation of the Bone-Dry law, the Enabling act, or the State's Constitution.

Chronicle

The War.—After an artillery bombardment of great intensity the Germans launched their third great offensive of this year on May 27. The front under attack extended for thirty-one miles from the Forest of Pinon, northeast of Soissons, to Brimont, north of Reims. At the time of the attack, the British held the line from Bermericourt, west to Craonne, the French the remainder. At the outset, the British held fast; the brunt of the attack was apparently against the French at the point of juncture with the British. As far as can be made out from the dispatches and the more reliable informations given out by the English and French experts, the French sent about eleven divisions against some sixteen divisions and the British two divisions against four. The Germans, however, threw into the battle heavy reinforcements until they finally had from forty-seven to fifty divisions engaged. The Allied reinforcements were much slower in coming up.

Bulletin, May 27, p.m. June 3, a.m.

In the first plunge forward, the Germans overwhelmed the French in the Valley of the Ailette and overran and captured the Chemin des Dames. By the afternoon of the first day of the drive they had reached the bridge of Arcy on the Aisne. Stubbornly fighting every inch of ground, the French had to retire before the fierce onslaught of the enemy. Their retirement uncovered the British line before Reims, and in order not to lose contact with their allies, the British also had to withdraw. On the left of the line of attack, the French retreat involved the lines before Soissons, and in this part the French had also to fall back in order not to be driven in. The movement brought the Germans up to the gates of Soissons on the northern side.

The naturally strong barrier of the Aisne did not check the foe. They crossed it in force on a wide front and continued their advance toward the little river Vesle. At the same time they extended their lines westward, a movement which practically isolated Soissons, which had to be evacuated by the French, whose lines were withdrawn to the western outskirts of the city. But here the French held fast along the southern bank of the Crise River. In the Reims sector the enemy succeeded in advancing also, although the retirement of the Allies was more a result of the withdrawal of their line to the west than of the German pressure. The French fell back from Brimont to Bétheny and La Neuvillete, to the west bank of the Aisne Canal, where, west of Reims, their line turned west through Thillois.

In the center the Germans moved steadily forward. They crossed the ridge which forms the watershed between the Aisne and the Vesle, forced their way down into the Vesle Valley, crossed the stream at Fismes, took the southern bank, pushing on almost without a halt and by Friday, May 31, after the capture of Fère-en Tardenois, reached the River Marne at Jaulgonne and extended their positions west toward Château-Thierry. Chartèves and Jaulgonne, the southern limit of the German drive on June 2-3, are five and six and a half miles respectively north by northwest of Château-Thierry and about fifty miles from Paris. At this stage of the battle the enemy made no decided effort to cross the Marne but turned his attention to the western flank of the salient and by pressure in force pushed forward along the Ourcq River a little more than six miles beyond Neuilly and Chouy, ten and fifteen miles respectively, northwest of Château-Thierry. Further north in the region between Hartennes and Soissons the enemy encountered the severest resistance, but is spite of heroic efforts the French had to yield ground at Chaudun, Vierzy and Blanzy. At the same time the enemy began his expected attacks against Reims. The latest dispatches reported a slackening in his advance. The German pressure was still westward. Between Vierzy and Château-Thierry, where the west wing of the salient bulges, the enemy made some gains, but the French counter-attacked and regained Longport, Corcy, Troesnes and Hill 163. The French still hold the suburbs south and west of Château-Thierry. In their drive south to the Marne the Germans on June 2 had made a gain of about thirty-five miles. So far the Germans claim to have captured about 45,000 prisoners and about 400 heavy guns with vast stores of military and hospital supplies.

Outside of the field of the drive proper, the American troops distinguished themselves in a local attack made by them on the Avre front, in which they captured the village of Cantigny, northeast of Montdidier and took over 200 prisoners. In spite of heavy attacks our troops held the captured positions.

On May 30 the reorganized Greek army, cooperating with French artillery, launched a heavy blow at the Bulgarian positions near Srka di Legen, on the Struma River front in Macedonia and forced the enemy back on a front of nine miles to a depth of more than a mile. More than 1,500 Bulgarian and German prisoners, including thirty--three officers and a large quantity of war materials, were taken. This is the first important engagement of the Greek army in the war.

The United States transport President Lincoln, homeward bound from European waters, was torpedoed. The casualties were relatively light.

Appearing on May 27 before the Senate and House in joint session, President Wilson urged the enactment at the present session of Congress of legislation to raise additional war revenue. He recommended that war profits, incomes and luxuries be made the chief subjects of taxation. Approaching the subject from a highly patriotic standpoint, the President in his address waived all political consideration and told Congress that its plain duty was to place the nation upon a sound financial basis at this war crisis. The President urged the following as the reasons for the passage of the bill: (1) Additional revenues must be provided, because the $4,000,000,000 now provided by taxation will not sustain the greatly increased budget. (2) It would be an unsound policy to raise too large a proportion of this money by loans, which, if another revenue bill is not passed, would be necessary. (3) The people in fairness should know before the end of 1918 what taxes they will have to pay for that year, so that they may practise the necessary economy to meet them. (4) The Treasury should have time to frame fair and workable regulations for the administration of the law. (5) The present tax laws are marred by iniquities which ought to be remedied.

The President Urges New Tax Bill

Ireland.—Up to this date, as far as can be learned from authentic sources, the British Government has not made public any evidence of a German plot in Ireland. To the disappointment of those interested in the vexed problem Mr. Shortt's promised revelations in the House of Commons consisted of a recount of the number of prisoners deported from Ireland, and Mr. Bonar Law refused to discuss the problem. Meanwhile a member of the Sinn Fein executive committee has issued the following statement:

Sinn Fein Turmoil

> As a priest and a member of the Sinn Fein executive for the past year, I give you my word of honor that the Government's official statement that negotiations have been carried on between the Sinn Fein executive and Germany is a falsehood and that a German invasion was never discussed by the Sinn Fein executive committee.

The Irish and some of the British papers are insisting that England should either bring the prisoners to trial or release them. Other English papers, led by the London Times and Spectator, continue their clamor against the Irish, the Church and the Pope who, through accredited agents, has twice stated that he heard of the row over conscription eight days after the Bishops had issued their manifesto. The London Post has raised a new No-Popery cry and with its characteristic lack of prudence and logic insinuates that the Irish Hierarchy is meddling in English affairs at the behest of the Vatican. Quite in keeping with its policy, this paper finds Irish priests ignorant and Irish Bishops, who are always selected from the Irish clergy, astute and masterful. The London News on the other hand roundly scores Lloyd George for challenging Ireland provocatively. According to this paper the Premier forgets the mismanagement of Ireland ever since the war began and overlooks his own passionate denunciation of the "malignant way" in which Irish enthusiasm for the war was destroyed by the London war office. The News remarks also that Lloyd George conveniently forgets that Irish Catholics were not allowed Catholic officers, that Catholics were disqualified for commissions, and that the committee on conscription of the recent Convention, a committee which consisted of three Irish Unionist peers and two Nationalists serving with the colors, had reported that in the event of an Irish parliament, conscription could be imposed only by consent of an Irish legislature. This, the liberal paper thinks, deprives the Lloyd George scheme of any basis:

> No one, except a few feverish enemies of Irish Home Rule like the Morning Post and the Spectator, supposes that it (conscription) can do anything to strengthen the army. No one doubts that, if it is persisted in, it will create at this grave moment a new source of peril that cannot be estimated. For every battalion it brings in, it will mean the loss of two needed to hold in check an indignant people, stung once more into open rebellion. If the object is to destroy the work of the Convention, we understand this astonishing proposal. But it is understandable on no other ground. Let Ireland have the freedom which Canada and Australia have, and we need not doubt that she will act as they have acted. But only on the terms of free choice can we have Irish compulsion.

The Manchester Guardian declares:

> For our part we do not believe that Ireland desires or ever did desire to stand out of this struggle. Irishmen are the last to sympathize with the German spirit or to be indifferent to the ambition of Germany to rule the world. Ties of religious sympathy bind them to Belgium, the first sufferer from German ambition and the immediate cause of our intervention in the war. Ireland as a free nation will want to take her place among the nations fighting for freedom throughout the world. What Ireland resents is being forced to do what she would willingly do if her right of self-determination were recognized. It is a point of principle and of pride. It will cause us loss of time when we want men at once. That is true, but it is better to get men late than to get none at all, and lose our own men into the bargain in the endeavor to get them. Time has been lost, not by the Irish, who wanted to cooperate with us from the outset, but first by the war office, which damped down Irish recruiting, and secondly by successive British Governments, which kept on adjourning the settlement of the Home Rule problem. Settle Home Rule first, and recruitment will solve itself. That is the key to the Irish question.

The Irish Bishops still continue firm in their attitude. The Bishop of Killaloe has spoken thus to his people: "Make your peace with God, make it quickly. Which side you take is a matter for your own conscience." The Most Rev. Dr. Harty, Archbishop of Thurles, in a recent sermon to his people said:

New proofs of the justice of your cause have risen in the "No Popery" cry in England, headed by the organ of the Pigott forgery. Whenever Ireland's just claims are in question you are sure to have this cry of "No Popery." The Irish Bishops acted by themselves in a religious and moral question, and all the talk about the Pope arose from the imagination of some bigots in England. So far as we are concerned, the cry of "No Popery" will not prevent us defending, as best we can, the rights of Ireland. Neither Bishops, priests nor people of Ireland will be intimidated by the outcry. We bravely bore with centuries of persecution, and we are prepared to do so again rather than give Ireland's rights away.

Another proof of the justice of our cause is found in the action of a few titled Catholics who style themselves the Catholic Union of England. They passed resolutions stating that the Irish Bishops have interfered in politics, and counseled disobedience to the law, and declare that they are reporting the Bishops to the Holy See. If they do so, the Pope will learn what kind of gentlemen these people are. He will learn that some of them supported the Carsonite movement: the Duke of Norfolk was at their head. Besides an affair of conscience, it was a question of Christian charity to defend the oppressed, and the Bishops had merely performed this duty toward their people.

Dr. Morrisroe, the Bishop of Achonry, makes himself very clear in the subjoined letter to the secretary of the Irish Parliamentary party, under whose auspices a huge mass meeting was held in East Mayo.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: Let me thank you for your kind invitation to tomorrow's great meeting. Were my presence necessary to give strength to the popular determination to resist conscription, or to give proof of my own hostility to the proposal of the British Cabinet, no matter what the inconvenience might be, I would make an effort to be on the platform. My being there, however, could add little to the vigor of the people's resolve, nor is it necessary for me to show more clearly than I have already done the depth of my sympathy with the movement to repel this last insidious attack upon our rights as a nation and our privileges as freemen. Our opposition to enforced military service is based upon principles which Allied statesmen have enumerated over and over again within the past few years, and which they profess to have drawn the sword to defend.

English ministers hold up their hands in holy horror at the idea of coercing a fourth of our population into compliance with measures that are admitted to be for the general weal of the entire country, but conscience gives no scruple when it comes to forcing upon the three-fourths of the community a penal enactment that from every point of view, agricultural, industrial and religious, is destined to bring ruin and disaster.

The prerogatives of the pampered minority that has battened upon the fat of the land for generations must not be touched, while the rights of the overwhelming majority may be ignored with impunity, and even trampled upon. It may be debated whether an unwilling nation can ever be lawfully conscripted, or whether the extremity of circumstances has yet arisen which would render justifiable so drastic a procedure, but such a course is assuredly not justified in the case of a small, weak people who have been crushed and broken by centuries of misgovernment, robbed of their homes, and driven into exile by cruel laws, deprived for years of the facilities of education, denied access to positions of affluence in their own land by a system of government which only sought the interests of an alien ascendancy and neglected the general good.

We have during a long night of bitter suffering been given many reasons to feel resentment and few to cherish gratitude toward that powerful and predominant partner with whom our fortunes have been linked for more than 700 years. Even now when our rulers have been shamed after the long struggle into granting us some small measure of justice, the foreign garrison in our midst runs to arms in defense of its threatened position of power. Yet this is the time we are asked to send our young men away and leave their aged fathers, their mothers and sisters to the tender mercies of those in whose veins runs the blood of the perpetrators of the most abominable outrages in the annals of history.

In the commencement of the war the agonized cry of outraged Belgium stirred the chivalrous spirit in the breasts of many of our young men, and our relations with England, no matter how much we may regret them, made persons with any stake in the country feel that her defeat would tell against their own interests, with the result that many of our young men made the supreme sacrifice, but then events occurred to make us pause. The secret treaties revealed new Allied war aims, the refusal to settle the Irish question, the inclusion among law-makers in England of would-be law-breakers, the open hostility of the English press to the Father of the Faithful seconded by the sneers of Ministers, all these things explain the cooling of our ardor for the Allied cause.

If only our friends in England who criticise our attitude would study it before passing judgment upon us the verdict would be more just.

In resisting conscription we have, therefore, a good cause. There is only one thing that can defeat us. Whatever success has been achieved is due to the magnificent solidarity and unity of action that has prevailed. For this we owe thanks to our beloved Cardinal Primate and to the Lord Mayor of Dublin. It was the latter who brought the leaders together, and to his Eminence is due the formation into one irresistible phalanx of the forces of the Church and nation. Great will be the responsibility on the head of any individual who in this extreme crisis declines to place unity above every other consideration. It is idle to pretend that whilst the members of the Mansion House Conference are distracted by side issues they can bring to the joint deliberations and to the execution of a common purpose that amount of harmony, concord and cooperation that is essential for success.

May God grant, therefore, that all contentious subjects be left in abeyance until the present crisis is past, and that every nerve and energy be devoted to preparing to meet the enemy whenever he thinks it well to perpetrate his folly.

With very best wish and fervent prayer for the success of your meeting, I remain,

Faithfully yours,

✠P. Morrisroe.

English Catholics are divided over the issue. The Catholic Union protested the action of the Irish Bishops and forthwith the Union was repudiated by the Salford Catholic Federation, and also by the Bishop and Chapter of that diocese. The Federation declares that the Catholic Union has no right to speak for British Catholics, since it is unknown to the large majority of Catholics outside of London. Bishop Dunn of Nottingham has written a long letter to the press upholding the attitude of the Irish Hierarchy. Towards the end of the week the papers, both English and American, suddenly gave over their attacks on the Irish, the London Times excepted; it opened its pages to an attack by a Protestant bishop.

Russia.—Suggestions regarding the best way of helping Russia to find herself are still filling the papers. Dr. Harold Williams, an Englishman who was formerly a press-correspondent in Petrograd, urges Allied military intervention, combined with direct economic assistance, with the object of keeping Germany from extending its domination in Eastern Europe and Asia. He writes:

Help for Russia

If the Allies do not come, the Germans will, and Russian patriots in desperation will consent to the establishment of order with German aid rather than see their country weltering in anarchy, its population starving, and plague and pestilence stalking in over the ruins of their civilization. Russia will be under the German yoke. It is our great opportunity now and our great duty.

Allied intervention is absolutely necessary. It is necessary to oppose German expansion eastward; it is necessary to restore to the Russian people liberty of choice and action; it is necessary to prevent Germany's penetration into Asia and her exploitation of the huge resources of the East. The task is urgent; it will soon be too late. Allied intervention is not concerned with internal Russian politics. Our action must be disinterested. Its object must be to help the Russian people as a whole, to protect them against their enemy and ours. We cannot dictate forms of government. We can only help the Russian peoples to organize, to express their will, to re-establish the State in a form that best pleases them. We must be disinterested; and if the movement is widely organized, we shall meet with little resistance. We shall have the warm sympathy of the bulk of the harassed population, and shall find a host of active supporters rallying joyfully around us. Detachments of Allied forces must be brought into Russia through entrances still available, through Archangel, where intervention would most immediately be effective, through the Caucasus, and through Vladivostok.

Dr. Williams is of the opinion that the Allies must not take sides in Russian internal politics and line themselves up for or against the Bolsheviki, nor would intervention have the character of a punitive expedition. "The whole purpose of intervention is to enable Russia to help herself, to supply a rallying point for resistance to Germany." Dr. Williams maintains that all classes and all parties in Russia would welcome Allied assistance against the Germans. Both the bourgeois and the Bolshevist press of Russia, however, opposes intervention. The Bolshevist organ, Izvestia, wants no help that would enable Russia to reenter the war, and adds:

Let some Power honestly help us combat successfully the threatening danger. Russia would appreciate in the highest degree any assistance toward the improvement of transportation and communication facilities and the cleansing of her economic life. . . . If the Allies really wish, rather than to drag Russia into the war for purely strategic reasons, to give her practical help in her tragic situation, let them discuss, to the exclusion of every other subject, her urgent need of economic aid.

The Svoboda Rossil, a Constitutional Democratic paper, says: "We are still opposed in principle to foreign intervention and all that it would be bound to involve, just as we are opposed to intervention by the Germans."

Dr. Thomas G. Masaryk, President of the Czecho-Slovak Revolutionary Government, who came here from Russia this spring, in an interview published in the New York Times asserts that whoever would aid Russia must be on good terms with the Bolsheviki, "who are growing more and more anti-German." The Russians, in his opinion, like America better than they like any other nation, and we could restore the country by aiding in its administration, and the re-establishment of the railroads, telegraph and postal service, mines and factories. Dr. Masaryk adds:

I am very much in doubt as to the value of military intervention. It must be remembered that there are enormous distances in Russia, and that the transportation of a modern army over enormous distances requires very good railroad facilities. Suppose that a powerful army were landed in Vladivostok; to get it across Siberia to the Ural Mountains, a distance of 6,000 miles, would require an enormous effort, and if the army is to be large enough to accomplish anything this would take a great deal of time. The Siberian railroads are at present in a much better condition than those of European Russia, but even so the task would be long and difficult.

And suppose you had rescued Siberia, what in the meantime would have become of Russia? The Germans would not have been sitting still. They would have said that this intervention was a breach of the treaty of Brest-Litovsk; they would have overrun European Russia and disposed of it as they saw fit; the Bolshevist Government would have been helpless under German pressure.

The British Government doubts the wisdom of intervening now in Siberia and is inclined to adopt the American policy of watchful waiting. Japan, however, according to an interview Baron Goto, the Mikado's Foreign Minister, gave the London Daily Mail's Tokio correspondent, May 30, would like to intervene alone, with the consent of the Allies. The Baron said:

Certainly we believe a unified homogeneous army is essential to the success of the expedition. Therefore we deem it better to have it confined to one nationality instead of to several. But we have never raised serious objections to Allied participation, and, as I have already said, any suggestion by the Allies will be sympathetically considered. . . . There is the consideration of national pride. If the Allied Powers desire that Japan shall do her best it will be well to leave her alone to compose the expedition.

When asked what compensation Japan would expect for conducting the expedition, he very diplomatically answered: "That depends on the varying circumstances, the size of the army, the breadth of the theater of operations, whether the action is independent or cooperative, and whether intervention is judged to be entirely necessary in Japan's defense."

According to a wireless dispatch that came from Russia to England on June 2, a country-wide anti-Bolshevist plot has been discovered in Petrograd and Moscow. The latter city has been declared in a state of siege, a good number of conspirators have been arrested and coercive measures have been taken against the press.

Governor Catts' Friends and Helpers

ISMENA T. MARTIN

IT will be remembered that Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida, said, in his Detroit speech, that "If it wasn't for the Prohibition party" he would never be Governor of Florida, and that the Methodist Church fought with him "like a tiger, to the last ditch," to put him in the Governor's chair. To show that the Prohibition party and the Methodist Church both knew the nature of the campaign Catts was making for Governor of Florida, it is only necessary to recall that he ran on the anti-Catholic issue, and on that alone, as both Catts and the Chairman of his Detroit meetings told their audiences. It is well to remember, too, that the National Prohibition party at its convention, held in Minneapolis two summers ago, attempted to put an anti-Catholic plank in its platform and that the head of the Anti-Saloon League is a Methodist bishop.

After the South had reeled under the wave of intolerance, the newspapers began to ask: "What is the matter with Florida?" Answering this question, the Montgomery (Alabama) Advertiser, in its issue of June 18, 1916, said, in part:

Florida, like Alabama, is cursed and gorged with politics. Florida, unlike Alabama, is unable to repel the advances of false and seductive leaders. The need of the hour in Florida is masterly and lofty political leadership, and that thing Florida does not have.

We have just witnessed a weird phenomenon in Florida politics. Two men have been lifted to exalted station because they appealed to the sentimental, the emotional and the weaker traits in humanity, and not because they in any worthy degree appealed to the reason of sovereign voters.

A United States Senator and a Governor were chosen because of their religious affiliations and their relations to religious elements with which they are personally out of sympathy. Their claims were enriched by their espousal of National Prohibition, and their chances brightened because of the financial and political support of the heavily endowed Anti-Saloon League of America. In addition, they were the beneficiaries of a compact and powerful secret political organization designed to combat a Christian church—an organization which the successful candidate for Governor had built up for his own uses during the less than four years which he had spent in Florida.

The candidate for Governor denounced the Roman Catholic Church from every stump. He said he would not appoint any Roman Catholic to office. He said he would try to put Roman Catholics out of office. He will fight that Church in whatever manner he can. He is a Protestant minister.

The candidate for the United States Senate worked in harmony with the candidate for Governor. Both ran as anti-Catholics. Both said on the stump they were opposed to the use of tobacco; they wept at the thought of any man taking a drink. They said they were for all forms of prohibition. They may have said other things, but these are the declarations which gave Governor Park Trammell an abnormal and undeserved vote for United States Senator and Sidney J. Catts the surprising vote which he received for Governor. They were not chosen because of their intellectual ability. Of course they are bright men, but neither has ever done anything to cause one to rate him higher than mediocre, when compared with either of the men who opposed them.

What a travesty on Democratic government in America that two men can go so high by grace of popular suffrage because they belong to one Church and are openly opposed to another Church! If they know anything of the history of their country, of the genesis of our freedom and the majesty of our system, they care nothing about it; they do not respect the ancient traditions of America that State and Church shall be separate, that a man's religious views are not properly an issue before American voters. They saw their chance to cash in on a manufactured prejudice that is in the hearts of an undiscriminating constituency. . . .

It is an evil thing, we submit, for any man to be elected to office because of his religious affiliations. It is an evil day for any commonwealth when a majority of its people measure the capacity and character of men by the clerical rod. It is an evil day for advanced America when a political leader asks for the favor of sovereigns on the ground that he is a Catholic, a Jew, a Baptist, a Methodist, a Presbyterian, an Episcopalian, or a Congregationalist. Such a spectacle is mockery of our ideals and traditions. When in alliance with extreme Prohibitionists, or any other one-ideaed cult, it appeals to the baser impulses; it stirs the passions and addles the reasoning faculties of man. It substitutes hate and fury for research and reflection. It corrupts government, and makes government inefficient, partial, biased and vindictive. Its outlook does not contemplate the welfare of all of the people, but the exaltation of one class of people at the expense of another class of people. It is the greatest error that ever came into American politics to hold that these things are to be considered in America in connection with political needs.

We say this to Florida because it is the first American State in the dawn of this new day that has abased itself before the teachers of intolerance, bigotry, demagoguery and Hickism. It is the first State to go to the extreme limit.

Other States may follow suit. In Florida, after a taste of the uncanny brew, there may be—indeed we have no doubt that there will be—a reaction, a revulsion of popular sentiment against this sort of thing. . . . Florida cannot be a great State until it has great leaders. And the men it has just exalted are not great leaders and cannot be great leaders because they are not strong enough to lift themselves above their environment. They cannot be of the highest service to their State because they are opposed to one class in that State.

We fear that Florida has set other States a bad example. We fear it is out of sympathy with an essential and time-honored principle, the principle which insures Americans free thought and religious freedom.

Such is the indictment against Governor Catts, made at his own door. Stumping the State of Michigan with the avowed purpose of destroying the Catholic schools, Catts and his followers declare that they are opposed to "religion in politics." If they really mean what they say, they have good grounds for opposition to the Methodist Church, which not only enthroned intolerance in Florida, but is preaching politics and bigotry from its pulpits, all over America, almost every Sunday in the year.

In order to secure the support of the Methodists in Florida, Catts promised to make pariahs out of the Catholics of that State. He put through the Legislature, at the behest of his political owners, a Convent Inspection bill, under the terms of which, in every county in Florida, there is a committee of three men and women, who shall, at least once every year, visit and inspect all convents and Catholic institutions. He put through a Compulsory Education bill, compelling all children of school age to attend the public schools. He said, in Detroit, that this measure is now in force in thirty counties of Florida, and he cheered his followers with the comment: "The counties having Catholic schools will be the last ones we can bring in, as we must fight them to a finish."

I have been informed that not so long ago, in a city of Florida, at four o'clock in the morning, three men rang the door-bell of a convent and demanded admittance. They came to "inspect" the place, and had purposely chosen that early morning hour. The Sister in charge of the convent bade these things that masquerade as men in Florida enter, and after roaming about for a while, they went their way, satisfied, of course, that the "majesty" of the law had been upheld.

Washington's Birthday, 1917, found Governor Catts the principal speaker at a meeting held in the Duval County Armory. Before beginning his address he invited two renegades, traveling as an ex-priest and an ex-nun, to sit on the platform and listen to his "patriotic" address. The pair reaped a rich harvest in Florida, under the chaperonage of the Governor and—presumably—of the Methodist Church. Bigotry and intolerance are fanned into flame with every breeze that blows from the capitol. For this has the Methodist Church "fought like a tiger, to the last ditch!"

Not content with breeding discord in his own State, Catts seeks new fields to conquer. With the nation ringing with the loud alarm of war, out of the charged atmosphere comes the strident voice of Sidney J. Catts, Governor of Florida. Bespeaking a generous collection, his Detroit admirers declared that the noblest reviler of them all was in Michigan "for the principle of the thing." For that reason his purse-strings were to grow longer. All this, of course, was but a bit of camouflage to hide the real financial backers of the movement. The collection taken at the Detroit meetings appeared to be smaller than the audience. At Kalamazoo, Catts was refused a hall and driven from the Court House steps when he attempted to speak.

The great compelling thought that will doubtless occur to the reader is not that an audience could be mustered in Detroit to listen to an attack upon all things Catholic, but that the gathering should be permitted at this critical stage of history, with the country at war, her Catholic sons well to the front, not only in actual warfare, but in every branch of war-activity. Men have suffered internment for violating the free speech guaranteed by the Constitution, they have been interned for interfering with the progress of the war, for stirring up strife, why is no hand raised to stem the tide of intolerance? Why is this Governor of Florida permitted to roam at will over the country, making a studied, well-financed attempt to stir up dissension among a united people?

Why is the Methodist Church silent? Why does the Anti-Saloon League make no effort to curb its candidate? Why did S. S. Kresge, Grant M. Hudson and other Michigan officers of the Anti-Saloon League stand afar off when Governor Catts entered Detroit, though these men were in Washington last December at the convention of the Anti-Saloon League, when Catts was one of the honored speakers? Are they "all things to all men," or are they allied with the Anti-Catholic movement? If they are not so allied, the time is at hand when they should speak, in no uncertain tones, that all men may cease to marvel at their sphinx-like silence.

Catholic Publicity

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

READING AMERICA is becoming, for me, a dangerous habit. For instance, I have just returned from feverish New York to serene California, I have exchanged subways and elevated and rush-hours and multitudinous yellow journals, for pine woods and flower-decked hills and vales, and the mellow voice of the Pacific crooning along the sands of Carmel beach. I have been reading Walter de la Mare and Ralph Hodgson, instead of Arthur Brisbane and hectic headlines. I am writing a romantic novel, instead of "timely" articles. Then comes AMERICA, and in it Richard A. Muttkowski's provocative, stimulating, rousing, highly important article, "Leadership and Publicity," and my mood of dolce far niente is utterly shattered, and poetry and pastoral contentment, and novel-writing, all, all are thrust aside. This article claims my whole attention. It ought to claim, and also gain, the earnest, thoughtful attenion of all Catholics everywhere. It ought to be made the subject for a prolonged meditation, by every thinking Catholic, and lead on to a searching examination of conscience. It ought, in the best and highest sense of that very effective piece of slang, to "start something," and start something that will lead to practical results.

It is my purpose, in the present article, to try to contribute a few ideas to the discussion which Mr. Muttkowski is bound to provoke; a few ideas dealing with Catholic publicity. According to Mr. Muttkowski, we Catholics are lamentably and culpably weak in leadership, that is, in lay leadership. Even if we were strong in this respect, we should not be able to get adequate results from our leaders' work and personal influence, because of our lamentable and culpable lack of an effective press. Our biggest weakness lies in the fact that "We have no Catholic journal of national circulation, one that might be found on news-stands in railroad stations and hotels, one known to all Catholics, one dealing with the vital topics of the day, be they religious, social, economic, or otherwise, presented from the Catholic standpoint."

I agree with Mr. Muttkowski entirely. For the present, I pass by his analysis of the causes of our weakness, I mean lay weakness, in social activities and organized parish, diocesan, and national work for God's Church, which would mean, also, and most effectively, work for our country as well. I shall confine myself to the question of publicity; which, as this keen observer points out, is absolutely requisite to any worth-while social-service campaign, or any extension of influence. I shall also pass by, for the time, the many problems presented by the idea of establishing a Catholic national daily newspaper. I shall give, instead, what I regard as an entirely feasible and practical plan for obtaining national Catholic publicity; a plan which could readily become the foundation for the national daily. May I state, as I have stated before, in AMERICA, that I speak out of an experience of nearly twenty-five years in journalism? Far be it from me to discourage the free utterance of opinions and criticisms, for and against, on this tremendously important matter, by all who desire to do so; but I think it well for those who possess practical knowledge to say so, in supporting or opposing the idea of the Catholic daily, so that in the end the Catholic public may know whether or not the proposal emanates merely from enthusiasts.

I would, then, respectfully but most earnestly suggest to those who alone have the full and unquestioned right to lead in this matter, I refer of course to our beloved and devoted Bishops, the most truly powerful force making for righteousness and real national progress today, that a Catholic publicity bureau be organized in New York City, with branch offices, or agents, in other important centers: Washington, Boston, New Orleans, Chicago, San Francisco, for example. Its work should be broadly twofold in character. First, it should connect with, and work together with, the secular, "regular" press. Second, it should connect with, and work in hearty cooperation with, the existing Catholic press.

With the secular press, its work should be to supply it with special articles, news "tips," photographs for illustrations, correct and professionally written biographies of prominent Catholics appearing in the news, Sunday "stories," and similar material. It should always, and efficiently, be ready and equipped to help any secular paper that appealed to it for proper assistance in obtaining Catholic news or opinion, interviews with Catholic leaders, clerical or lay, and similar services. It should keep a close, yet always kindly and courteous watch upon the press, and where errors about Catholic affairs, or Catholic ideas or beliefs, appear, these should be at once corrected. I firmly believe—and again I speak from long years of experience in secular newspaper offices—that most of the trouble in the dealings of the secular press with our religion emanates from ignorance rather than malice. Of course, in certain quarters, there is malice unveiled and brazen. There, we must fight. But elsewhere, all that we are called upon to do is not to fight, but to set right.

With the Catholic press, the bureau's work should be to supplement the local activities of the various Catholic newspapers with a regular news service of well-written, really "newsy" letters, and, on great occasions, with special dispatches. Also, to supply well-written, live, and well-illustrated, special articles; and strong, live, fiction; and other "features," including, for example, powerful cartoons, and—perhaps, and if the right artists can be discovered, and I think they can—good "comic stuff."

As Mr. Muttkowski so justly points out, too many of our weeklies rely overmuch on paste-pot and scissors for their articles. Something good appears in AMERICA, or the San Francisco Monitor, or the Catholic Columbian, or elsewhere, and it is eagerly pounced upon by other editors. But not all the editors desirous of using the good thing, see it at the same time. One copies from another, often with cuts or changes, and by the time the good thing trails its draggled and tattered skirts across the continent and back again, it is a sad spectacle. It may still be feebly good, but you could not call it news.

How is such a service as this suggested one to be actually handled? I think there should be a thoroughly organized central editorial staff, composed of the best Catholic journalists available; and plenty of them, I truly believe, are available. There should be both priests and laymen. Many priests are natural newspapermen. By this, I hasten to add, I do not mean that they are not also good priests. I mean, that there is a real "news sense"—"a nose for news," is what we used to call this sense when I was a reporter—and I mean that some priests possess this faculty. It is not the same thing as an ability to write, which is a separate gift. Some of the best reporters and news-gatherers never write a line. When I "covered" the New York police headquarters for the Evening Telegram, years ago, the best reporter there was a Sun man who had never written a line for his paper. But he knew the news; he could get the news; and after that, writing it was easy. So, as I say, the central board should be composed of a first-class staff of priests and laymen, under a chief editor, who, in my judgment, should be a really "big" Catholic journalist, a layman. Some of the staff should be reporters, news-gatherers; others should be skilled writers, compilers, keepers of card-indexed clippings, editors, and "re-write" men—and women: because, of course, there should be a corps of clever women writers; we wouldn't succeed without them; they would be indispensable—together with experts on theology, sociology, foreign affairs, book-reviewers, critics, etc. Some might be volunteers; others need only be called upon occasionally. I personally know many Catholic writers and newspapermen who could not go into this or any similar schme because of existing engagements, but who would be proud and pleased to write special articles, from time to time, or otherwise help the good cause.

Ah, such a good cause! A cause so necessary to Catholic progress! Not only to Catholic progress, but to national progress. Catholicism is the truth. Unless we believe that, how can we be Catholics? If it is not the chief mission of the Church, after the helping of its own, known children to save their immortal souls, to spread the truth among all men, what then is it? And how much could be done by the peaceful penetration of the secular press—just as it stands today, even without our own national daily—with our Catholic spirit!

But, do you say, the cost? What of the cost? Yes, that's a serious problem; but is it unsolvable? Is it really difficult? I make bold to answer, No!

I was in New York when the Knights of Columbus went out for $2,500,000 in one week. I was only a visitor to the city, last winter; all I could do was to help with my little bit, and make one little public talk. But —but we were all—all—of us "on the job!" And what happened? Nearly $5,000,000 happened; that's all. But, no, I take that back; the five millions did not happen; they were the product of system, of organization, plus enthusisam. The chief bugaboo of American Catholicism, which I take to be indifference, a sort of sleeping sickness of the soul, was exorcised. We pulled together; we pulled with a will; and of course we splendidly succeeded.

So might we do with the Catholic publicity bureau. It will require money, and plenty of money. Its corps should be a really well-paid, absolutely first-class staff of Catholic journalists and writers; and although it may derive some income from the sale of its news and its special features, it will usually have to face a deficit. And it should face a deficit. To try to do this work on a basis of profit, of making it "pay" for itself in a merely financial way would be a false move. It should not be required to "pay" for itself, in that way, any more than the parochial schools are required to make a profit. The bureau should be subsidized, either by individuals or a powerful society like the Knights of Columbus, or by means of a national subscription.

I might go on for pages, but AMERICA's space is limited; and this is only intended as a suggestion; as a postscript to Mr. Muttkowski's rousing article. I throw it out, especially, for the consideration of Catholic laymen. In my judgment, the clergy already are awake to this grave problem. Let laymen prove that the clergy may depend upon them for work which laymen rather than clergy should lead in and bear the burdens of, and then the United States, instead of lagging behind all other nations in the matter of its Catholic press, will become the leading force in all the world for the intelligent diffusion of Catholic truth. God speed the day!

Boy-Scouting for Catholic Youth

JOHN F. FOGARTY

THE ecclesiastical authorities of New York, Boston and Philadelphia have authorized a movement creating distinctively Catholic troops among the Boy Scouts of America. The arrangement provides that Catholic members should be chaplained by priests and captained by scout-masters of their Faith. The decision arrived at does not imply that the Scout Organization considered itself obligated in any way to seek ecclesiastical sanction; nor, on the other hand, that individual Catholics could not previously join the movement at pleasure. The creation of distinctively Catholic troops is a practical demonstration of the non-sectarian character of the Boy Scout body. Only when Catholics and non-Catholics come together on common religious grounds can there be any room for misunderstanding. And the best way to obviate such a difficulty is to remove the cause contributing to it.

While it is true that the scout aim is very far from being the promotion of religious truth, still, remembering that the organization is almost entirely recruited from various church units, distinction of creed cannot be altogether eliminated. Furthermore, as Catholics can never consent to any generalized idea of religion such as is possible among the various denominational bodies, the obvious way to settle the problem is to carry the troop idea to its logical conclusion. The troop is the unit of scouting and can embody in itself, irrespective of other troops, the whole plan of the organization. Hence, it is even convenient to have all the members of a troop professing the same creed; and the arrangement preserves the identity of church units already in existence.

Catholic feeling towards organizations external to the Church is clear and unmistakable. It simply regards with disfavor all movements, however laudable, that would in any way compromise Catholic faith. In the case of denominational bodies, there is no room for misunderstanding: the Church does not consider them adequate agencies for the promotion of religious truth among her adherents. In the so-called non-sectarian societies, however, well-disposed non-Catholics are often at a loss to grasp the mind of their Catholic friends. They believe that in the question of religion, the same treatment which is meted out to the various sects is sufficient and just for those of the Catholic Faith; they are slow to realize that essential differences can be considered to exist only between Catholicism and other religious professions and hardly among the various Protestant denominations. Practically, sectarianism is concerned with the mode of viewing religion and with the degree of attention paid to Christian worship. The Church does not recognize the possibility of anything like neutral religious profession. She regards no occasion favorable enough for a time-being religious union with any sect whatsoever. What she has, her unchanging character forbids her to fuse with, or to accommodate to any other form of belief: otherwise she would cease to be what she is. Moreover, since in the matter of Christian worship, she views regulations as obligatory which other churches deem merely useful or directive, it is evident that her members and those outside her fold do not stand on a common ground of policy in any society professing a moral code. Consequently, in the Catholic view, an institution to be strictly non-sectarian must not merely refrain from imposing its religious beliefs on its Catholic patrons; it must admit in practice that it serves its own interests best and its Catholic patrons most by allowing them to act in the matter of religion as conscience dictates.

Carrying these principles into her relations with all external societies the Church not merely guides her members from contact with anything like loose religious profession, she also advises them to keep clear of the atmosphere thereby created. An uncatholic spirit pervading any movement ordinarily effects more harm than an anti-Catholic attitude, because its influence is quiet and not always apparent. Youth especially is more liable to be undermined by lack of Catholic influences than by the presence of antagonism to the Faith. Furthermore, there is a something which can be best described as "tone" which represents the high ideal of Catholic training effort. It is the outcome of many forces of which the religious impetus is the predominant note. It betrays itself in clean-living, courteousness, kindness, forbearance, in refined bearing,—traits not derived from utilitarian promptings or from the workings of naturalism, but from association with the sacred things of the Faith. However successful in attaining this other ways may prove for those outside the fold, a Catholic sets before himself clear and well-defined motives of religion for well-doing, without, of course, overlooking the place of natural means. Indeed, all purely natural means, whose aim is Christian conduct, derive their real efficacy for him from being made subordinate to religious influences.

The Catholic-troop idea finds its origin in reasons like these. As a matter of fact, the declared policy of the Scout Organization adds weight to the need for the provision made for Catholic boys. In the official "Handbook for Scout Masters," page 90, there appears the following:

> It is maintained by the Boy Scouts of America that no boy can grow into the best kind of a man without recognizing his obligation to God; it is also maintained that no scout master can be the best leader of boys unless his personal life conforms to the requirements of the faith which he holds. His example should be a constant inspiration to the boys of his troop, causing them, no matter of how many different faiths, to be diligent in their adherence to the teachings of the particular religious institution with which they are individually connected. He should see to it that no boy's religion is ever ridiculed by another, and that every boy is encouraged to live his life according to the ideals of his faith.

While a really religious man will doubtless be an inspiration to those of any creed with whom he comes in intimate contact, yet, it is to be expected that the highest type of inspiration must come from a conscientious scout master of the same faith as the boys in his charge.

The religious aspect of scouting must be discussed because, in its direct or indirect bearings, it constitutes a real ground for concern on the part of Catholics. But it would be unfair to gage the attention given to religion in scouting by the prominence given to the religious question in this inquiry. In truth, the Scout Organization, as such, does not concern itself at all with religion. Its aims and purpose are solely occupied with that phase of a boy's life not directly controlled by home, or school, or church; and it treats of religion only in so far as it deems it indispensable to any movement of uplift. To quote its own statements of policy:

> There are three institutions that should mold the life of the boy—the home, school and church. Nothing should interfere with the functions of these, and the place of any auxiliary organization should be supplementary in its nature and educational in character. The scout idea takes the non-supervised leisure time of boys and fills it with recreation—educational activity. It teaches him facts about nature and citizenship and how to get the most out of life. It leaves parental and school and church ties stronger because of non-interference.—("Handbook for Scout Masters," p. 72.)

Scouting, then, is chiefly occupied with the leisure moments of youthful life, filling that interesting period with well-ordered, useful and manly activities. To compass the entire field of its endeavors, it would be necessary to bare the fascinating mysteries of hand-craft, camp-craft, wood-craft; it would involve disclosing the absorbing processes contributing to good citizenship, it would necessitate a discussion of the elements which help to make a boy a man. It would, indeed, need a handling too extensive for treatment here. Suffice it to say that the Church has always been intensely interested in that phase of boyish life when a boy is essentially a boy. There are numerous diocesan societies throughout the country with similar reasons for their existence as the Boy Scouts of America: and when ecclesiastical authority permits some or all of these to affiliate with the larger organization, it is in the same spirit with which a mother, without surrendering care or custody, shares the guardianship of her child with a friend. Moreover, the national and patriotic scope of the Scout Organization has eliminated the objectionable features that are often attached to small and local bodies. The movement has reared itself on a basis of true Americanism, and as long as it maintains its American ideal, it will have the sympathetic support of the Catholic Church. The Church is always willing to welcome a favorable opportunity for the promotion of Christian harmony and brotherly affection: and now that the youth of the country, Catholic and non-Catholic, are struggling side by side under the shadow of the country's flag, the time seems specially opportune to bring the younger brother of hero-soldiers into a relation of closer intimacy and similar understanding, the Catholics however always remaining under the influence of the Church.

Democratic Control of Industry

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THE dominance of wealth, or the particular capitalistic régime under which the great masses of the people are possessed of little but their labor power, while the ownership of the instruments of production is concentrated in the hands of a few powerful employers, is known as the "Servile State." There can be no industrial peace where such conditions exist, no matter how wages may increase and hours of labor be shortened. Democratic forms of government are in themselves no solution. "While the Constitution had increasingly taken on democratic forms," wrote Cardinal Bourne in reference to England, "the reality underlying these forms had been increasingly plutocratic. Legislation under the guise of 'social reform' tended to mark off all wage-earners as a definitely servile class." Against such conditions a violent reaction had already set in long before the great war.

In defining the Catholic attitude towards the democratic control of industry it is necessary to distinguish between the different kinds of productive property. It is the great mistake of syndicalism, Socialism and similar panaceas that they entirely overlook the intricate complexity of the modern social problem. Remedies warranted to cure all evils must, to say the least, be looked upon with great suspicion. Yet it is true likewise that the very optimism with which they are advertised unfortunately obtains for them both credence and a trial.

The first class of productive property to which a form of democratic control may be applied are obviously our public-service utilities. There can be no objection, from a Catholic point of view, to a transition in these instances from private to municipal or national ownership, provided always that such a transfer is for the common good and that a proper compensation is offered to previous owners. In regard to these enterprises, experience has shown that public ownership has in certain conditions and places been of no slight advantage, while in other instances it has no less plainly proved disastrous in a financial way. Whatever method is clearly for the common good should be boldly favored by every Catholic.

The same rule applies to natural monopolies. They may be either publicly or privately owned and managed according as the general welfare may require in any given case. No private owner of public service utilities or of natural monopolies has any reason for complaint if, after due compensation has been made to him, his business is absorbed by the city or State. Obviously, however, the sole consideration that should influence public authorities in taking such action is the reasonable conviction that they are promoting the common good. With this precaution observed, there can be no suspicion of Socialistic tendencies in the procedure. It is neither more nor less than a simple application of Catholic principles.

But in all such transference of properties the greatest circumspection must be used. Full account is to be taken of the undeniable fact that public management implies increased expenditure, aside from the advantages that may come with increased centralization. Under equal conditions private owners can obtain far greater results at less cost than will ever be possible under public ownership. Yet in spite of this fact the elimination of the enormous profits that frequently are reaped at the public expense by private capitalists may still leave a substantial gain for the people. Another difficulty that suggests itself here is the power given to politicians, who may prove no less unscrupulous than the criminal profiteers. The question, therefore, to be carefully pondered in each single instance is whether a strict and thorough government control may not be more advantageous than public ownership. The former, it would appear, should at all events be tried before any step is taken towards nationalization.

The farther an industry is removed from the nature of a public-service utility or a natural monopoly, the greater is the presumption in favor of private ownership as the method most conducive to the common good, until finally we arrive at forms of industry where individual enterprise is absolutely essential for success. In the same manner government control and supervision, where public ownership is not desirable, will be in proportion either to the nearness of an industry, in its nature, to a public-service utility or its remoteness from that utility. Says the Rev. Herbert Lucas, S.J., in the Month for March of this year:

> In the case of those industries which have not this character [of public-service utilities] it should be sufficient to protect the wage-earner and the consumer from exploitation by means of a graduated tax on the profit of large-scale concerns, so that the fullest measure of liberty may be left to those which, to the general benefit of the public, are winning for themselves a moderate prosperity under the stimulus of private enterprise.

There is one form of public ownership, however, against which all must combine, although a wide agitation is at present carried on in its favor, and that is the universal nationalization of the land. There could be no more terrible error. If there is one thing certain in the entire range of economic science it is that the land should, so far as possible, be owned by the men who cultivate it, and not controlled by a Socialist cooperative commonwealth, a State monopoly, or any other form of government absolutism. It is this one instance which Pope Leo XIII particularly selected to urge the widest reasonable distribution of private ownership among the people. It would be a crying injustice and a public crime to alienate for public ownership the land that is tilled by the calloused hands and moistened by the sweat of the farmer. Let voluntary cooperation produce the utmost results, but not land-nationalization. Rightly Pope Leo wrote in his noble defense of the toiler: "We are told that it is right for private persons to have the use of the soil and the fruit of the land, but that it is unjust for anyone to possess, as owner, either the land on which he has built or the estate which he has cultivated." The modern argument could not be more justly stated, and to this fallacy the Pontiff replies:

> Those who assert this do not perceive that they are robbing man of what his own labor has produced. For the soil which is tilled and cultivated with toil and skill utterly changes its condition: it was wild before, it is now fruitful; it was barren, and now it brings forth in abundance. That which has thus altered and improved it becomes so truly part of itself as to be in great measure indistinguishable and inseparable from it. Is it just that the fruit of a man's sweat and labor should be enjoyed by another? As effects follow their cause, so it is just and right that the results of labor should belong to him who has labored. ("The Condition of Labor.")

Socialism proceeds still further in its demand for the public ownership and management of the means of production. But while attempting to vest this, in a vague manner, in the entire commonwealth it fails, even more egregiously than capitalism had done, in answering man's natural desire for private ownership. Socialism lacks the profound understanding of human nature that the Church possesses and hence its opposition to her entire tradition and to the teachings of the Holy See. While public ownership of public utilities or of certain natural monopolies may, under given circumstances, be highly desirable, yet the great bulk of the productive property within a nation should be privately owned for the reasons already indicated. The main problem is to ascertain how private ownership can be most widely distributed among the people.

The consciousness on the part of the laborer, under Socialism, that his means of livelihood would belong to everybody in common would neither satisfy his instinct for ownership nor stimulate his energy. Production would lag and its cost would rise. All avenues towards economic betterment would be closed to him, for strikes would be considered the mutiny of labor. Hence revolution and counter-revolution would be the monotonous history until the last state would be far worse than the first. Socialism would not bring democratic, but bureaucratic control of industry.

There is doubtless a great truth in the Socialist contention that wastage, both in production and distribution, can be prevented by centralization. Of this full account is taken in the Catholic acceptance of government ownership or government control wherever it can serve the common good. Yet it is equally true that there can as readily be an over-centralization which will not merely interfere with private rights and individual liberty, but which will lead to confusion, to bureaucratic tyranny and the deadly retardation of production even in the most essential necessities of life. The Church fully perceives the elemental truths contained in Socialism, but they are merely her own Catholic principles seen through the distorted Marxian lens. Whatever is best and most truly progressive in modern social doctrines was put into practice by her more than five centuries ago, and it is amusing, if not irritating, for Catholic sociologists to hear these commonplaces of Catholic tradition proclaimed as modern discoveries.

But public ownership is not the principle means, as many wrongly imagine, of attaining to a just democratic control of industry. It is mainly in the field of cooperation that this is to be achieved. Between public service utilities or such great monopolies as closely approximate to them, and industrial undertakings which of their very nature call for individual management as the essential factor of success, there lies a wide and almost interminable province of cooperative enterprise. Of this we shall treat more fully in a following article.

"A Christian, a Gentleman and a Breton"

BLANCHE M. KELLY

WE are becoming almost accustomed to the sublime and the heroic, to the spectacle of men leaving behind them life and love and laughter and turning a gallant face to death. Instances of return to God, as a result of this face to face encounter, have become quite commonplace, if such a term could ever be applied to the romance of spiritual experience. The dominant note in all this chronicle of glory is that of youth.

A new note is struck in the biography of Comte Guy de Robien, commandant of Zouaves killed at Roclincourt in Artois, on January 6, 1916. He was not young—he was nearing his sixtieth year and his men called him "notre bon père"—but an indomitable soul found a means of cheating an outworn body, for a young subaltern was under orders to march at his side and if necessary to drag him forward at the head of his men. Neither was he a prodigal returned to his Father's house, but a true son of that Celtic race whose faith for so many centuries has been almost the evidence of things seen.

Born at the château de Robien Nov. 30, 1857, he was the second son of Paul-Frédéric-Marie, Marquis de Robien, by his marriage with Hélène de Coëtnempreu de Kersaint. On both sides his ancestral line stretched back into that remote Armorica whose boundaries merge now with heaven, now with the continents of faëry. In his veins flowed the blood of Noménoé, the hero of Breton story, who achieved his country's independence and was crowned king in the cathedral of Dol with a diadem sent by the Pope. On the heraldic list of the house of De Robien the syllables of knightly names caracole before the eye like the fiery barbs on which their surcoated bearers rode forth to the Crusades. Among them is set down with lordly casualness the name of "St Louis, Roi de France." The founder of that branch of the family from which sprang the Commandant de Robien was, in splendid defiance of the

Salic Law, a woman, Jeanne de Penthièvre-Avaugour, who in 1212, despite her princely rank and feudal possessions, married for love a young "milord d'Angleterre."

In character the Marquise de Robien, Guy's mother, was cast on the epic lines of those Merovingian women to whom Carlyle has devoted so eloquent a passage, but so molded and disciplined by grace as to typify for her generation Catholic womanhood at its best and greatest. Thus the future hero of Roclincourt came by the two-fold tradition which has been the inheritance of every generation of De Robiens and De Kersaints, devotion to the Catholic Church and devotion to France. It was not strange, therefore, that the child of such a union should have turned with a kind of sacred exaltation to the career of arms. He made that choice as a mere boy. In 1877 he received his commission with every promise of a distinguished career, a promise which was fulfilled in the universal esteem for his lofty character, his asceticism, his unostentatious but undissimulated piety. As the years passed, despite his military ability and his gift of leadership, his name was constantly omitted from the lists of promotion, and it then became clear that he had no choice but to leave the army. This fact was brought home to him with peculiar force in the course of an interview with a government official who reproached him with too openly manifesting his religion and thereby assuming an attitude incompatible with the policy of the Republic which he served. Here the soldier interrupted: "Pardon me, Monsieur, I am not serving the Republic, I am serving France. And although I am a Frenchman I am first of all a Christian, and I would rather remain all my life an humble second lieutenant than sacrifice on the altar of the Republic my Christian Faith. I glory in this Faith and no power on earth shall prevent me from displaying it like a standard. For me the banner of Christ is inseparable from that of France." Impressed by the nobility of these words, the Prefect refrained from mentioning in his report the fact that the son of Lieutenant de Robien was being educated at the Jesuit College of Feldkirch.

But De Robien soon realized that the mere suppression of such damaging facts would not satisfy those with whom lay his promotion. He withdrew therefore to privacy of civil life, not sulkily like Cæsar to his tent, but with the quiet dignity of a Christian gentleman. Soon after he purchased an estate near Marseilles, in Provence, "la patrie de la lumière," and there he continued his career of goodness, by its sheer force winning the hearts even of those who had been prejudiced against him. A love of the land had always been part of his patriotism, and so he was foremost in experiments for agricultural improvement, as he was tireless in the service of neighbor and friend.

The fatal August of 1914 came, and whatever the call to arms meant to other men, occupied with the affairs of peace, to Comte Guy de Robien it meant the realization of the dream of a lifetime. He was nearly fifty-seven years old. For thirty-four of these years he had been a soldier yet he had not attained the ambition of every soldier—his baptism of fire. Still a little longer it was to be denied to him, for after a season spent in guarding the Alpine frontier he and his men were assigned to a more terrible task than that of storming the enemy's trenches. They were commissioned to bury the dead lying on the battlefield of the Marne. A fortnight had passed since this great battle and corpses still lay under the open sky. There they had lain whether the rain fell or the sun shone, constituting a scene of utter horror beyond the powers of a Verhaeren to describe. What it meant to the soul of the Christian soldier whose duty it was to supervise the task laid upon his men can be inferred from the fact that the men themselves sickened at it and begged to be sent instead to face the guns of the enemy.

Not long after this De Robien made a pilgrimage to Domrémy, the birthplace of his fellow-soldier, Joan of Arc. Here, as became known after his death, he offered his life to God in sacrifice for his country. Transferred at his own request to an African regiment, he went eagerly to his new post, the sector of Roclincourt, a position of exceptional danger. Its first-line trench was subsequently christened Tranchée de Robien, in memory of the Commandant's valor. At first the Zouaves were inclined to be somewhat amused at the enthusiasm of their commander, but their amusement changed to admiration and even awe before the spectacle of his heroic endurance of long sleepless hours in the trenches without food or drink, in the snow and the mud. St. Paul's zeal for the brethren scarcely surpassed this man's determination to share all the hardships and dangers of his men, and this for two remarkable reasons, because he loved them, and because, in a mystical way, he longed to suffer for France. No wonder that his men loved him in turn and were quick to follow his leadership.

Honors and promotions came to him now, and praise not only for his present bravery, but for his long and honorable career. Finally in January he was notified of his appointment to the command of a regiment with the duties of colonel. He was about to leave for his new post when he learned that the enemy had entered the first-line trenches and his men were in danger. At his own request he returned to lead them in a counter-attack. Reassured as to their honor and safety, he was again about to leave and was again stayed, this time at the request of the colonel who had just been notified that De Robien's men were wavering under the violence of the German attack.

Once more he returned to them and was received with transports of enthusiasm. Under his direction they made ready to win back their lost position. With him at their head they poured forward in a flood which nothing could halt or turn back, and, the trench recovered, turned like children for the approving smile and further orders of their beloved Commandant. Then he gave them his last command, which was that they should pursue the enemy into his own lines. Even this they did and by capturing them recovered a stretch of French soil and extended the temporary boundary of France.

Anxious to ascertain that the position was secure, the Commandant went forward to inspect the enemy's movements. For an instant, with characteristic fearlessness, he stood upright in the breach. That instant he fell, shot through the heart.

The best comment on his life is his death, and the best comment on his death is found in a letter which he left to be read after his death by his son: "I beg God with my whole heart that he will grant me the grace to die the death of a Christian, a gentleman and a Breton."

The "American Patriots"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

A friend has called my attention to your article of recent date in which you refer to the American Patriots as an anti-Catholic organization and publish my name as one of the vice-presidents. Your article was a complete surprise, as it was the first intimation received by me that the organization was of that nature. The facts are that last February I was asked to allow the use of my name as an honorary vice-president of an organization of that name, the object of which was to resist the propaganda of those "parasites known as the I. W. W., and their allies, anarchists, revolutionists and Bolshevikists, who infest the country and afflict their doings upon society and State, God and man," in the words of a circular which was enclosed. There was nothing in the correspondence or circular that indicated that the organization was sectarian or partisan, and certainly nothing that would lead anyone to believe it was anti-Catholic, especially as I understand the Catholic Church to be opposed to the very things the organization proposed to fight.

Early in March I wrote the organization that I consented to the use of my name for the purpose proposed. Since the issue of your paper in which the matter was referred to, I have written both the President of the society, Charles D. Haines, and the Secretary, W. P. Morton, for an explanation, but, as yet, have received no word from them. If the society is anti-Catholic my name was obtained by false pretenses, and I repudiate the organization in its entirety and shall forbid any further use of my name as one of its officers.

Let me say that I am perfectly willing to allow Catholics the same rights of religious freedom that I demand for myself, have supported members of the Catholic Church for public office at every, or nearly every, election since I have been a voter, and expect to continue to do so when they are on my ticket and are competent for the office they seek, as they usually are. But above all, I wish to say that I regard the work of any organization whose purpose is to stir up religious strife at any time as unwise and unpatriotic, and at this time when everyone, both Catholics and Protestants, are uniting to carry on the great work of the war, it is but little less than treasonable. Please give this letter the same publicity as your previous article, so far as possible.

A Priest and Law

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The letter of Mr. Horace Hagan, published in one of your recent issues, was a surprise to me. The article attacked has not been written from the standpoint of a theologian, since there are no theological questions involved. The writer based his article on the legal propositions alone. As a general rule, Mr. Hagan's suggestion that theological questions should be left to theologians, and legal questions should be decided by those versed in the law, is correct, but we know that this cannot be laid down as a strict rule, for there are many men who have delved into matters entirely foreign to their particular calling. But in this particular instance, the author of "Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass" possesses the qualities not only of the theologian, but of the jurist, since, as professor of jurisprudence in the law department of Loyola University, he has been teaching law almost as long as my friend Mr. Hagan has been practising it. I must therefore put myself down as one lawyer who was "inspired with amazement," but the cause of my amazement was not Father Kenny's article, but Mr. Hagan's criticism.

Justice to the West

To the Editor of AMERICA:

As a proud westerner I rise to protest against even the mild rebuke implied in your editorial of May 18 on the Third Liberty Loan: "The West is now awake. It has at last realized the tremendous task that lies before it." In plain words: the West has been a slacker, but it is becoming one hundred per cent American. The West had no patriotic speeches delivered by "men, women and even children," especially the latter, "at every point of vantage," to boost the Third Liberty Loan, as had New York. The West had no "Blue Devils" from France or Anzacs from faraway Australia and New Zealand, no picked group of Pershing's men to lock steps with fluttering flags and flashing bayonets bringing home to everyone the fact that a great crisis was making its demand upon the faith and the generosity of a great people, as fortunate New York had. Whether we were not considered worthy of those gaudy trappings or whether we were thought not to be in need of them, I am not attempting to decide. But when the final count was made, rich and talkative New York, glutted with war profits, was at the very, very bottom of the list, while Minneapolis, generally supposed to be in the West, was at the very top!

Neither before we entered the war nor since that fateful day has the West been very much given to the blaring of trumpets. The "wild and woolly" stunts that are supposed to be characteristic of this part of the country, were noticeable in the East only and to an extreme degree. However, when the very first call for volunteers went out from Washington, Illinois, Indiana, and, I think, Iowa, furnished a number of men far above their quota, while New York again, war-wild New York, trailed far behind. The plain unvarnished truth is that the West has done, and is doing, its fullest share without claiming any special credit for it. But, to put it mildly, it does not relish to be lectured and patronized by the East, and, more specifically, not by New York!

Moline, Ill. J. B. CULEMAN.

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of May 18 you have an editorial on "The Third Liberty Loan." I was much impressed by its tone of enthusiasm, but there was one little sentence or statement which, being superfluous, might well have been left out: "The West is now awake; it has at last realized the tremendous task that lies before it."

As one born, raised, educated in the country between the Rockies and Allegheny Mountains, I wish to correct you in this unintentional mistake. The West has never been asleep. It is true that Indiana, Colorado, Nebraska and Missouri did not scream with the cabaret patriotism of Broadway prior to the entrance of America into the war. But Americanism, the purest, most deeply dyed, most orthodox was there, and when the cards were laid on the table it manifested itself to the great chagrin and humiliation of aristocratic Massachusetts and blue-blooded New York. Always, always, always these States led in enlistments long before, I would say weeks before, the draft law was promulgated, and even today several of the original thirteen States have not filled their quotas. Eleven Middle Western States filled their quotas while one seaboard State struggled manfully, vainly to procure the required number. And that State was Pennsylvania, not New York. Did it take until now, the time of the closing of the Third Liberty Loan, for the West to awaken? Surely this is a mistake.

County after county, town after town, city after city, went "over the top" in the first and second calls, singing, cheering, laughing with the same spirit that animates the laughing boys of your famous Sixty-ninth today. The Red Cross drives were wonderful in the West, and our K. of C., Y. M. C. A. and War Savings campaigns led or kept pace with the East in every single instance. And a few weeks before the war, a Boston paper made the remarkable statement: "The West is fortunate in being surrounded by patriots."

We were calumniated everywhere in the East and South, which sections have a monopoly on patriotism, but we will go further than the East, and as far as the South is concerned, there is no comparison and never will be. Remember, too, that anti-Catholic organizations are shorter-lived in the West than in any other section. The States of Grant, Lincoln, Sherman and Pershing are never scratched by "A. P. A.-ism," Socialism, or anarchy. Governor Catts, Elizabeth Gurley Flynn, or General Miles did not come from Colorado, Wyoming, Nebraska, Denver, Omaha, Indianapolis or dynamic Kansas City. Compare them with Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse or Newark.

Don't you really think your little statement, "The West is now awake," is just a bit superfluous? You did not mean to wound us. AMERICA would not wound intentionally. But a little correction would not be out of place with the true magnanimity of your wonderful paper.

Omaha. JOHN C. BYRNES.

[The sentence protested clearly refers to the whole United States in contradiction to Europe.—ED. AMERICA.]

A New "Union of the Churches"

A VERY entertaining session held by the Lower House of the Convocation of Canterbury was recently described by the London Tablet. Urging that "women must have scope" in the Establishment "for their gifts," the Archdeacon of Lewisham proposed to the august assembly that "lay women should have opened to them the same offices in the service of the Church as are open to men." Canon Speck, it is recorded, favored the innovation and was of the opinion that the admission of women to the pulpit would probably help to bring the men back to the Church. Dr. Sparrow-Simpson, however, opposed the Archdeacon's motion, saying: "If women stood in the church pulpits, they must also stand at church altars. They must be admitted to the episcopate. Then 'her Grace of York' would perhaps correspond with 'his Grace of Canterbury,' and even a union of the two provinces might be brought about by a domestic bond." The momentous question was then referred to a committee for settlement.

The chivalrous Archdeacon's suggestion, however, should not be lightly dismissed, for perhaps he has at last found a way of uniting in harmonious cooperation not only the nine divergent schools of thought, which, as Mr. Ronald Knox assures us, now exist in the Established Church, but the ordaining of women to the ministry may even be the means of gathering together into one highly domestic, though exceedingly undogmatic, body every sect of Protestantism. The marriage of all "Ultramarine" archimandrites to "Neo-Evangelical" archdeaconesses, for example, would doubtless give a controlling "High Church Liberal" character to the entire Establishment which would make it even easier than now for near-rationalists and near-Romanists to live together lovingly under the same roof-tree. Perhaps the admission of women to the pulpits of Protestantism, moreover, might eventually be the means of healing the lamentable divisions that now characterize the sects. Suppose, for instance, that each hard-and-fast Presbyterian minister chose a life partner from the pulpit of the neighboring Universalist church, or that every Eddyite faith-healer found a husband in a leader of the Adventist camp-meeting?

Another practical advantage that would doubtless follow the union in the bonds of matrimony of hitherto unreconcilable pulpiteers would be the mutual lightening of the ministry's labors and burdens. The morning "function," for example, could be splendidly conducted by the Rev. Mr. Churchly, and the attractive evening service by his no less reverend bride. St. Paul, to be sure, wrote Bishop Timothy something about women not being suffered to teach, and besides there is a very annoying absence of any proof that women were ordained in Apostolic times for the ministry of the altar, and that early precedent, moreover, has been perversely followed by some sixty generations of Christians. But what of that? Is the onward march of Protestantism to be stayed by a superstitious reverence for the usages of antiquity? As for the deplorably narrow and old-fashioned views held by the Apostle of the Gentiles regarding woman's place in the Church, Dr. Sparrow-Simpson suggested a summary way of avoiding the difficulty, for he would simply adopt a certain Liberal clergyman's device of dividing into two great classes everything attributed to St. Paul: "That which is not genuine and that which does not convince me."

Profit-Sharing

A COMPREHENSIVE investigation of profit-sharing in the United States was undertaken in 1915 by three manufacturers and two university professors. The results have recently been published. The authors are unhesitating in their praise of the system and behold in it a method of conciliation and good-will that should prove mutually beneficial to employer and employee. Labor, on the other hand, is often suspicious of all such plans. It fears in them a clever strategy to forestall a rise in wages and to bind the laborer to his work.

When honestly conducted, profit-sharing is doubtless of immediate advantage to the employee, since it supposes in all such cases that a standard wage has already been paid. The employer, of course, has his own ends to gain. They are an increased personal effort on the part of the workingman, and hence a general promotion of efficiency, together with a reduction of waste. No less important is the object of attaining a greater labor stability and securing industrial peace. Whatever tends to develop a spirit of cheerfulness and co-operation is of priceless value for the furtherance of effective management. The remark of Robert Owen may be quoted in this connection. When told by an employer that his men could make an additional £10,000 a year for him if they wished to, he answered: "Why don't you give them £5,000 for doing it?" We may readily admit, however, that purely Christian, or at least humanitarian motives often underlie the introduction of such methods.

The application of the profit-sharing system in the United States has hitherto been mainly restricted to skilled workers or to office employees and clerks. It ordinarily consists in dividing among these a certain percentage of the profits of an establishment. While many employers have given stock to their employees, it was usually under conditions that precluded participation in the administration of the company. To this, however, there have been notable exceptions.

The ideal goal of profit-sharing is evidently to be looked for in the distribution of a share in the management of the business itself, at first, it may be, among the most reliable of the employees. This is accomplished by a distribution of voting stock, as a part or whole of the profits shared. A prominent instance of such co-partnership plans is the South Metropolitan Gas Company of London, all of whose employees had become stockholders before the war, and were allowed to select two of the ten directors, although their combined stock did not entitle them to this. The more closely profit-sharing approaches to a real system of co-operation, the more heartily will it be welcomed. In no case should it be permitted to take the place of a living wage.

"Inefficient Management of the Universe"

IF there is one thing more than another which justifies the anxiety felt by both wife and physician concerning the mental unrest and the impending nervous collapse of the whimsical individual about whom centers the main interest in the recently published book, "Professor Latimer's Progress," it is found in his ridiculous and blasphemous attempt to excuse God's "inefficient management of the universe." No one but a man quite without mental balance would have seriously declared that "God is moving on to higher things. . . . This much I am convinced of, that God is improving more rapidly than man. . . . If the war is a step backward, He [God] has probably fallen back less than man." These words show that the "Professor" is indeed somewhat like what his admirers have claimed him to be, "an American Mr. Britling," for his disregard for conventional views shows him to be akin to that creation of Mr. Wells, with his absurd "theological system," for a God that improves is manifestly a contradiction in terms, an utter impossibility.

God needs no apologists. The moral evil, which is the cause of the present war, is man's exclusive responsibility. The Ruler of the Universe, once again as in the past, has allowed human passions to work out their own punishment. It is His infinite mercy that has kept the earth from opening and the flood-gates of heaven from deluging a world plunged in apostasy and iniquity. It is due to His forbearance that we are not consumed. Divine Providence has committed the management of the world to mankind, and man, puffed up with pride and material progress, has forgotten the Creator, flouted the moral law, gone after idols of gold, and is now reaping a bitter harvest of misdeeds.

What will be the end? No one can say with certainty. But it is probable that when the full measure of retribution has been made up, God will again lead His children out of the land of bondage. But before that time He must be propitiated. His dealings with His people of old would seem to indicate that He will not turn to them until they have turned, contrite of heart, to Him. The Holy Father, in his recent message to the world, setting the feast of Sts. Peter and Paul as a day of humble supplication and universal sacrifice, has pointed out the surest way to hasten the advent of that blessed time. Like the prodigal, the world must go back to its Father, with acknowledgment of sin and petitions for pardon, before it can regain the honorable and secure enjoyment of the good things of life. Who would dare say how distant is such a contingency? Men, certainly, are eating the husks of swine and thinking in their sorrow of the land of peace. Perhaps their home-coming is nearer than we think.

The Colleges and the Army

SOME of the damage wrought by war will prove irreparable. There can never be another cathedral of Reims, a glorious temple of God, dominating the world by its sheer beauty. It is gone, and gone forever. When the whole world is in arms, some ruin is inevitable. Yet in some respects we can control war's ravages. Even as the cannon roar, physicians, engineers, and educators are planning, not only to gather the fragments after war has ceased, but to preserve as much as possible of the fabric of civilization from attack.

All these efforts should be seriously considered, but few are worthy of more careful attention than the attempt of the Government to keep our young men at college. When his brothers and companions march away to fight for liberty, it is hard for the younger man, who has not been called, to understand that he can serve his country more effectively by applying himself to his studies than by enlisting. As a patriotic young American, he feels that his place is at the front, and he does not see that he is helping his country by devoting himself to books. The sentiment does him credit, but it is only a sentiment. "You serve your country by going to college," is the theme and warning of an announcement recently published by the Bureau of Education. But to make the young collegians' restraint more tolerable, the War Department has decided to introduce army training units into the colleges. Under this plan, the college student "will be liable for service at a moment's notice," but, continues the Department, "because you are worth more to the nation with your college training than without it, you will be expected to stay in college until you are called by the Government."

In accordance with this plan, military instruction will be provided in all colleges enrolling at least one hundred students under the age of eighteen. The military equipment will be furnished by the Government, and while enlistment will be purely voluntary, all students will be encouraged to fit themselves for military duty. Furthermore, it will be the policy of the Government not to call these young men until they have reached the age of twenty-one. The War Department hopes that the plan will be effective in preventing "the unnecessary and wasteful depletion of the colleges through indiscriminate volunteering, by offering the students a definite and immediate military status."

The plan has been carefully worked out, and it is hoped that as many as possible of our Catholic colleges will heartily cooperate with the Government. The advantage to the college, especially to the college which, for want of an endowment, must depend very largely on tuition fees, is obvious. But higher interests, dictated by patriotism and the welfare of religion are at stake. More than ever shall we need trained men after the war, and by closely cooperating with the Government, the colleges will help the country, both in its present, and most of all, in its future needs.

The Trials of a Rich Young Girl

"THE Church lays the rich under strict command," wrote Leo XIII, in one of the first of his famous Encyclicals, "to give their superfluity to the poor." This sentence mirrors the Catholic view, proposed boldly by the Fathers of the Church and with scientific accuracy by the theologians, that to distribute one's superfluous goods to the needy is a duty binding in charity, and, at times, in strict justice. But human nature, fertile in resource when seeking pleasure, has ever been prone to deny the very existence of "superfluous goods." "I can use all I have," it argues. "Whatever I possess, can be readily turned to my advantage. As for Lazarus at the gate, let him go to the portals of a richer man." This attitude was crystallized in a proposition, condemned in 1679 by Innocent XI: "It is scarcely possible to find among people engaged in worldly pursuits, even among kings, goods that are superfluous to social position. Therefore, hardly anyone is bound to give alms on this ground."

A young lady of seventeen summers, residing in New York, will probably never know by what a narrow margin she has escaped the ban thus solemnly proclaimed by the seventeenth century Pontiff. Although still a schoolgirl, she avers on oath that she cannot possibly maintain herself in a manner befitting her rank, being the offspring of a trafficker in live stock, on any sum less than $20,850 a year. As her present income, derived from her father's estate, is limited to $12,500, or about thirty-four dollars a day, she prays relief from the surrogate's court. An inspection of the budget submitted by this damsel exhibits with pathetic force the penury and privation of the rich. Her clothes cost $3,000 and her "pleasure trips" an equal sum. The household expenses of this young person at boarding school are $4,000, and for insurance she pays $850. Doctors, dentists and druggists ask $1,000 for their services, and in these hard times her "limousines and touring cars" mean an annual expenditure of $5,000. Finally, mindful of the higher things of the mind and of the future life, the girl proposes to expend $2,000 on "education, including French and music, and contributions to the Church." Thus does "the Church," if by the term one may understand all manner of charity, rescue this young lady, with her French and her music, from the shadow of a condemned proposition.

But French and music are sometimes costly luxuries. Two thousand dollars will not buy a great amount of either at "the fashionable school near Philadelphia," where this poor young lady is at present interned. One is therefore permitted to speculate whether, after all, she has really placed herself beyond the ban of Innocent XI. What part of this $2,000 has gone to the Red Cross, to the Knights of Columbus, and to other associations for the relief of men hourly risking their lives for this schoolgirl, who submits in tears, that she must have $5,000 a year to keep her limousine and touring cars in fit condition?

A Soldier of King Albert

A BELGIAN soldier had just stepped into the bureau of the Belgian Relief Commission in New York. Several months ago he had been wounded in a trench raid near Dixmude. A furlough had allowed him to return to America, where he had left his wife and children at the beginning of the war. Now his too brief leave of absence has expired. Too brief, in truth, for the face and the form of the little Belgian sergeant told the onlooker that he was as yet hardly ready to face the burdens and the dangers of war. But his King had called. Albert the Brave needed every available man to mount guard with him over the blood-stained and shell-torn trenches that still remain to him of what once was Belgium. For the King! The Belgian sergeant kissed wife and children good-by for the second time, faced the colors and answered the call. From a little farm in the West he proceeded to New York, and stepped into the bureau of the Belgian Relief Commission, there to ask for the help and advice that were readily and generously given.

The Belgian soldier was not rich in this world's goods. He had his soldier's kit, scantily supplied, his army record telling of his gallantry and services, the summons to the colors made out in the name of his Majesty, Albert I, King of the Belgians, and a photograph. To the name of Albert he pointed with pride. Well might he do so. That name stands for stainless honor, justice, loyalty. As his eyes fell upon the picture of the young wife whom he had just left so far away and so lonely, the innocent brows of his two little girls so helpless and so young, the lips of the brave man who had time and again faced shot and shell without a tremor, quivered, and a tear glistened in his eye. For one brief instant, unconsciously and unaware of a stranger's presence, he gazed on the face of his loved ones. His look told his story. A soldier, he was also a tender-hearted husband and a loving father. The little soldier silently murmured a prayer and recommended his dear ones to God. If death should find the soldier on the battlefield, the picture of wife and children will be found over his heart.

To all noble-hearted men the tears and the sorrow of the Belgian soldier will be sacred. They are a sign and a symbol. Sorrow and agony have seared many hearts in this cruel war, many tears have fallen by deserted firesides, over the ruins of crumbling homes, from the eyes of mothers weeping for their dead; many strong men have silently and furtively brushed away the tears which, in spite of themselves, would flow as they bade farewell to their soldier sons, and many are waiting for the sound of well-known and loved footfalls that will never again re-echo at their doors. It is all a great mystery, but in God's designs a great lesson also. We may not fully understand. But we know that it is for the best. In the eyes of God the sorrows and the tears of the little Belgian sergeant and of his fellow-sufferers are holy and sacred. They will cleanse and they will purify many hearts. In their bitterness there is strength. They are the offering and the sacrifice of the soul.

Under the chastening influence of the sorrow and pain that they connote others will feel that sorrow is not in vain, and that it is when the heart is crushed and broken that it is more closely drawn to God. We do not understand the mystery of pain. But we realize that the grief borne for a noble cause is never useless. If the Belgian soldier wept, he knew also that the wife he had left to answer the call of honor would not have him avoid that pang by treason to his country and his King. Their mutual sorrow proved that both had been equal to the summons of a noble duty and a supreme sacrifice. Great sorrows ennoble and purify. It is God's way to try great souls in their crucible. In their fierce fires all the dross is purged away: the pure gold alone remains.

Literature

POET VERSUS PHILOSOPHER

THAT the poet is the antithesis of the philosopher is an assumption quite as current among the bookish as it is among the bookless. We know how Plato, the philosopher, wanted to exclude the poets from his ideal republic, although the first one to be obliged to go would be Plato, the poet, and as recently as Mr. Chesterton the incompatibility of poetry and logic, which is a part of philosophy, is assumed as an absolute truth. In "Orthodoxy" the latter says, "Poetry is sane because it floats easily in an infinite sea; reason seeks to cross the infinite sea, and so make it finite. The poet only asks to get his head into the heavens. It is the logician who seeks to get the heavens into his head. And it is his head that splits." The paradox of it all is that Plato and Chesterton are personally most splendid refutations of their theory about the relations between the poet and the philosopher. Plato's literary immortality is due at least as much to the poetry of his myths as to the dialectic of his Socrates; Mr. Chesterton is almost as dear to his contemporaries for his poems as for his brilliant logic.

Nor are these two men solitary examples in the history of philosophy, of logic becoming lyrical or lyrics becoming logical. Plato's predecessors in Greek philosophy were so accustomed to poetize their philosophy that it is hard to see how he formed such a bad opinion of poets as to wish them beyond the frontiers of his Utopia. Homer, as Horace tells us, is a better moral philosopher than the Stoics. Hesiod's "Theogony," which was the first crude attempt at a world-philosophy, is presented in meter. Anaximander, Xenophanes, Parmenides, Empedocles, of whom Plato has so much to say in the dialogues, were poets as well as philosophers. And Rome, so poor in philosophers, could count among their number Lucretius, one of her greatest poets. Surely, even a cursory glance at the history of Greek and Roman philosophies impels us to believe that they are noted for an alliance between poetry and philosophy.

The Patristic period, with the exception of the great St. Augustine, is not prolific in philosophers. The time of the great Fathers was so occupied in crushing the head of heresy and building up theology that it was diverted from constructing philosophies. There is consequently little evidence for or against our thesis that philosophy is often happily wedded to poetry.

But with the rise of scholasticism a new era of creative thought opens and its course is paralleled and often blended with poetical elements. An entire school of philosophy, the Victorines, whose chief representative is Hugh of St. Victor, were poets, mystics and philosophers. St. Bonaventure, the most orthodox of mystics, was a keen philosopher and a sublime poet, and the crowning glory of scholasticism, one of the world's great philosophers, St. Thomas Aquinas is the author of the poetry of the liturgy pertaining to the Office of the Blessed Sacrament. Finally, in Dante's immortal epic, the swan song of scholasticism, all that is best and noblest in the philosophy of the "Bright Ages" is enshrined in poetry. Thus the history of the second creative philosophy of the West is even richer in poet-philosophers than the first.

Modern philosophy, having divorced itself from revelation, and placed faith and philosophy on different, even antagonistic bases, cannot rightly complain if it has lost all the poetry of life in this unnatural separation. The one-sided view naturally resulting hinders the poet as well as the philosopher from seeing life steadily and seeing it whole. Still, modern philosophy is not entirely devoid of examples where poetry and philosophy coalesced in the same individual. Coleridge is both the author of "Aids to Reflection," which contains an original philosophy and of "The Ancient Mariner" too. Aubrey de Vere has investigated in his own way the problem that so long exercised the scholastics, the relations between faith and reason, and has also made a valuable contribution to the burning political question of Ireland's place in the sun.

Cardinal Newman is one of the great philosophers of the nineteenth century, as "A Grammar of Assent" and "An Essay on Development" prove, and he is—apologies to the "Cambridge History of English Literature"—a great poet, besides, as "The Dream of Gerontius" shows. Lastly the name of another Catholic poet with us but the other day, Francis Thompson, is held by some critics to belong to the metaphysical school, so we are forced to conclude that he was no alien to philosophy. And we ought to mention Mr. Chesterton again, just for good measure and to bring our discussion down to the present moment. As a philosopher he has done much to put modern skepticism, pseudo-science and agnosticism in its proper place, and though his poems are not legion, they are of concentrated quality. Nor is Mr. Belloc, whose right is to be called a philosopher of history none will dispute, by any means an enemy to the muses.

One remarkable fact about poet-philosophers is that they were generally religious, and the more religious and the better their religion, the better was their poetry. Some might scent an objection regarding the poet-philosophers of paganism, relying on the fictitious version of a pagan as a man of no religion. But this objection vanishes when we remember that the classic pagan was generally a man of seven or eight religions at the very least. The fact is hinted at by Cardinal Newman in his "Essay on Aristotle's Poetics" where he says: "Revealed Religion should be especially poetical—and it is so in fact. With Christians, a poetical view of things is a duty—we are bid to color all things with hues of faith, to see a Divine meaning in every event, and a superhuman tendency. Even our friends around are invested with unearthly brightness, no longer imperfect men, but beings taken into Divine favor, stamped with His seal, and in training for future happiness." This is said of revealed religion, but it holds in a lesser degree even of the religion of nature and throws some light on the question why positivism or materialism as philosophies were unable to enlist any real poets in their ranks.

TO A BUTTERFLY

Let me watch thee, little swimmer
Of the air, till dim and dimmer
Grow mine eyes with thy quick motion
In thy zephyr-billowy ocean;
Fluttering here, then yonder dashing,
In the sunlight sudden flashing
Into quivering beauty golden
Soft as buds by night-winds folden;
Darting, pausing, wheeling, turning
In and out and swiftly spurning
All that is not light and airy
Like thyself, thou sprite of Faery.

Circling low or winging over
Daisied lawns and meads of clover,
Where the latest berries quicken,
Where the greenest grass doth thicken,
Where the sweetest flower bloweth,
Ever on and on thou goeth,
Seeming in thy tireless flight
A wingéd spark of dancing light.

Then let me watch thee, little swimmer
Of the air, for dim and dimmer
Grow mine eyes with gathering sorrow
When I think thou hast no morrow;
Thus I'm taught of thee and fate,
Fairest things have shortest date.

REVIEWS

God and Man. Lectures on Dogmatic Theology. From the French of the Rev. L. Labauche, S.S. Authorized Translation. Vol I. God. New York: P. J. Kenedy and Sons. $1.75.

Any attempt to bring before our people the vast treasures of Catholic theology must be heartily welcomed. The more Catholics realize the splendid harmonies of their Faith, and the strength of the noble foundations on which it is built, the more will they admire and love it. The more readily also they can give a reasonable account of the doctrines they profess and the more convincingly they can answer the objections either of prejudiced enemies or of earnest seekers after truth, the more efficiently will they fulfil the duty incumbent upon them of making others share in the great blessing they enjoy.

In the work of Father Labauche the priest will find a clear, methodical exposition of the great dogmas which he is called upon to explain to his people. The educated layman who has thoroughly mastered that golden abridgment of Catholic theology, the catechism, will not find the lectures of the eminent Paris divine too abstruse or academic. They follow it is true the rather severe lines of the scholastic method. They are brief, perhaps a little too brief at times, but they are clear. They strike the golden mean between the rigid exposition of the classroom and the more diffuse presentation of the pulpit. The lectures meet a current objection of the day, one which we are sure has been frequently proposed to some at least of our readers. For one of the objections frequently brought against the dogmas of our Faith is that "at no matter what period of their history we consider them, whether upon their first appearance in Holy Writ, or at the time of their development in tradition, or at the time of their conciliar definition," they are an altogether human product. That objection kept pace to some extent with the growth and development of the theory of evolution. For evolutionists tell us that developed from lower forms man has developed his religion also to suit his surroundings and the various stages of his growth. The doctrine of religious evolution culminated in that synthesis of all heresies, Modernism, so cogently and efficiently condemned in the Encyclical of Pius X, "Pascendi Gregis Dominici."

There are three parts in the lectures of Father Labauche. In the first he treats of the Trinity, in the second of the Incarnate Word, in the last of Christ the Redeemer. The treatment of the author though brief is comprehensive; he discusses for instance in the second part, "The Fact of the Redemption," "Vicarious Satisfaction," "The Work of the Redemption," "The Three Offices of Christ the Redeemer," and "The Worship of Christ the Redeemer."

The Man Who Survived. By Camille Marbo. Translated from the French by Frank H. Porter. New York: Harper and Brothers. $1.35.

This is one of those searching psychological studies in which the French are unexcelled, and attempts to set forth the confusing mental phenomena resulting from a strange case of dual personality. Two intimate friends are wounded by the same bullet, which, passing through the head of the first, kills him and presumably carries with it a portion of his brain into the brain of the second. On his recovery, the survivor finds himself with the memories, temperament and principles of the one, and the body and the material cravings of the second. He is horrified to discover that everyone regards him as a different person from what he believes himself to be. The story is told in the form of a diary, which, granting the initial, impossible supposition on which it is based, is plausible enough and weirdly beautiful but rather gruesome. The wounded man recovers, and in spite of intense mental anguish, endeavors to reconstruct his life. In addition to the alien outer form under which he is forced to masquerade, he finds himself possessed of physical tendencies, vices and attractions, which he despises and does not recognize for his own, bodily impulses strongly at variance with the moral aspirations of his soul, which cannot for all its efforts at mastery, gain a complete dominance. Not even his wife, whom he remarries, is the same, and he is distressed to realize that her response to his unchanged love is disconcertingly different from what it was before. Not only from without, but also, and principally, from within he experiences contradictions which perplex and torture him. There is a brief discussion of the possible explanations of his condition, but the author leaves it unsolved, except for a hint which she does not develop. It is a book of fascinating possibilities, and in many ways is very remarkable, although it is all wrong on its basic assumption, quite awry on the nature of personality, and very much at sea on the true nature of man.

The Old Huntsman and Other Poems. By SIEGFRIED SASSOON. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co., $2.00.

This English realist endeavors, not always with success, to make poetry out of the commonplace. The long poem which begins the book treats of the reflections and reminiscences of a decrepit old hunter who can no longer go out with the hounds. A number of the verses which follow grimly paint the sordid side of life in the trenches and the author's rather cynical opinion of the soldier's soul. But such poems as "Brothers" and "Absolution," the latter beginning,

> The anguish of the earth absolves our eyes
> Till beauty shines in all that we can see.
> War is our scourge; yet war has made us wise,
> And fighting for our freedom, we are free,

are in a higher strain; the pictures in poems like "Morning Express, "Night-piece," and "October" are vivid and faithful, and the spiritual note is sounded in "A Child's Prayer" and in the following stanzas entitled "Morning Glory":

> In this meadow starred with spring
> Shepherds kneel before their King.
> Mary throned, with dreaming eyes,
> Gowned in blue like rain-washed skies,
> Lifts her tiny Son that He > May behold their courtesy.
> And green-smocked children, awed and good,
> Bring Him blossoms from the wood.
> Clear the sunlit steeples chime
> Mary's coronation-time.
> Loud the happy children quire
> To the golden-windowed morn;
> While the Lord of their desire
> Sleeps below the crimson thorn.

Can We Believe in Immortality? By JAMES H. SNOWDEN, D.D., LL.D. New York: The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

The author of this book begins with the assumption that "Our question is one of probability and faith," and after 200 pages of argumentation and citation, after "following all gleams of light, listening to all voices and intimations of mind and heart, nature and revelation, science and Scripture," he joins "in faith with Socrates as, taking the fatal hemlock, he said, 'The venture is a glorious one.'" But the author cannot rise above the skeptical conclusion of Donald Hankey that "True religion means betting one's life there is a God." Almost in the same sentence and as a confirmation of the foregoing, he quotes Job, "I know that my Redeemer liveth," seemingly unaware of any difference between the undoubting assurance of the Prophet and the adventurous spirit of Donald Hankey. With a wealth of illustration and a style, clear, convincing and entertaining, with a breadth of view which admits of no denial of the writer's familiarity with his subject nor of his high motive, yet as a Doctor of Divinity and a Christian, who esteems Our Lord above all others, and acknowledges His miracles and His Resurrection, the author still finds it within the scope of his logic to leave his question, "Can We Believe in Immortality?" hanging in doubt and poised upon an ardent but uncertain trust which he calls faith.

To any but a vague, Protestant and Kantian mind, the evident implication can only be that either Christ's words are not absolutely convincing, or else that Dr. Snowden is not altogether convinced of Christ. In confirmation of the latter hypothesis and as an example of the hovering and indecisive attitude of the modern mind when confronted by a religious truth which is not palatable to popular pseudo-scientists, an attitude leading inevitably to compromise, we find this author writing a treatise on immortality and using as one of his arguments the "incompleteness of the world," that is, its unfairness in its rewards and punishments, and yet not mentioning one word about hell in the whole book, though he spends three beautiful chapters on a minute description of eternal bliss. As a further illogical sop to materialistic science, which, judging from the quantity of literature on the next life that has been occasioned by the war, seems to have been jolted somewhat out of its accustomed complacency, Dr. Snowden accepts without a qualm of doubt the whole theory of materialistic evolution from the primordial atom right on up to Shakespeare, apparently again innocent of the fact that by so doing he knocks the prop out from under every reasonable argument for immortality. At any rate it is comforting to detect this trend of thought back from utter materialism into an acknowledgment of the salient facts of Christianity, though in the process there still cling shreds of an outworn and irreligious science. It may be hoped that the day is near when Protestant divines may even surpass the pagan Socrates in faith, and eventually come to acknowledge as certain every jot and tittle of the Christian religion on the Divine authority of its Founder.

W. H. G.

The Father of a Soldier. By W. J. DAWSON. New York: John Lane Co. $1.00.

This is an interesting and well-written account of the evolution in mind and spirit that took place in the life of the father of Lieutenant Dawson after that young author had answered the call to arms. The author's ignorance of Anglo-Irish relations deserves passing mention. It was emphasized negatively when he failed to remark the irony of "Tipperary" as an English war-song and was brought out positively when he said: "I shall hardly be contradicted if I say that the English are the most contentious people in the world where personal rights are involved" and again, when he remarks they are "always bristling with pugnacity at the least threat of tyranny."

Many of the sentiments enunciated concerning religion, too, would be startling were they less common among the professed pastors of flocks outside the Church. Speaking of the immortality of the soul, the author observes that: "This belief is, of course, a traditional belief, inculcated by the Christian religion, but like most traditional beliefs it has little real vitality and no firm grip upon the mind." If after 400 years of "reformation" and counter-reformation and all sorts of makings over, the belief that Christ taught has been so mangled and traduced in its tradition, it is not remarkable that "It has little real vitality and no firm grip upon the mind." If the author's soldier-son shares his father's conviction in this and like matters of religion, it is not to be wondered at that he looked for a soldiers' church where there would be less "pietistic camouflage" and more real sacrifice. However, the book is one that should help to bring vacillating parents to a realization of their duty and teach them that even the greatest sacrifices have their accompanying strength and consolation. The lesson is pleasantly taught, too, for it is inculcated in language that is natural and vivid.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The P. F. Volland Company of Chicago are publishing for small children an attractive series of fifty-cent "Sunny Books" with gaily colored pictures and simple rhymes. Three of the books we have received are "Tales of Little Cats," with verses by Carrie Jacobs-Bond and illustrations by Katharine Sturges Dodge; "Just for You," with rhymes by Pauline Croll and illustrations by Mary R. Bossett, and "Sunny Rhymes for Happy Children," by Olive Beaupre Miller, for which Carmen L. Browne makes the pretty pictures.——The latest edition to the "Stories All Children Love" series is Miss Mulock's charming tale of "The Little Lame Prince" (Lippincott, $0.50). Maria L. Kirk has made four excellent pictures in color of Prince Dolor and his wonderful traveling cloak.

The six best-selling works of fiction during April, according to the Bookman were these: "The Tree of Heaven," Sinclair; "The U. P. Trail," Grey; "Oh, Money! Money!" Porter; "The Pawn's Count," Oppenheim; "The Major," Connor; and "White Morning," Atherton. The six books bearing on the war which were most read during the same period were: "Private Peat," Peat; "Outwitting the Hun," O'Brien; "Face to Face with Kaiserism," Gerard; "Glory of the Trenches," Dawson; "Over the Top" and "First Call," Empey. All have been noticed in these columns except "The Pawn's Count" and "Glory of the Trenches." Mr. Oppenheim's novel is a "machine-made" story of German intrigue in this country during the first years of the war, and Lieutenant Coningsby Dawson's little book tells of his experiences as a wounded man, of his early days as a soldier and of "God as We See Him."

"Our Country's Call," the stirring address delivered at the Solemn Pontifical Field Mass celebrated at Camp Dix, Wrightstown, N. J., Sunday, May 12, by the Rev. Joseph A. Mulry, S.J., the eloquent President of Fordham University, is the leading article in the current Catholic Mind. It would be a deed of patriotism to distribute the pamphlet as widely as possible among the American soldiers in cantonments or at the front and among all their non-combatant relatives as well. For Father Mulry, after clearly explaining what the Catholic foundations of patriotism are, and proving the justice of our war of defense against German aggression, points out what a generous response to the nation's call has already been made by American men and women, and ends with a ringing appeal to the departing troops to fight valiantly for God and country and to return home in triumph with unsullied banners. The second paper in the number gives the Catholic message which "The Cross of Neuve Chapelle" told the Rev. Mr. Thomas Tiplady, a Methodist chaplain, and the issue ends with an excellent list of "Books for Catholic Children" which Father Reville has prepared.

The second issue of Canon Clancey's "Orbis Catholicus, a Year Book of the Catholic World" (The Universe Press, Effingham House, Strand, London, 7s.), that excellent work of reference which first came out two years ago, has just appeared. The main improvements in the volume are the accounts of the Religious Orders and Congregations of women, historical sketches of the dioceses whose names begin with B and the publication of a list of the Eastern Churches in communion with Rome. Additions and corrections made up to March of this year render the volume as accurate as possible. After the war Canon Clancey hopes to be able to include in his book a list of the various lay societies and organizations in various countries, the Catholic orders of knighthood and the Catholic papers and periodicals throughout the world. Editors especially will find the "Orbis Catholicus" of great value.

"Now I've been getting morbid again!" exclaims one of the characters in Ernest Poole's "His Second Wife" (Macmillan, $1.50). "For goodness' sake, let's try to be healthy and clear about this." But this fervent exhortation does not seem to have much effect upon the author himself. Even the extreme expedient of causing the hero of the book to be stricken with something like brain-fever, does not seem to untangle the plot and the wearied reader ends by asking himself what it is all about.——Bruce Barton, the enterprising editor of the recently discontinued Every Week, has written, in "The Making of George Groton" (Doubleday, $1.40), a book almost wholly for the children of this world, yet having its moral for the children of light. It is a wholly natural philosophy of business and love put into a novel of twentieth-century realism slightly touched with romance. The desire for success, the ambition for it, the lust for it, the sin for it; these grow on one another in the pages, and sound business maxims blossom through the chapters. The author pays tribute, in language of his own, to the edifying sight of people going to daily Mass.——"A Girl Alone" (Putnam, $1.50), by Howell Evans, is the story of a fair Australian maiden who reaches London friendless and moneyless but in the darkest hours of her struggle for a virtuous livelihood always finds a kind and helping hand. The squalor and suffering of England's poor are vividly pictured.

Joyce Kilmer of the One Hundred and Sixty-fifth Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, now a sergeant in an observation post at the front, sent Good Housekeeping the following "Prayer of a Soldier in France":

My shoulders ache beneath my pack,
(Lie easier, Cross, upon His back.)
I march with feet that burn and smart,
(Tread, Holy Feet, upon my heart.)
Men shout at me who may not speak,
(They scourged Thy back and smote Thy cheek.)
I may not lift a hand to clear
My eyes of salty drops that sear,
(Then shall not fickle soul forget Thy agony of Bloody Sweat.)
My rifle hand is stiff and numb,
(From Thy pierced palm red rivers come.)
Lord, Thou didst suffer more for me,
Than all the hosts of land and sea.
So let me render back again
This millionth of Thy gift. Amen.

"Readings in English Literature" (Allyn & Bacon), compiled by Roy Bennett Pace, is designed as a companion volume to a history of English literature, its purpose being to illustrate by selected readings the growth and development of English literature from Beowulf to Stevenson. The best authors from each literary period or movement are represented by one or more selections. The period of the nineteenth century will probably prove a disappointment to many readers of this volume, as some well-known authors, amongst others Cardinal Newman, are without representation.——A book that should prove suggestive and interesting to teachers of English in the first year of the high school is "Everyday English Composition," by Emma Miller Bolenius, A.M. (American Book Co., $0.80). While the usual topics of English precepts are discussed, they are proposed in an original way. Emphasis throughout is laid upon ways and means to practise every day some oral or written English composition. Some minute details are dwelt upon that could well be left to the intuition of a competent instructor.——It is a venturesome thing to grow enthusiastic over a textbook before it has been tried out in a classroom, but at any rate the three volumes of "Hamilton's Standard Arithmetics" (American Book Co., $0.44, $0.48, and $0.56) deserve to be recommended for such a test. Each volume is arranged to cover the work of two years, and the following points are stressed in all the volumes: Drills to give ease in figuring, easy steps in gradation, and close relation of business problems to real conditions.——F. G. Carpenter's "Geographical Readers" are well known to grammar-school instructors. To this series has been added lately "Around the World with the Children" (American Book Co., $0.60). This reader is intended to give the child his first lesson in geography. Well illustrated with pictures of strange places and peoples, the book is written in a style suited to the capacity of the children for whom it is intended.

The June Catholic World is a very readable number. It opens with Hugh Anthony Allen's excellent paper on Francis Thompson, "The Poet of the Return to God," in which the author points out and emphasizes the "quickening influence of Franciscan philosophy" upon Thompson's life and work. Moorhouse I. X. Millar, S.J., continues his series on "International Law," contrasting "Modern Thought and Scholastic Philosophy." Sir Bertram Windle, in assigning "Some Causes of Theophobia," today, finds one to be the dreary Evangelical Protestantism in which so many children of fifty years ago were reared. In Father Palmieri's article on "The Russian Church and the Russian Revolution," the patriarchal system of government in the Orthodox Church is shown to have been brought into serious jeopardy by the Bolsheviki; in "Living Stones" Miss Blanche M. Kelly contributes an admirable paper on the American centenary of the Society of the Sacred Heart, and John Bunker, after discussing in "Esthetic Laws and Moral Principles," some of the recent American exploiters of indecency and blasphemy in literature, shows that vice per se can never be the real object of art. One of the poems in the number is Father Garesché's stanzas on the newly ordained priest who says to his hands:

Time was when ye were powerless
To shrive and sign, anoint and bless;
Clasped, ye worshiped from afar,
That Host, as distant as a star.
Your palms were barren still and cold;
Ye might not touch, ye might not hold,
God, whom the signs of bread enfold.

But now, ah now, most happy hands
Ye fold the Saviour's swaddling bands,
Ye lift His tender limbs and keep
The snowy bed where He doth sleep.
His heart, His blood, His being fair,
All God and Man is in your care!
Ye are His guardians everywhere. . . .

The prevailing note in "Songs of Sunrise" (Little, Brown, $1.25), Mr. Denis McCarthy's latest volume is one of cheerfulness and optimism. "The Freedom Lovers" is a ringing summons to war, and the verses in dialect are among the best in the book, particularly "Dreaming of Summer" with its concluding stanza:

All the winther weary, in the nightime an' the daytime
Sittin' here and sighin, I've been longin' for the spring,
Longin' in the lightness an' the brightness of the Maytime
Just to dhrag myself abroad to hear the robins sing!
Far away from Erin where the winther's mild and mellow
(Seldom there the cold makes the singin' rivers dumb)
What's a man to do when he's a poor ould feeble fellow?
Only dream of summers past an' summers yet to come.

Owing, no doubt, to an oversight the story of "Little Norry Sullivan's" vocation is not credited to AMERICA, where it originally appeared.

In "The Burglar of the Zodiac" (Yale University Press, $1.25) William Rose Benét gives an excellent poetic description of "The Quick-Lunch Counter," a phenomenon rapidly growing in favor with our modern poets. But such couplets as

"Pellucid peacock-colored ripples
The plangent sunlight strikes along" while pardonable in high-school poets, make small appeal to lovers of genuine poetry.

EDUCATION

Some Parish School Problems

IT was a short-sighted person, with a larger fondness for epigram than for accuracy, who said that the ideal school was a saw-log, with a student at one end and Mark Hopkins at the other. Probably no dictum coming down from the dubious and misty past has been subjected to more misinterpretation than this crystallized story of Mark Hopkins and his log. None has aroused more ire, as you know well, if you have ever had to prove to a principal or to a board, educated under the old régime, that history cannot be taught without a set of ancient and modern maps, or that you need test-tubes in a laboratory. A magnificent building, set in a park, is a poor substitute for a school; but there is no reason why a school should view with equanimity, the real misfortune of being housed in a hovel. We all take color from environment. Considering the fact that you and I and the children belong to a genus irritabile, along with cooks, poets and musicians, it seems at least possible that a dismal, stuffy schoolhouse may lead even honest men to justify a dismal, stuffy style of teaching. I think it is the veteran English educator, Father Rickaby, who remarked that medieval Englishmen were wont to choose imposing sites for their public schools, and to house them in buildings worthy of their surroundings. This practice, he thinks, not only gave some prominence to the idea that a schoolhouse is something better than a tavern, but had an elevating effect on the minds of teachers and pupils.

THE SOUL OF THE SCHOOL

BUT with all generous allowance made for the necessity and value of a school plant that is both well-equipped and beautiful, it must always remain true that the soul of an educational institution is its teaching staff. As Dr. Burns notes with satisfaction, in his "Catholic Education," of late years we have been able to give more attention to buildings and equipment, so that in many of the larger cities, the parochial schools compare very favorably with the schools erected and maintained by public assessment. This is pure gain, especially since in our growing prosperity, even greater attention has been paid to the formation of capable teachers. But much remains to be done, before the high standard maintained by the majority of the teaching congregations becomes general. An experienced diocesan superintendent, the Right Reverend P. R. McDevitt, now Bishop of Harrisburg, has stated that in his opinion the most urgent needs of our schools are "better teachers and more teachers." Dr. Burns too, while holding that "from the comparative point of view," that is, in comparison with the public school teachers, the training of our Sisters and Brothers is "satisfactory," says "There can be no doubt that the greatest need of the parochial school is the better preparation of the teacher."

It is our contention that the parish school gives all that the public school can give, and in general, this contention is sustained by incontestable facts. But our schools and academies are daily growing in numbers, and in the laudable effort to answer the demand for teachers, technical requirements may sometimes be overlooked. To rob Peter that Paul may be satisfied, has generally been accounted poor policy. Whether it is good policy to open an academy or college, when this embarkation on the troubled sea of higher education means that the parish school must take whatever teachers remain, may be left to wiser heads for decision. All that can be said here is, that since the majority of our children will never get much beyond the eighth grade, the principle of the greatest good to the greatest number would assign none but thoroughly trained teachers to the parish school.

THE TRAINING OF THE TEACHERS

THIS thorough training for teachers was strongly recommended by the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884), which even went so far as to mark out a fairly definite plan. The Council supposed that every diocese would have its diocesan school board, a vigorous body in close touch with local needs, with powers to ascertain by examination the fitness of teachers assigned to the parish schools. No one was to be allowed to teach unless, after examination, a diploma was granted by the board, and then only for a period not to exceed five years. At the expiration of this time, a second and final examination was to be held, and if found satisfactory, the teacher might be licensed to teach in any school of the diocese. Had these wise provisions been adopted universally, the results would have been excellent. Unfortunately, however, it was found impossible in many dioceses to follow the wishes of the Council; furthermore, in Dr. Burns's view, the plan itself had two fatal defects. The first was, that it did not apply to the interdiocesan Congregations. As in many dioceses the majority of the teachers were members of these Institutes, the local school boards soon adopted the practice of accepting without further question the credentials presented by the Congregations. In most cases, no doubt, these credentials were a sufficient guaranty of the applicant's fitness; nevertheless the practice soon did away with the formal examination contemplated by the Council, since there was no real ground for discriminating between the diocesan and interdiocesan Congregations. The second defect was, that until recently, the typical diocesan school board had very little real authority, and, apparently, was disinclined to ask an extension of the few powers which it possessed. Furthermore, as every priest can testify, the demand for teachers has always exceeded the supply. Given the case of urgent need, it is not surprising that both the diocesan authorities and the religious superiors occasionally should have acted on the principle, that as half a loaf is better than starvation, a school imperfectly equipped was better than no school at all. No fault can be found with the argument, but it was one of the reasons why, in Dr. Burns's words, "the plan, so far as it relates to the examination and certification of teachers, has not proved a success."

Examinations and Certificates

TIME, aided no doubt by the helpful spirit of the newer type of diocesan school board, has worked out a more satisfactory plan. Today there are few, if any, teaching communities which do not provide rigorous professional courses for their members, and in the various dioceses the powers of the school board and of the diocesan superintendent have been extended and defined. The Congregations realize that, allowing for the exceptional case, it is exceedingly unwise to send into the classroom, teachers who must rely on good will and hard work to supply for the want of technical training. When the superintendent is assured that the program of studies followed in the Congregations is adequate, the examination of candidates for teaching in the schools of his diocese may safely be left to the community authorities. On the other hand, if he judges that the courses are insufficient, he is imposing no hardship in requiring an examination, before he issues a teacher's certificate. If he is to be held responsible for keeping the schools to a reasonable standard, it is only fair that he should have, in conjunction with the community inspectors, the right of protesting incompetent principals and teachers.

In all the difficulties which the authorities must still solve, the most encouraging sign for the future is the zeal displayed by the teaching Congregations to fit themselves for the great work of education. During the last ten years, the normal school training has been extended and strengthened, summer institutes have been organized, and hundreds of Sisters have attended the summer school at the Catholic University and other Catholic colleges. In the supernatural spirit which animates them, our Sisters and Brothers have an immeasurable advantage over the purely professional teacher. When to this spirit an adequate technical training is added, they form a body whose influence in education and for the good of religion, cannot be estimated.

The Oklahoma Mass Wine Decision

MUCH more common than the recurrence of a blue moon is a decision by some American tribunal which strengthens our fast waning belief that lawyers may have some unsuspected function in this world, and that our American courts, despite their faults, are real sources of relief. On May 21, the Supreme Court of the State of Oklahoma rendered a decision which will furnish to Catholics one of the strongest weapons at their command, in the fight against the "demon Prohibition." The legal and moral aspects of the famous Oklahoma "bone-dry law" whose anti-Catholic teeth have thus been drawn, have been discussed at length in these pages, for it was thought well, in a matter of such importance, to invite the fullest examination. While the opinions expressed by lawyers, clergymen, and publicists of distinction, were in some degree divergent, it is confidently hoped that the discussion has served to arouse Catholics to the danger inherent in the insane form of Prohibition advocated by an anti-Catholic, and, unfortunately, by an unthinking Catholic element.

History of the Case

EARLY in 1917, the legislature of the State of Oklahoma passed the Ferguson "bone-dry law." It merited that name by excellence, and among other clauses provided that "It shall be unlawful for any person in this State to receive directly or indirectly any liquors, the sale of which is prohibited by the State, from a common or other carrier." Not long after the passage of the act, the Rev. John Van Castle, a Catholic priest stationed at Guthrie, Oklahoma, had occasion to order a supply of altar wine, whereupon the Santa Fe Railway, in all good faith, alleged that under the law it could not act as a carrier, since altar wine was a liquor, the sale of which was prohibited. Thereupon the Chancellor of the Diocese of Oklahoma, the Rev. Urban de Hasque, D.D., brought suit in the District Court to compel the Santa Fe to receive and deliver shipments of wine intended solely for sacramental purposes. This suit was unsuccessful. On December 24, 1917, in a decision rendered by Judge Clarke, the Court held that according to the statute, wine "even for sacramental purposes," was forbidden in the State of Oklahoma. Dr. de Hasque appealed in due form, and on May 21, 1918, the Supreme Court of the State, after defining the issue, "whether the laws of this State, prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors, include such altar wine," ruled that wine for sacramental purposes was not included. For this most effective rebuke to the bigotry which deliberately set itself out to make the Mass impossible, the Catholics of the United States owe a debt of deep gratitude to the zeal and energy of the Chancellor of Oklahoma, Dr. de Hasque.

Principles of Decision

A BRIEF outline of this decision has been given in AMERICA; its importance, however, as an affirmation of the American spirit of religious liberty, suggests a closer examination. The Court prefixes to its decision, a Syllabus of eight members:

(1) Chapter 16, Session Laws 1917, prohibiting the receiving of liquors, the sale of which is prohibited by the laws of this State, from a common carrier, does not make it an offense for a Roman Catholic priest to receive altar wine, to be used solely for sacramental purposes in Divine worship.

(2) The provisions of section 46, article 25, of the Constitution, prohibiting the sale and transportation of intoxicating liquors, does not apply to altar wine to be used solely for sacramental purposes in Divine worship, although such wine be capable of use as a beverage, and if drunk in sufficient quantities, will produce intoxication.

(3) A thing may be within the letter of the law and yet not within the law, because not within its spirit, nor within the intention of its makers.

(4) Among other things which may be considered in determining the intent of the lawmakers is the evil which it is designed to remedy; and therefore this Court properly looks at contemporaneous events, the situation as it existed, and as it was pressed upon the intention of the lawmakers.

(5) No purpose of action against religion and religious institutions, when properly conducted, can be imputed to any legislative body.

(6) It is a cardinal rule in the construction of constitutions and statutes that the intention of the lawmakers, when ascertained, must govern, and that to ascertain the intent all the various portions of the legislative enactments upon the particular subject, including subsequent enactments, should be construed together, and given effect as a whole.

(7) When it is apparent that a strict interpretation of a particular statute, construed alone, would defeat the intention of the legislature as shown by other legislative enactments which relate to the same subject, and which have been enacted in pursuance of and according to a general purpose in accomplishing particular results, the suppression of a particular evil, such construction should not be adopted.

(8) Construction placed on the laws by officers charged with the enforcement thereof in the discharge of their duties, at or near the time of their enactment, which has long been acquiesced in, is a just medium for their judicial interpretation.

Upon these eight principles the Court based the decision in accordance with which Mass is no longer a violation of the law of Oklahoma.

The Intent of the Legislators

BY general consent, the case presented certain points of controversy not easily decided. Counsel for the defendant in error had argued that, as the Oklahoma law did not except wine for sacramental purposes, no Court could except it, for "when the legislature has made no exceptions, the courts of justice can make none, since this would be legislative." It was further urged that, when the State undertakes to suppress what it regards as a public evil, it may and should adopt "such measures, having a reasonable relation to that end, as it may deem necessary to make its action effective." Hence an act in itself innocuous may be included in a prohibition, when such inclusion is necessary to accomplish the purpose of the law. Notwithstanding the validity of these principles, the Court would not allow that in the present instance, they were applicable. The true purpose of the law was to be sought in the intention of the legislators. Considering the place that religion has always held in American life, the Court did not believe that in approving the Ferguson bill, the legislators of Oklahoma intended to make the Mass impossible. Admitting plainly that the language of the law certainly included "fermented wine for sacramental purposes," the Court nevertheless preferred to hold that "such fermented wine . . . could not have been intentionally legislated against."

> In the ordinary transactions of life, we find everywhere a clear and positive recognition of the importance and necessity of public worship, and the fostering in every way possible of religious institutions. The custom of opening sessions of deliberative bodies and conventions with prayer; our laws requiring observance of the Sabbath; the various churches and church organizations which abound in every city; the multitude of charitable organizations existing under Christian auspices; the missionary societies and associations which receive general support and aiming to establish the Christian religion in every quarter of the globe—these and many other matters which might be noted are emblems of Christianity, and emphasize that "man's chief and highest end is to glorify God, and fully to enjoy Him forever." That he may do so intelligently, and according to the dictates of his own conscience, is the primary purpose of all Christian civilization. The general terms used in the prohibition section of the Constitution should not be construed to prevent religious worship, and in that manner defeat the very purpose of the Act, which was to conserve morality and religion by preventing intemperance.

These are splendid words, and the decision which they embody settles the question for the State of Oklohoma. Yet it should not be forgotten that the decision is based, primarily, on what the Court considers a point of fact, namely, that the legislators did not intend to interfere with the Mass. Suppose the contrary could have been proved; or suppose that, at some future time, in Oklahoma or elsewhere, the State legislature should enact a law for the specific purpose of forbidding the Mass?

A Complete Victory?

THAT question is not moved with the intention of opening another controversy on the relative powers of the State and Federal Governments. For most of us that controversy is settled, and settled forever, whether we incline to a liberal, or to a more restricted, view of the powers of the Federal Government. But the Oklahoma decision, finding the extent of the law in the "intention of the legislators," indicates that in case of such hostile legislation, we should have no redress in the State Courts, and if the opinion of those commentators on the Federal Constitution, most in favor, be accepted, we should have none in the Federal Courts. New Hampshire retained legislation which excluded Catholics, simply because they were Catholics, from her highest offices, as late as 1877. When the change came, it was not made because of any phrase or section in the Federal Constitution, much less because of any Federal decision, or suggestion emanating from the Federal authorities. It was brought about by the deliberate and free act of the citizens of that State, who, as far as any Federal document is concerned, may return to the old condition tomorrow.

As a legal precedent, as a relief to a large number of citizens, and as a refreshing presentation of common sense applied to legislation, the Oklahoma decision is a precious document. But it will prove a fatal victory, if it lulls us into a false sense of security, inducing us to relax, even for a moment, our vigilance. Prohibition is by no means inert, and under its shelter hide a motley band of unclean creatures, awaiting the opportunity to attack the Church of God. Safety, like charity, begins at home. If we watch local legislation, Federal enactments will take care of themselves.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Progressive War Work of the Knights of Columbus

THE greatness and excellence of the work accomplished by the Knights of Columbus is exceeding all expectations. With sums comparatively small they are achieving wonderful results. Reports of the thoroughness and effectiveness of their operations are received from all sides. It is admitted likewise that specially favorable opportunities for spiritual labors among the soldiers present themselves to the Knights of Columbus chaplains. The efforts that have been made by the secretaries to provide the men with wholesome surroundings and amusements are largely responsible for the remarkable spirit of faith and devotion among the soldiers, since they are thus preserved from many temptations. Knights of Columbus workers are at present being hurried abroad as rapidly as possible. Every regular boat leaving the American ports contains contingents of from fifteen to twenty men. Many applications for this service are received and selections are carefully made. Women too are used in hospitals and elsewhere. Special conditions must be fulfilled on the part of applicants, and those only who are filled with a spirit of sacrifice should undertake this work.

A Labor Bureau Announcement in the Philippines

"WANTED: 10,000 Wives for 10,000 Bachelors. At Davao. Need not be Beautiful. Excellent Opportunity for Spinsters, Widows, and Divorcees. Free Transportation. Apply at the Bureau of Labor." Such is the announcement made by the Bureau of Labor in the Philippines and printed in the Philippines National Weekly. Prospective brides are told that there will be no need of powdering, hair-dressing, lip-reddening or eyebrow-blackening, for there is question of an army of workers. It is thus that the Bureau of Labor has attempted to solve the "Japanese menace" by increasing the population of Mindanao. "So we could confidently hope for the passing of the yellow peril in less than a decade," writes the National Weekly. It is to be hoped, above all, however, that religion will not be disregarded in this proposed exodus. The opportunity of a lawful marriage for as many of these isolated laborers as are unmarried men would doubtless be a great blessing. But the mention of divorcees is ominous, as well as the warning that it would be dangerous to obtain less than the full number of brides. It appears obvious that sad inroads have been made into the faith and morality of the people.

Governor Catts in Distress

GOVERNOR SIDNEY J. CATTS, of Florida, again met with signal discomfiture in seeking to foist his bigotry upon a large audience in Kalamazoo, Michigan. He was announced to speak on the subject of "Unadulterated Americanism," but the people understood that his real purpose was to champion religious intolerance, which in that State has recently taken the form of an attack upon Catholic education. He had no sooner uttered his insult against American Catholics by shouting that he did not believe parochial schools were in keeping with the true spirit of Americanism than he was instantly interrupted and challenged. His propaganda of civic discord was appropriately greeted with cries of "Pro-German!" The incident which followed is thus recorded in the local Gazette:

> An army lieutenant from Camp Custer forced his way through the crowd and up the steps, confronting the speaker. "You have insulted me, sir," the lieutenant snapped, and he held his face close to the Governor's as he talked. "You have insulted the uniform. You have insulted every Catholic in service." "Down with Catts! Let the lieutenant speak," came from the crowd, and this cry was taken up. Responding to the calls from the crowd for a speech, the lieutenant declared that he had been educated in a Catholic school. . . . "Thank God, the training I received in the parochial school made me willing to fight for my country."

After the officer had completed his patriotic effort, Governor Catts again attempted in vain to speak. He was finally permitted to continue on condition that he uttered nothing that would be in violation of patriotism. He then spoke for ten minutes on the American Red Cross and the meeting quietly dispersed. Disturbers of the public peace are evidently not wanted in Kalamazoo.

Sowing the Seeds of Discord

WHILE there are many Methodist clergymen, editors and other members of that large denomination who are eminently fair-minded in their views and equally generous in the expression of them, it is a pity that so large a portion still continue to devote the abundant energy the Lord has given them to the campaign of hatred and calumny against the Church. Thus Harold J. Hamilton recently wrote in the Detroit Michigan Catholic of the attacks made upon the Church by a certain Dr. Musser, a Methodist foreign mission worker, while lecturing in the Methodist Episcopal Church at St. Johns, Mich.:

> He accused the Pope of being pro-German and said that the Kaiser and the Pope ought to be consigned to a bottomless pit together. Now it does not surprise me any to hear of such tirades coming from a Methodist pulpit. The Methodist denomination is noted for its bitter hatred of the Catholic Church, but what does surprise me is, the time when the lecture was delivered just as the Government was about to begin its drive for the third Liberty Loan. The local Methodists, in my opinion, used very poor judgment in bringing Dr. Musser here to stir up strife and discord at this time.
> It is a well-known fact that the Catholic Church is doing more than any other denomination in America to aid our country in winning the war.

The writer then refutes the absurd charge that the Pope is pro-German, as if the German press had not in the same way attacked him for what it describes as his open manifestations of pro-Ally sympathy, and then continues:

> Dr. Musser showed very plainly that he did not know the first letter of the alphabet of what the word gentleman means by styling the Holy Father, whom 300,000,000 people revere as the great white shepherd of Christendom as "that dago Pope." He not only insulted one of our Allies—Italy—but he hurled an insult into the face of every Catholic soldier and sailor who is "doing his bit" to help make democracy safe for the world.
> Brann, the great iconoclast, well said that "From the foundation of the world the falsehood has been the defensive weapon of the fool. Assail him with logic and he answers with lies; lash him with sarcasm and he retorts with calumny, impale him on the rapier of ridicule and he deluges you with brutal defamation." ("Works of W. C. Brann," Vol. 1, p. 49.) I think that these words are applicable to Dr. Musser.

Mr. Hamilton rightly concludes that the Methodist clergy are sadly mistaken if they believe they can gain adherents or win respect by such tactics.

Ireland's Part in the World War

HAD the United States furnished 5,000,000 volunteers to the Allied armies she would have approximately equaled the proportion of men voluntarily contributed by Ireland. Until we have attained that quota, not of drafted men but of volunteers, it would be well to speak with circumspection of Ireland's part in the war. That this statement is not exaggerated can best be made plain by official figures, as presented in the New York Catholic News:

> The military census showed that Ireland had 645,447 men between the ages of eighteen and fifty-one years. Of these 245,875 were engaged in "indispensable" occupations; 107,492 were physically unfit; 130,841 had enlisted for the war, and 161,239 were available for military service.
> Adding the 161,239 available, but not enlisted, to the 130,841 already enlisted gives a total of available man power of 292,080. Sir A. Geddes officially credits Ireland with 170,000 by January, 1918, showing that 40,000 of the 161,239 had joined the colors after October, 1916. This leaves but 121,000 now available in Ireland. Out of a total man-power of 291,000 Ireland has sent forward as volunteers 170,000—about 58.1 per cent.
> The United States has a population of 108,000,000, of whom nearly 10,000,000 by registration last June were found to be between twenty-one and thirty-one years. It is fair to assume that there are between 17,000,000 and 20,000,000 men in this country between the ages of eighteen and fifty-one years.
> Assume that the proportion of those engaged in "indispensable" occupations, shipbuilding, munitions, food production and the like, would be the same as in Ireland; that the proportion of physically unfit would be the same, and that the proportion of available men would be the same. Ireland had 292,080 available out of 645,447—45 per cent of all her men of military age. Then the United States would have 45 per cent of seventeen to twenty millions, or from 7,750,000 to 9,000,000 men available.
> Ireland has produced up to January, 1918, by the British War Office records, 170,000 out of her 292,080 available men, or 58.1 per cent. The United States would have to produce, out of her 7,750,000 or 9,000,000 men, from 4,579,250 to 5,319,000 soldiers, every one of whom would have to be a "volunteer."

These figures, however, do not represent the whole truth. There is no account taken in them of the great proportion of Irish fighting men who had been enlisted in the English army before the outbreak of the war, and who were the first to make the great sacrifice. Few of these, probably, remain alive today. Vastly more than 5,000,000 men will have to leave our shores for the great European battle fronts before our part in the war can be proportionally compared with the role that Ireland has already played in this great struggle. It is well that these facts should be brought to notice at the present moment.

Chronicle

The War.—The third great German offensive of 1918 was brought this week to a temporary halt, but seems to have been resumed on June 9, the Germans storming forward on a twenty-one-mile front between Montdidier and Noyon on the southern side of the Picardy salient. On the western front no operations of first-rate importance took place in the earlier part of the week although the American troops distinguished themselves in several actions where skilled leadership, dash and initiative were required. There was stiff fighting between the Oise and the Ourcq Rivers, the northern part of the west side of the Marne salient. In a brilliant counter-attack the French recaptured Fayerolles, southwest of Soissons and retook Mount Choisy for the fifth time. In a furious struggle with the enemy who attempted to move forward on each side of the highway which runs from Château Thierry, the French stopped his advance at Bouresches, a village four miles northwest of Château Thierry. On the day following this check to the Germans, American troops near Veuilly Wood, eight miles northwest of Château Thierry, broke up all attempts to penetrate into their lines, while above Jaulgonne, midway where the Aisne salient touches the Marne, our troops, cooperating with the French, drove the enemy across the river and inflicted heavy losses. They again distinguished themselves in company with the French near Torcy, northwest of Château Thierry when they launched a blow into the German position on a two and a half mile front, making a gain of more than two miles. A German attack on the Allied positions before Champlat, on the eastern wing of the Champagne salient, broke down while further north the French recaptured the villages of Bligny and Ste. Euphrasie, which the enemy had entered. East of Sempigny, near the base of the salient, the enemy attempted to cross the Oise River, but suffered severe losses. On June 7 the American marines with their French Allies went through the German lines northwest of Château Thierry, captured four villages, Veuilly-la-Poterie, Bouresches, Vinly and Torcy, and pushed their gains to a depth of two miles on a ten mile front. North of the Aisne, northwest of Soissons, the French retook Le Port Fonten. South of the Aisne they advanced their lines near Ambleny, west of Soissons. June 8, the Americans and French pushed further into the German lines northwest of Château Thierry, made some slight territorial gain, while east of Chezy the French withstood heavy attacks. At the same time the Americans renewed their attacks east of Torcy and near Belleau Wood on a front of about one mile and made some slight advance. Most of these advances of the Americans were due to the gallantry of our marines.

Bulletin, June 3, p.m., June 10, a.m.

One of the startling military events of the week was the sudden way in which Germany carried the war to our own shores. At least two German submarines supposed to be of very large size and wide cruising radius, appeared off the Atlantic coast. Their zone of operations extended roughly from off Barnegat, on the Jersey coast to a point about 100 miles off the Virginia capes. They are reported to have sunk some eighteen vessels, most of them small American schooners and coastal vessels, but also an English steamer and two Norwegian boats. The loss of life was relatively small, but from the "Carolina" a 5,000-ton steamer plying between Porto Rico and New York, about twenty-three lives were lost, and from the "Pinar del Rio" eighteen men are missing. A vigilant search for the raiders is being made by the Navy and by our aeroplane service. The raid caused a flurry of excitement, but no panic. It was officially announced that it would not divert any of our warships from European waters nor interfere with the transport of our troops to France.

Ireland.—On June 4 the Rt. Hon. James M. Campbell, for a long time representative of Trinity College in the House of Commons, and Lord Chief Justice of Ireland since 1916, was appointed Lord Chancellor in succession to Sir Ignatius O'Brien, who took office in 1913 and was reappointed in 1916. The choice is most unpopular with all classes except the Ulsterites with whom Campbell is in full sympathy. The new Chancellor was mentioned for the place three years ago, but owing to the opposition of the late Mr. Redmond the appointment was not made at that time. T. P. O'Connor voices popular sentiment in Ireland in the following statement sent to the New York papers:

The appointment of Sir James Campbell to the Lord Chancellorship of Ireland, with the obviously enforced retirement of Sir Ignatius O'Brien, a Nationalist and a Catholic, is one of the most serious events in recent Irish history. It is an open and violent insult and provocation to the Catholics and Nationalists in Ireland.

Sir James Campbell has stood all through his life for the most extreme section of Irish Tory and Orange opinion. He was the second in command to Sir Edward Carson in the Ulster rebellion. When the proposal was made on the formation of the Coalition Ministry in 1915 to make him Lord Chancellor, it so shocked not only the Irish Parliamentary party, but the Liberal and Labor members, that a protest was made to Mr. Asquith, with the intimation that a debate and a division would be forced, and, realizing that a majority of the House of Commons would have condemned the appointment and destroyed the Ministry, the nomination was withdrawn.

The disappointed ex-Orange rebel, however, received compensation in the Attorney Generalship and later in the Lord Chief Justiceship, with the handsome salary of $25,000 a year. The Lord Chancellorship in Ireland means as much an executive as a judicial office, the Lord Chancellor being an integral and important part of the Irish executive.

A soldier as Lord Lieutenant and Sir James Campbell as Lord Chancellor is the response of the Lloyd George Administration to the plea of Ireland for Home Rule. It seems to mean a Home Rule bill drawn on Orange lines, and in the certain event of such a bill being scornfully rejected by Ireland it means the government of Ireland by the soldiers and by the Orange minority. Such blunders make the task hard for those who are fighting for the cause of the Allies and the freedom of the small nations.

On June 3 Viscount French, the Lord Lieutenant, issued a proclamation asking for 50,000 voluntary recruits at once and thereafter 2,000 or 3,000 monthly, according to needs, to maintain the Irish divisions. The text of the proclamation is in part as follows:

Lord French and the Draft

In pursuance to our promise, we now make our offer which, if successful, will insure that Ireland will play her part fully and freely in the world struggle for liberty. The offer is that Ireland voluntarily furnish the number of men required to establish her equitable ratio compared with other parts of the Empire. In order to establish that ratio, Ireland can be fairly asked to raise 50,000 recruits before October 1 to replenish Irish divisions in the field, and thereafter raise from two to three thousand recruits per month to maintain those divisions.

The document declares that there is no intention of disturbing farming, food production of any kind or the country's essential industries. Many of the farmers will not be available for military service, but the towns are expected to yield the desired number without prejudice to trade. Men whose ages range from eighteen to twenty-seven years are expected to "join up" first, though older men will be accepted immediately.

We recognize, the proclamation continues, that men volunteering are entitled to share in all their motherland can offer. Steps, therefore, are being taken to insure, as far as possible, that land shall be available for men who have fought for their country, and the necessary legislative measure is now under consideration.

The people are also assured that the draft will be in charge of civilians and that fair play will be meted out to all. The Freeman's Journal announced that the call for volunteers signified "the practical abandonment of the policy of conscription" and declared that "it will come as an intense relief to all classes in Ireland and to every responsible man who has some conception of what the consequences of forcible conscription would inevitably have been." Two days after this, representatives of both the Nationalists and Sinn Feiners met at the Mansion House, Dublin, and issued this warning to the people:

The conference takes note of the latest proclamation from Field Marshal French. In view, however, of its terms we warn our countrymen against false confidence that conscription is at an end. In the future, as hitherto, Irishmen must trust above all else their own unbroken unity and unshakable purpose for safety against a renewal of the danger of conscription which the proclamation has only provisionally postponed.

Despite reports to the contrary, both Ireland and England are still agitated over the draft and certain circumstances attendant on its announcement. On June 4 the Dublin Corporation adopted this resolution of protest against the deportation of prisoners:

Agitation Over Conscription

We hereby enter our emphatic protest against the cowardly and unwarranted action of the British Government in recently arresting and deporting eighty-eight of our fellow countrymen and women who are now imprisoned in England. We protest against the cruel and inhuman treatment to which they are being subjected, in being refused permission to communicate in any way with relatives and friends, many of whom are in ignorance of the prisoners' whereabouts. We call the attention of lovers of liberty to the methods adopted by the English Ministers, whose declared aims in the present war are the liberation of small nations, in trying to suppress and abolish by brute force the rights and liberties of the people of Ireland.

Strangely enough some English papers have vigorously espoused Ireland's cause. The London Statist says:

That despicable section which has contributed so powerfully to our present troubles in Ireland is adding to its misdeeds by threatening to raise a "No-Popery" agitation. We warn the gentlemen who are doing this that they are entering upon a most dangerous course, which will affect themselves more seriously than any other portion of the community. The people of this country suffered grievously in the past from persecution. They put a stop to that abominable policy, and they have not the slightest intention of allowing it to be revived, no matter what the pretext may be. Whether the Irish Roman Catholic Bishops and clergy are acting rightly or wrongly, wisely or unwisely, is a matter for themselves to consider. They are, after all, citizens of the Empire, and, let "No-Popery" men talk as they please, they have just as much right as other citizens to perform the duties of citizenship. How dangerous the course now threatened is may best be gathered from the letters of so public-spirited a man as Sir Mark Sykes, who is already reminded of the death of Sir Thomas Moore, and, therefore, fears that if persecution is begun at all it may well be extended to England. Sir Mark may rest content. There are, no doubt, a few hotheads who would resent the action of the Irish Catholic Church, even by raising a "No-Popery" cry. But the vast majority of Englishmen, Scotchmen, and Irishmen are determined that persecution never again shall be brought into practice. Freedom of thought, freedom of belief, freedom of worship, freedom of speech, and freedom of writing are the fundamental rights of liberty; and we prize those rights so highly that even a great war will not deter us from maintaining them against all persons and parties, let them be who they may. . . . English and Irish Catholics may rest perfectly content that there will be no revival of persecution in this country, and that, war or no war, a "No-Popery" cry will be resisted with all the might that free men can exert.

Later on an Englishman living in Ireland wrote this illuminating letter to the Rev. Bernard Vaughan:

Let me describe the situation on the eve of the providential action of the united Hierarchy. What the cry of "Fire!" is in a crowded theater, such was the sudden decision to conscript the Irish here: as a theater crowd is thrown into a mad panic, such was the frenzy of panic that came over all the poor people concerned here, Catholics, Presbyterians, and Orangemen alike. The shops, north and south, were emptied of scythes and reaping hooks, anything that might mean a weapon. The frenzied populace passed clean away from civil control. They were very largely armed also with pistols, rifles, bombs, and ammunition. Each man was looking around to do the most damage before being taken. I could tell you the most comic stories of the result of the panic. Schools and colleges dismissed, Maynooth, All Hallows, etc. The railwaymen had fixed to strike everywhere, and all railway lines were to be torn up; the dockers at the ports also, etc. Towns would have starved and the whole country been wrecked. . . . The people were quite out of control and ready for any mischief. Then it was firmly believed that the military, exasperated by many insults and attacks in the streets, were ready in their barracks armed with the completest modern equipment; tanks, aeroplanes, etc., were ready to march out on the first sign of disturbance to shoot down the poor frenzied people.

The Irish Bishops are "shepherds," not "hirelings." They could not sit silent to see their flocks destroyed. From each diocese they came and unanimously joined in one simple protest. They put the poor people under religious authority for the moment. They told them with their national conscience the English could not conscript without consent morally, and they asked them to change their rifles and bullets and other violent remedies into spiritual weapons, and to put confidence in God, using the weapons of Masses, novenas, rosaries, the confession of sins, and prayer for light and truth. The effect in Ireland was like the rising of our Savior in Peter's boat on the agitated lake. There was immediately great calm and confidence was restored. Nothing calms the mind so much as prayer. The Bishops saved the people from slaughter and imprudence, Ireland from being wrecked, and England from the ill-repute of such consequences.

If conscription had been applied when it was applied to England, or after the Easter Week, it is thought there would have been no trouble; but now the greater number of the poorer sort, at any rate, believe England is beaten, and that the ill-trained men from here are only wanted in a panic, and that they would not save defeat but be sacrificed to no purpose. To prolong the war only means prolonging slaughter, that is their view. Again, there is their national and political conscience.

So Mr. Redmond's prestige was lost, because instead of seizing the moment in 1914 when the war began to "make a deal" as to Home Rule, he trusted to England's honor about the bill, signed and on the statute book. When it became known in Ireland that that was to be "scrapped," the new party determined never again to be so treated. Hence it must be for them "conscription with consent," or none at all.

The Bishops saved this country from slaughter and ruin, and England from a miscalculated method of getting soldiers here. They did not rise to stop conscription, but to save their flocks and country.

A still more remarkable document bearing closely on this agitation is the subjoined protest of Anglican ministers and laymen, taken from the London Tablet.

Without wishing to express here any opinion on the attitude of the Irish Hierarchy towards conscription, regarded as a purely political act for which they must accept the full responsibility, the undersigned priests and laymen of the Church of England desire to repudiate in the strongest terms certain statements recently made in the press and pulpit of this country in connection with this attitude, and indignantly resent the attempt to excite odium against the Roman Catholic Church and its Head on the score of the Irish Bishops' decision.

While repelling with horror the suggestions that have been made in the press as to the advisability of withdrawing toleration from the Roman Catholic Church in England, we desire particularly to dissociate ourselves from the allegations made in St. Paul's Cathedral on Sunday, April 28, by the Rev. R. J. Campbell. It is not true that the Catholic Church even "appears," as the preacher said, "to be working against the Allies all over the world"; the English, French and Belgian Bishops have distinguished themselves by their patriotic devotion. It is not true that the Church "had not one word to say in denunciation of the rape of Belgium"; this crime was explicitly condemned by the Cardinal Secretary of State. It is not true that the Vatican "has never hampered Germany"; it protested against the air raids on Italian cities; and there is no evidence against the Church that "her operations have always told against the Allies"—whatever particular groups of Catholics may have done or left undone.

We shall, therefore, be grateful if you will give publicity to this protest against an unauthorized campaign, which is dishonorable to the country in general and to the Church of England in particular. Signed by Rev. A. H. Baverstock (Rector of Hinton Martel), Rev. T. C. Calvert Brown (Vicar of St. Michael's in Lewes), Rev. E. E. Kilburn (Vicar of St. Saviour's, Hoxton), Rev. Ll. Langford James, D.D. (Vicar of St. Mark's, Bush Hill Park), Rev. Conrad Noel (Vicar of Thaxted), Rev. R. S. Thornewill (Vicar of St. Mary's, Cable Street), Rev. Sandys Wason (Vicar of Cary), Rev. Vincent Baker, Rev. Wilfrid Knox, Rev. Magnus Laing, Rev. R. P. Wodehouse, Rev. A. P. Young, Mr. H. R. Baylis, Mr. J. E. C. Hordern, Mr. A. E. Manning-Foster, Mr. D. L. Murray, Mr. W. J. Ross.

The Rev. Spencer Jones, a distinguished Anglican minister, followed on with this letter to the Tablet:

SIR: May I say how overjoyed I was to read "the protest," in your paper of May 18? Had I known of it before, I should have begged to be allowed to add my name, and I am sure there are many others in the same case. As it is, I salute the signatories and thank them for what they have done, for I am sure it is a step in the right direction.

I am as certain as I am of my own existence that from the very outset, the Pope and Cardinal Secretary of State have held themselves firmly, as it were, in the presence of God, in regard to this whole question, and have striven under a sense of awful responsibility to speak and to act justly in the matter of the war. There may have been others who have betrayed strong leanings towards the Central Powers—for the forces of German corruption are ubiquitous—but these, I believe, have diminished in number as the truth has come more and more to light. But I feel equally certain that the Rev. R. J. Campbell would never wilfully misrepresent any one or any body of men. I say this without being able to claim the privilege of his acquaintance. It is easier to be carried away by a prejudice of this kind than by any other.

It would be easy to demonstrate the absurdity of stating that the Pope has sided with Germany. Here is a passage I tore from one of our papers at the time: "The Rheinisch Westfaelische Zeitung adds, 'It is natural that our Government should appreciate the Vatican's good intentions, but it is equally natural that the final reply of the Allied Governments should be framed in the most courteous but distinctly non-acquiescent form, because the Pope's proposal in effect is one-sided, and exhibits partiality in favor of our enemies."

In other words the German journal is sure the Pope means well, but it is equally sure that he is partial to England and her Allies; and if English journals are equally sure that he is partial to Germany, that suggests that he has succeeded in securing his neutrality after all. No reader of the Tablet would respect any of us Anglicans if we rejoiced in posing as enemies to our own people; but the point is, that we should step forward as chivalrous gentlemen, and not leave to God alone the task of repudiating what we, equally with yourselves, know to be a grave misunderstanding.

Such a protest gives hope that the end of an unhappy controversy is not far off.

Rome.—In certain sections of the English press ugly recrudescences of the "No Popery" cry appear from time to time. One of the most recent is the repetition of the statement alleged to have been made, on the occasion of the capture of Jerusalem, by the Papal Secretary of State. The statement attributed to Cardinal Gasparri never had any foundation, but a letter signed "Civis Britannicus Sum," and printed in the London Times for April 24, again charged the Cardinal with having said: "While there should be legitimate thanksgiving that the Holy City has been rescued from the Infidel, it is to be regretted that that rescue should have been accomplished by a Power not of the true Faith. On May 4, the Times announced that it had received from Cardinal Bourne a telegram addressed to him from Rome by Cardinal Gasparri contradicting the statement attributed to him and ending as follows: "I most emphatically deny having ever said such words or similar on any occasion, and protest against such assumption." A few days later, the London Tablet published the following letter from Cardinal Gasparri, which puts the matter in its proper light. The letter, which is dated from the Vatican, May 2, 1918, is addressed to Cardinal Bourne, and reads:

Another Calumny Contradicted

Most Eminent and Reverend Lord:

I desire to follow up my telegram of protest, and to confirm it. Never have I uttered the words which have been attributed to me, or any resembling them, and I challenge the author of the letter published in the Times to produce even a shadow of proof of his calumny. Moreover, I wish to say in completion of my protest that not only have I never uttered the words attributed to me, but on several occasions I have stated that England, preferably to any other Power, would inspire absolute confidence by her perfect impartiality, her entire respect for vested rights, and her zeal for progress in the Holy Places. I remain, my Lord Cardinal, with distinguished consideration,

P. CARDINAL GASPARRI.

One more calumny has thus been laid to rest.

Russia.—The daughter of a Russian diplomat recently sent a former schoolmate of hers now living in this country the following account of the hopeless condition of affairs in Russia and of the distress she is suffering in her home at Petrograd. "My country is ceasing to exist," she writes. The thousand anonymous potentates, who exercise what little control there is, are paid by Germany. The letter continues:

Returning to Savagery

The present Government has abolished all laws, all courts, the police, land ownership, all private real estate in towns, all disinction of castes and grades in the army and navy. They have seized all the banks, are opening all the private safes, and confiscating all gold and silver found therein, though it had never been said before it was criminal to have it. Of course, everything they "decree" is so mad that it is quite sure not to last forever, but the chaos they make will take centuries to forget. The country is going back to a savage state.

On the ground of liberty they abolish all laws, judges, attorneys and substitute for it "people's courts of justice," with only soldiers, workmen or peasants, often quite illiterate and always without the slightest knowledge of court proceedings, taking the places of the former judiciary.

On the same ground they abolish all police, let loose all the criminals from the prisons, arm them, constituting from their number, together with workmen, deserters and hooligans, a "red guard," and fill the prisons to their utmost with all those who crave for order and will not work together with them toward the total ruin of the county.

On the pretense of equality they abolish all grades in the army and navy and make all posts elective by the simple soldiers. In most places it is understood as complete extermination, lynching of the officers, who, for being better educated, are under suspicion of being "counter-revolutionary." The highest posts are occupied by elected soldiers who very often can hardly sign their names, and the former officers are made simple soldiers, with a soldier's pay of $3.50 a month, and ordered to the lowest tasks, cleaning of the barracks, cooking food, taking care of the horses.

The army, which now consists of young boys—the regular one is long ago killed—without any sense of duty, morals, and discipline, see their acquired "freedom" in the freedom to go home when they want to. And so all the trains, all the stations, are attacked and destroyed by this horde of savages, who kill engineers, if it seems to them the train goes too slowly, who martyrize the railway agents who tell them of the impossibility of starting their train, for there is another one coming toward them in the same time. As this human flood goes home without any organization, everything is looted and destroyed.

Life in Petrograd is horrible—all the criminals, all the workmen and demoralized soldiers rob the few cars that still bring some kind of products. In the very heart of the city, in daytime, you have your clothes taken off your back literally. Just think that there is no police, nobody to call for help, for those who would like to help have had their firearms confiscated, even the officers, even the highest Generals.

As was to be expected, radical Socialism, having reached its logical result is ending in anarchy. According to Isvestia, the official Bolsheviki organ, the so-called "socialization of women" has been "decreed" in certain districts of Russia. Each woman who has reached the age of eighteen must register at the "Bureau of Public Assistance" and then choose a mate or be chosen herself.

Catholic Publicity Bureau in Operation

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

IN a former article on "Catholic Publicity" I said I believed that great good could be done by a Catholic publicity bureau, organized efficiently, possessing ample funds for work on a national basis, directed by a corps of really first-class journalists, clerical and lay, and utilizing the services of volunteer correspondents, letter-writers, and agents, throughout the country. I said that its work would divide naturally into two great main branches, each of which would again subdivide into many minor yet most necessary channels. The first main branch, or stream, of activity would be directed toward the secular press. The second, toward the existing Catholic press, in full and hearty cooperation. In the present paper I propose to suggest certain practical ideas and details relating to Catholic publicity for which there was no room in my first paper.

I will first discuss the work the bureau might carry on among secular newspapers and weekly journals and magazines. Before all else, let us remind ourselves of some of the fundamental principles which should animate the labors of our hypothetical bureau. I think that the first principle should be: The bureau is apostolic, its mission being the diffusion of Catholic truth among non-Catholics and the enlightenment of uninstructed Catholics. A second principle, I venture to suppose, would be: The bureau is not a pulpit for preaching, but a forum for reporters and skilled writers, bringing Catholic news and Catholic views in a vivid, living, entertaining fashion to the attention of readers, especially non-Catholic readers. A third principle, I would suggest is: The bureau seeks to persuade, rather than to carry by storm; it expresses Catholic charity, intellectual, spiritual charity rather than wrath. In other words, the bureau will always believe, except when forced by unquestionable facts to the opposite opinion, that the errors of the secular press are due to ignorance rather than to malice, and will strive to correct them, and to minimize their bad effects, in a spirit of kindness and understanding, rather than in a spirit of carping criticism, still less of contempt and anger.

For example—to come now to a way in which the bureau, if it existed, might operate—I take up a recent issue of the San Francisco Examiner, the leading paper in California, and meet this brilliant gem of journalistic theology:

> As reverently as in another day they worshiped in their cathedral at Rheims, members of the visiting Belgian Commission yesterday attended a high requiem military Mass, for the Belgian soldiers who died in Russia. Kneeling to the Sacrament in the knowledge that the Absolute is as present in San Francisco and blesses as boundlessly in one realm as in another, the men of Flanders knelt in suppliance to their God of Battles and the other two of the Trinity of their Faith, the Son who died for democracy, and the compassionate Mother.

Remember, now, that after the reporter wrote that amazing paragraph, his "copy" was read, first, by his city editor, or the assistant city editor; then by the head of the copy desk, who passed it on to one of the copy editors, who read it, and wrote a "head" for it; after which it passed on its way to the composing room, where it was read by the printer who "set it up," and possibly by the foreman who "dealt out" the copy to the compositors—going back afterwards, in a proof-sheet, to the city desk, and the copy desk, and the managing editor, and to the "copy readers," whose special business it is to guard against errors, typographical and otherwise—and yet—and yet, and Oh, the pity of it! the great San Francisco Examiner, published in one of the most Catholic cities in the United States, can publish such a thing as this paragraph!

Now, then, what could the bureau do, in this case? Write a sarcastic letter—what a "corking" one might be written!—or an indignant one? Or a solemn one; a brief theological treatise on the Trinity? Or would it discern, in the foolish little paragraph—with its geographical ignorance, too, showing forth in the placing of Reims in Belgium,—the evidences of sincere reverence, sympathy, and friendliness; perceive that the reporter is almost the least among those at fault; and then, tactfully, proceed to take advantage of the incident to help the Examiner itself? How? Why, I am fully confident that if an accredited agent, or local correspondent, of a national Catholic publicity bureau authorized by our Bishops (for without such authority it could not and should not exist), supported by our leading organizations—if such an agent, I say, should tactfully interview the chief editors of the Examiner he would not only correct the mistake made by the reporter, obtain the publication of the correction, but he would cause an immediate reform in the writing and handling of news and views concerning Catholicism in the Examiner office.

Again. Two of the big dailies in San Francisco last week published each a whole page purporting to be a "news" report of a lecture by a Christian Science lecturer. Now, then, of two things, only one is in this instance possible. Either these two papers really do consider a Christian Science lecture so important as news that even in the midst of war they allot a whole page to a report of it; or else, the papers are being paid to publish the stuff, but do not label it, as they ought, "advertising." If it were labeled as an advertisement, most of its moral effect upon ignorant readers would obviously be lost.

What could, and what should, our supposed bureau do in this case? Well, very courteously, yet very firmly, it could offer each paper a whole page of Catholic copy, answering, in a kindly and truth-seeking spirit, the Christian Science views. If the editors would not print it freely, then the bureau would ask: Why not? If then the truth—which is the truth—came out, that these Christian Science "news reports" are highly paid advertisements, the newspapers would be compelled to label them as such. But I also think that the time would come when the Catholic bureau would have funds to do just as the little, numerically insignificant Christian Science cult is doing, namely, publish half-page and whole-page articles spreading the message of our holy Faith.

But, this valuable and most necessary work of correcting errors and combating pernicious views, while offering almost infinite possibilities for doing good, would only be one side of the work of the bureau among the secular periodicals. The other side would be the preparation and dissemination of up-to-date, vital, well-written, well-illustrated Catholic news and Catholic special articles. There is a certain class of Catholic news, the recent Knights of Columbus "drive" in New York, for example, which is of such obvious general consequence and interest that the newspapers of their own accord pay attention to it. Yet even in this K. C. drive, the alert managers thereof organized their own very efficient press-service. Nevertheless, Catholics need not expect—personally, I do not think we have a right to expect—that newspapers will of their own accord pay anything like adequate or correct attention to Catholic matters. We are decidedly in the minority. Moreover, far too many of us are indifferent to Catholic concerns; we are afflicted, more or less, with a sort of sleeping sickness of the soul. We are Catholics, "by birth," environment, and by a sort of dull acquiescence in the Faith, but we forget that Catholics are the leaven that must leaven the world; that ours is the light that must not be hid under the bushel; and supinely we stand to one side, prating of tolerance, when we really mean we do not want to be bothered, while a handful of sectarians publish one of the best daily newspapers in the world, and circulate it from Maine to California, from Canada to Mexico, and carry on at the same time one of the most efficient publicity bureaus ever organized. Therefore, simply because we cannot expect the secular press to do what we ought to do ourselves; simply because so many of us are supine, and careless of our high privilege and most imperative duty to spread the Faith; simply because there is a great need to do it, we must look to our leaders to take action, and make a beginning of the Apostolate of the Press.

Still I lack room to speak of other ideas among the many that crowd upon the mind as the possibilities of the proposed publicity bureau are discussed, and these must be left for another article.

The Anti-Saloon League

ISMENA T. MARTIN

THE "Anti-Saloon League" claims to be the "united Church Militant." It also calls itself the "Church in Action," and now and again, its leaders refer to its work as that of "the church of Jesus Christ." Its head is a Methodist bishop, and it aims primarily to control legislation. Every State house in the Union is a stamping ground for its lobbyists, and its legislative department at the nation's capital is in charge of a legislative superintendent, with a well paid attorney on the ground. It has recently taken a census of the United States House and Senate, and its New York State Superintendent, William H. Anderson, not so long ago circularized the ministers of a certain congressional district, with the information that a particular candidate "was brought up in the Lutheran Church, but has since joined the Episcopal Church." The Methodist Church, be it remembered, lifts up its hands in holy horror at the very mention of a union of Church and State, but seems determined to put the wheels of State in charge of a Methodist engineer.

Addressing a national convention of the Anti-Saloon League some five years ago, the Rev. Purley A. Baker, its founder and national Superintendent, said:

> The great issue is now on, and no unfriendly candidate for Congress or the United States Senate is entitled to, nor should receive, the support of temperance (meaning Anti-Saloon League) people. We will be told that there are other very important issues and that this issue should not be thrust to the front at this time. We who are charged with the responsibility of directing this movement in State and nation must be as firm as the mountains and as merciless as the truth.

This means that any candidate for public office who does not "qualify" before the Anti-Saloon League, must be defeated at all cost.

The Anti-Saloon League has grown from an insignificant beginning, to its present powerful status. About a quarter of a century ago, its present head, the Rev. Purley A. Baker, then a poorly paid minister laboring in a small town, organized the League. He has declared that he pawned his watch to set the movement afloat, and today he is reputed to be a man of considerable means. The Anti-Saloon League employs a small army of men, at salaries in the neighborhood of $5,000 a year. Its official publication claims to have a revenue of more than $1,000,000 a year, and another army is in its employ, "cutting its own feed," as one League superintendent recently put it. As a money gathering organization, the Anti-Saloon League has Christian Science beaten to a stand-still, though both work along similar lines, to a certain extent.

In every Methodist church in the country, a representative of the Anti-Saloon League appears in the pulpit at least once each year, and a collection is taken for the work. The men who devote themselves to this phase of the work, are sometimes ministers, often lawyers; and a good many students for the ministry eke out a neat income in this manner. Skilled in their work, they excite the fervor of the congregations by painting horrible pictures of the saloon, and then appeal for a liberal cash offering, to wipe out the evil. These are the men who "cut their own feed"; or, as the Rev. Mr. Baker said, in the same address quoted heretofore:

> Ministers and laymen chiefly compose the working force of the League. These ministers sacrifice very largely their home and student life, as well as the warm fellowship of the pastoral and social life. . . . These attorneys, with rare spirit, sacrifice financial and political possibilities to devote themselves to a task both difficult and dangerous, that they may be servants of the Most High and helpers of the stricken and helpless of their kind. It is to be regretted that the labor of financing this movement, both State and nationally, rests so nearly entirely upon the shoulders of these men. They are not financiers. They are reformers, hated by many and distrusted by others, as reformers of this sort always are. They are forced to the double duty of doing the work and financing themselves and the cause, and all the while to produce results that will make new friends and keep the old ones interested.

Mr. Baker appealed to men of great means to help finance the work, saying: "The handicap of suspicion does not hang over you. You are business men and not reformers and on that footing, business men receive you."

These "servants of the Most High and helpers of the stricken," use a pledge card system at these church meetings. The people are asked to give freely of their money, and also to sign the pledge cards, agreeing to give anything from a dime to $100 per month, the pledges payable quarterly. The "servant of the Most High" who speaks for the collection, keeps fifty per cent of it for himself, two and one-half per cent of the total goes to the national organization, and the remainder goes into the treasury of the State organization within whose jurisdiction the collection is taken. Just why "the handicap of suspicion" should hang over these men, Mr. Baker does not explain. It may be, however, that since the givers are not informed of the arrangement whereby these workers "cut their own feed," some doubt may linger as to just where and how these speakers are cared for, and who foots the bills.

William H. Anderson, New York State Superintendent, writing in the American Issue, July 10, 1915, gave these pledge card meetings as the secret of the success of the Anti-Saloon League. Said he:

> The secret of the Anti-Saloon League's success, the thing that has given it financial stability over the country, is the fact that it has a large number of subscriptions, taken at regular church services, of comparatively small amounts per month for a year, payable quarterly. There is always a stream of second, third and fourth quarterly payments to augment the receipts immediately following the taking of new subscriptions. If anything goes wrong, as, for example, if a Sunday is stormy, this prevents any great slump in weekly revenue. It equalizes the receipts and serves as a stabilizer.

While some Methodist church is open to these appeals, every Sunday in the year, other churches sometimes balk at the arrangement. It has been said, that in certain cases, the receipts are shared with the pastor of the church; if this is true, there is certainly no standing rule to that effect, known to the Anti-Saloon League. That ministers sometimes register a protest against these collections, is shown in an article in the New York State edition of the American Issue, the official publication of the League, under date of November 30, 1915. William H. Anderson, New York State Superintendent, in a "heart-to-heart talk with pastors," says:

> The writer recently spoke to a Presbyterian church in a growing city. It was a rainy day, but it was better than a rainy day congregation that gathered in the handsome church building. The people are not wealthy, but earnest, intelligent, and substantial. The subscription was $200. To be exact, it was $203, but we know of $5 that was given by a man who did not belong to the church. When the report went to the pastor, as such reports regularly do, he must have had a paroxysm judging from the echoes received at this end of the line. His letter indicated that he feared that his church was ruined financially by such generosity and the very evening after he received the report his session passed a resolution not to allow anything hereafter except a mere cash offering. He expressed gratitude that the day was rainy, on the ground that otherwise the "calamity" would have been worse. This attitude, of course, closes the church to the League, because, if the League movement is not entitled to a fair chance to present the work and enlist the people, it has no business in the pulpit of any church.

All of which would indicate that the "servants of the Most High" meet with their own troubles, occasionally. No one knows, or seems to know, just what the salary of the National Superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League is, or what are the perquisites of his office. In fact, no one seems to know the precise financial rewards paid to any of the workers in the cause. William H. Anderson, of New York, for instance, boasts of the fact that he is paid by the national organization, and that, therefore, the State is not concerned with his finances. He said, not so long ago: "My salary is paid by the 'National League,' and does not come out of the State treasury. I am the only New York worker who is not directly dependent upon the State." But let us see.

The financial report of the New York State office, as published in the American Issue, September 15, 1917, and covering the fiscal year ending April 30, 1917, shows that the New York State office paid its percentage assessment to the National Anti-Saloon League, amounting to $8,870.08. As Mr. Anderson has stated that his salary is $5,000 a year, it does not require any great knowledge of arithmetic to understand that what was paid to the National League with one hand, was returned to Mr. Anderson with the other. The financial report, likewise, is illuminating. It shows receipts amounting to $105,822.12 and the expenses show that $103,829.04 went for "salaries, traveling and hotel expenses, labor, office expenses, moving expense of workers," and the like, with the exception of a few thousand dollars paid for printing, and the publication of the American Issue. The itemized account reads:

Receipts

Subscriptions and Donations	$105,822.12
Receipts from sales of printed matter	130.94
	$105,953.06

Expenditures

Salaries (covering salaries of 16 regular staff men and compensation of 10 special Sunday speakers)	$27,574.37
Traveling and hotel expenses	13,932.58
Labor (covering clerical force of 27 in four offices)	21,339.36
Office expenses (rent for office, stationery, supplies, etc.)	7,223.09
Printing other than stationery	3,115.50
Publication American Issue	9,026.95
Periodicals, magazines, clippings, books, etc	601.37
Postage	8,765.24
Telephone and telegraph	1,831.40
Freight and expressage	261.77
Interest and exchange	424.14
Special meeting expenses	196.71
Moving expenses of workers	343.25
Miscellaneous expenses, including auditor's fee of $200	323.23
Percentage assessment to National Anti-Saloon League	8,870.08
	$103,829.04

So much for a sample of the finances. Aside from the salaried employees, and the pulpit orators who "cut their own feed," the Anti-Saloon League maintains a staff of speakers, for use in campaigns. These speakers are booked as are theatrical stars. The list includes ex-office holders, politicians of various and varying grades, preachers and the like. The price of these speakers is regulated, like bargain counter attractions, to fit all purses. They range from ten dollars and expenses, per speech, to two and three hundred dollars, and expenses. Rumor has it that certain men make a few hundred thousand dollars a year, as Anti-Saloon League speakers. This work costs the League practically nothing, as the town committees who bill the speakers, raise the funds for the purpose. On this list, are a few Catholic priests. One of them, a priest of a small town, receives ten dollars and expenses, per speech, while another, widely advertised by the League as a "prominent priest," "the great champion of the miners," "great friend of Theodore Roosevelt," receives a fifty dollar fee per speech, plus expenses. During the spring campaign of this year, in New York State, this clergyman was "dated up" by the booking department of the Anti-Saloon League, for sixteen speeches, from April 1 to April 15 inclusive, this tour netting $800, plus expenses. This included two speeches in a certain town on a Sunday, but since the reward was more than that received by the average priest, in the regular parish work, in the course of a year, perhaps it is not surprising that such men publicly state that they have long pined for the dawn of the day when they could devote themselves, as "servants of the Most High," in the great and glorious cause.

The money rolls into the coffers of the Anti-Saloon League. Its published statements throw no light on the manner in which this immense fund is spent. Capitalists and employers of labor who are known to pay next to starvation wages to their employees, give large sums to the League. It builds no churches, but the Rev. Purley A. Baker has said churches are "dead capital," without the Anti-Saloon League. The Anti-Saloon League has never been known to educate one poor boy or one poor girl, it cares for no orphans, relieves no distress, assuages no misery. Its one aim is to build up a giant political machine, to be the catspaw of the Methodist Church. That the Anti-Saloon League is decidedly anti-Catholic will be shown in another article. It has not the power, as yet, to come out, in the open, and "fight like a tiger, to the last ditch," against Catholicism, but the straws indicate the direction of the wind.

The System of Cooperation

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

DURING the packers' wage-arbitration dispute in Chicago some interesting revelations were made. The head of one of the firms candidly admitted that the net profits of this business for the year 1916 had been $20,000,000. At the same time it was announced by the counsel for the trade unions that the 20,000 employees of that same firm were together receiving $13,400,000, or not two-thirds the amount absorbed by a comparatively small number of stockholders. Commenting editorially upon the testimony in this case the New York Evening Mail wrote:

> Mr. Nelson Morris, twenty-six years old, endowed with a salary of $75,000 a year, admitted that neither he nor Mr. Ferris, who determined employees' wages, ever visited their homes. Mr. Morris said he never looked over a budget showing the cost of living for a laboring man with a family. The plain truth is that this newer generation of industrial lords grew up in luxury, apart from the toilers who earn their profits for them. To them the workers are like machinery, to be bought at the cheapest price attainable, to be run at the highest possible speed the longest number of hours, to be scrapped when worn out and replaced by new.

We are fully aware that this does not represent the attitude of all employers. Yet it gives a truthful picture of the results that followed on the dissociation of religion from industry in the post-Reformation capitalism. Cannot a more equitable plan be devised? The possibilities of public ownership within certain limits, and the necessity of government regulation or supervision in other instances have already been treated in the previous article. There still remains the most important of all means to be considered, the system of cooperation.

Few realize the extent to which this "medieval" plan of economics had again been adopted before the outbreak of the war, and the success with which it met in many various fields. Surveying the work already accomplished by it, we can readily understand the possibilities this system would offer with the restoration of the Catholic Faith throughout the world. Nothing else is needed at the present moment. Our just regard for the dignity of human beings, our preference of the common good to private interests, our insistence upon government control or oversight of industry to whatever extent it may be required for the welfare of the people, our countless cooperative societies already bursting into full blossom in every land, and withal the universal aspiration for the brotherhood of all mankind—what are all these signs of our times, at their best, but Catholic revivals?

To begin with, the system of cooperative banking has struck deep root and will continue in its prosperous development. Everyone is familiar with the success of the Raiffeisen credit associations. These or similar systems of cooperative banking had been established in practically every European country before the war. The main incentive and purpose in founding them was to enable the poorer classes, particularly upon the land, to obtain the credit which the commercial banks refused them and to escape the merciless system of usury to which they were in consequence exposed. Such cooperative credit associations, formed among the people, exercised moreover the best of moral influences and taught them thrift and self-respect.

In many instances these cooperative societies were established by the parish priests. According to the account given by Father Joseph P. Archambault, S.J., in his work, "Le Clergé et l'Action sociale," the first popular bank in Italy was founded by a Paduan Jew. The curé of Gombarare soon realized its possibilities if conducted on a purely Catholic basis, excluding all idea of commercialism. The success of the plan is obvious from the following figures taken from the Civiltà Cattolica. (Vol. XII, p. 671.) Between the years 1883 and 1892 the enterprising Jew had established seventy-two banks. But about this time the work of the curé of Gombarare began to attract the attention of his fellow-priests. The success of his cooperative venture at once called forth a host of imitators. The consequence was that in 1893 the Jew founded three and in 1894 only two banks, while the Catholics during the same year established respectively twenty-nine and 105 of their own credit institutions. Raiffeisen himself thus explains the nature and purpose of the cooperative-credit system:

> A loaning and savings bank should in a manner constitute a single family, a brotherhood where the weak are supported and borne along by their fellows, where the associates do not wait until the members one after another fall into actual distress, but where they seek out all who may stand in need of assistance, bringing them friendly aid, saving them from ruin, doing everything for the good of each individual and the good of the entire community. The work is carried on for the love of God. ("Le Clergé et l'Action Sociale," pp. 80, 81.)

Almost equally successful, in many places, have been the cooperative stores. It is estimated variously that between one-third and one-fourth of the entire population of Great Britain had already participated in these enterprises before the outbreak of the war. The total cooperative sales in that country for the year 1913 considerably exceeded $600,000,000, and there were thousands of cooperative stores in Great Britain alone. The same system had likewise developed in Ireland. Describing these stores in the Irish Monthly Cruise O'Brien writes:

> Here you have an association of persons who band themselves together to run a retail store for their own benefit. The first thing to be noted about their constitution is that their membership is open to all, and accordingly their share lists cannot be closed. Here is one difference from a joint stock enterprise, in which the share list is closed when sufficient capital has been obtained in order that the existing shareholder may obtain the best possible amount of profit. Again, the members of the store propose to make savings and not profits—that is to say, they do not want to sell to those who are not members in order to obtain a profit on their trade, but they want non-members to become members in order that all may save on the economy which arises from collective buying and from the elimination of the profits which the retailer takes as his reward for distribution of goods.

We are at once reminded of the wise restrictions of the medieval gilds by the further regulation which forbade any person to have more than two-hundred-pounds' worth of capital invested. But the perfection of the fraternal spirit was brought about by the rule which conceded but one vote to each shareholder, whether he possessed fifty shares or one only. Thus the poor man could exercise the same right and power in controlling the interests of the business as his more well-to-do neighbor. In this there is an approach to an ideal understanding of what may be accomplished by voluntary agreement toward attaining to a "democratic control of industry." The interest of the share-capital itself was limited to a sum not exceeding five per cent., so that the societies, whose purpose was to effect cheap purchases, might not be perverted into profit-making schemes: another wise regulation. "The division of the savings," we are further told, "is in proportion to the amount of purchases made by each member, and it is a part of the cooperative creed that some portion of the savings should be shared in by the society's employees." To stimulate thrift and self-reliance the purchases could be made in cash only.

We may well rub our eyes and wonder whether this is England and Ireland of the twentieth century, or England and Ireland of the thirteenth, fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. It is the spirit of brotherhood returning to earth; it is the wearing-away of the iron bonds of the Reformation; it is true appreciation of the worth of a man above the worth of his wealth; it is the supreme ideal of each for all and all for each; it is the first premonition of the passing-away of a system which made of profits the end of man, and of man the slave of profits. It is Catholicism resurgent in economic life. Yet the work of restoring an order of society in which capital and labor shall meet on a more equitable footing, and the benefits of private ownership shall be more widely shared by the people, has only begun. The great task lies before us and no institution is so well prepared for its accomplishment as the Catholic Church. Of the further and even more important developments of the cooperative system we shall treat in another article.

Religious Rights and Supreme Court Opinions

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

A RECENT letter in AMERICA declared that the question of Prohibition and sacramental wine "should be settled, not by philosophic speculation, but by reference to the decisions of our highest tribunals." But as these tribunals have not pronounced on the question, philosophic deduction from the principles involved in their past decisions is the only avenue to intelligent speculation on their final judgment, and is also the most efficient process of purifying the judicial atmosphere of its prejudicial elements. "Let us have no more talk," we are warned, "of outworn theories of State rights and the like"; but it is precisely on such theories that the exponents of Federal helplessness build and buttress their arguments.

Since 1844 the old State-right theory which underlies the two decisions cited as proof—that the 1787 ordinance of civil and religious liberty, which Congress enacted in 1789 and 1790 as the basis of all our laws and government and always required thereafter, by formal or informal compact, to be embodied in the constitution of every State—has been obsolete and ineffectual. The only effect of the compact, these theorists claim, is to get the State into the Union; once admitted, the State is under no obligation to observe it, and the United States, the other party to the compact, has no power to enforce it. That is, neither ordinance nor compact nor enabling act, for each is on the same basis, has ever been other than a scrap of paper; and paramount authority has no authority, paramount or otherwise. This extraordinary theory, built up in defense of slavery, is based, not illogically, on several Supreme Court decisions prior to 1860, the most noted being Permoli v. First Municipality (3 Howard, 589).

In the days when State Rights ruled in Dixie and Dixie swayed the nation, it chanced that yellow fever and schism were rampant in New Orleans, and, as a result, Rev. B. Permoli was heavily fined for performing funeral rites in his church of St. Augustin, contrary to a city statute restricting such ceremonies to a single mortuary chapel. The Supreme Court, to which he appealed in 1844, held that, though Congress in its Act of 1812 had made "the principles of religious liberty . . . one of the fundamental conditions upon which the State was incorporated in the Union," still, having admitted Louisiana "on an equal footing with original States in all respects whatever," the ordinance of 1787, which Congress had extended to Louisiana, and "the laws of Congress, were all superseded by the State constitution, nor is any part of them in force unless they were adopted by the constitution of Louisiana as laws of the State."

So far the opinion is consonant with other Federal decisions on the question. The 1787 ordinance and other acts of Congress concerning the formation of States, even the enabling acts, are not laws or constitutions, but bodies of governing principles which Congress requires to be incorporated in the constitutions of such States, and to form the basis of their laws. They continue to operate, but through and under the approved constitutions that embody them, and in this sense only are they "superseded by the State constitutions." As Chief Justice Taney observed, 1850, in Strader v. Graham (10 How., 82), the provisions of the 1787 ordinance "owe their validity and authority to the Constitution of the United States and the constitutions and laws of the respective States" through which Congress had, with necessary local adjustments, "carried its provisions into execution." Justice Catron, who in 1844 had written the Permoli judgment, insisted in 1850 that only those provisions of the ordinance "stand superseded and annulled" which a State constitution had, with consent of Congress, omitted. Numerous other decisions on the point were summarized, 1911, in the statement of Justice Lurton (223 U. S., 401) that, "The Ordinance of 1787," whose principles must find place in the organic laws of States within its scope, "ceased to be, in itself, obligatory upon such States, except in so far as adopted by such States and made part of the law thereof." It should be noted that though Congress, which requires such adoption, has sometimes sanctioned modifications of the ordinance, it has never permitted alteration or rejection of the sections and the article prescribing and forever guaranteeing freedom of worship.

The Permoli decision would make this a paper guarantee only: "All Congress intended was to declare in advance to the people of the territory the fundamental principles their constitution should contain. . . . Having accepted the constitution and admitted the State on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever, . . . Congress was concluded (sic) from assuming that the instructions contained in the Act of 1811 had not been complied with." The provisions of the 1787 ordinance were then declared "superseded unless adopted by the laws of Louisiana"; and though they actually were so adopted, nevertheless:

> It is not possible that the United States hold in trust, by force of the ordinance, for the people of Louisiana, all the great elemental principles or any one of them, contained in the ordinance, and secured to the people of the Orleans territory during its existence. It follows no repugnance could arise between the ordinance of 1787 and an act of the legislature of Louisiana, or a city regulation founded on such Act; and, therefore, this court has no jurisdiction.

The inconsequence of these conclusions—and the same characterizes the opinions in Strader v. Graham and in Pollard's Lessee v. Hagan (3 How., 312)—would stagger the logician who ignores the fixed idea of the ruling jurists and politicians of the period, that the "sovereign State" was absolute within its boundaries, and all else was subordinate thereto. Marshall was in eclipse. The national authority was conceived to have had no jurisdiction in the domestic concerns of the original States; and as the new States were "on an equal footing" with these "in all respects whatever," the Supreme Court of the period held it had no jurisdiction to enforce on the new States what it thought was unenforcible in the old. It was only in the minor premise that it erred; but the logic of the same premises would equally preclude it from enforcing an enabling act. This idea, which based Chief Justice Taney's opinion in Strader v. Graham, was further emphasized in his Dred Scott decision, which precipitated the Civil War; whereof the principal constitutional outcome was the assertion in the Fourteenth Amendment of national sovereignty as primary and pervasive, competent to protect every citizen in all his constitutional privileges and rights.

This in no way contradicts the opinion that no ordinance nor compact puts any State in an inferior position to any other; rather it clarifies the fact that all States were always equal in restrictions as well as privileges, and equally subject to national authority. The same opinion was subsequently upheld in Coyle v. Oklahoma (221 U. S., 559), and in Escanaba Co. v. Chicago (107 U. S., 678) wherein Illinois was judged entitled to "exercise the same power over rivers within her limits that Delaware exercised over Black Bird Creek." Here was an exercise of power by a State over matters of purely local concern; but State interference with all or any of man's fundamental and inalienable rights is essentially different. Natural rights had been made subordinate to State rights, as these were conceived by certain theorists; but when the question of State or national sovereignty had been fought out on bloody battlefields, fundamental rights came uppermost, and, as we shall see, the State-rights decisions of the ante-secession period were reversed.

A South American Hero

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

TWO weeks ago the American people laid their memorial wreaths upon the graves of their soldier dead. A short time before the citizens of the Argentine Republic paid the homage of their gratitude to their greatest soldier and citizen, José de San Martin. Last year they had celebrated the centenary of his passage of the Andes. This year they commemorated his victory at Maipo. In that celebration all Latin America took part. Argentina, Chile and Peru could not forget that the sword of San Martin had severed their bonds while their sister republics realized that his inspiration and example had been large factors in their successful fight for liberty. Maipo, they knew, was one of the decisive battles of the New World. It was the precursor of Bolivar's triumph in New Granada, of Sucre's exploits at Pichincha and Ayacucho. Maipo crushed the spirit of the Spanish royalist army in South America, and prepared the way for subsequent victories. It set the seal to the work of Chilean independence. It marked the highest point in the career of one who may be deservedly considered South America's greatest hero.

In popular estimation Simon Bolivar has perhaps ranked higher than the victor of Maipo. He makes a stronger appeal to the popular imagination than San Martin. He had more dash; he was more brilliant. Yet at the present time the sentiment of the Latin Republics is turning more and more in favor of San Martin. As a soldier, a statesman and a citizen, he was certainly not inferior to Bolivar. As a man he was superior. By his military gifts, his incorruptible integrity and his disregard of his personal interests, more than any other man he deserves to be called the "Washington of South America."

Like Washington, José de San Martin learnt the art of war in the armies which later on he was to conquer. As a child of eight the future liberator left Argentina for Spain. A boy of twelve he was serving in the Murcia regiment as a cadet, and at an age when other lads are poring over the war against Jugurtha, and painfully piecing together the speeches of Masinissa, he was fighting the Moors in the Spanish dependencies in Africa. He saw service against the French in the Pyrenees. He was with Castaños when Dupont surrendered his 18,000 French troops at Bailen, and distinguished himself in the bloody battle of Albuera under Beresford, against the veterans of Soult. The training was to serve him in good stead in the New World.

When Lieutenant-Colonel José de San Martin returned to his native land, he found South America in the throes of revolution. In July, 1808, Bolivia had overthrown its governor. The act was the prelude to the first real declaration of independence which was passed by the City of Quito in August, 1809. Almost at the same time and practically without prearranged plan, the leaders of the movement lifted up the banner of the Revolution, Hidalgo in Mexico; Miranda in New Granada; Belgrano in Argentina; Artigas in Uruguay; Carrera and Bernardo O'Higgins in Chile. The battle for independence was to be a bitter one. The friends of liberty were to meet with many a check. But brave hands were ever ready to lift up the drooping banners of freedom, until the victories of Sucre on the heights of the Pichincha and at Ayacucho, of Bolivar at Boyacá and Carabobo, of Belgrano at Tucuman, and of O'Higgins and his immortal chief at Chacabuco and Maipo, definitely accomplished the work of a people's redemption.

San Martin had served in the Spanish armies with distinction. He was a Spaniard in his idealisms, his chivalrous spirit, his faith, his enthusiasms, his sense of honor. But he realized that in the New World the sway of the mother country was doomed. The sun, he saw, was fast setting on Spain's colonial empire in the West. The mother country could no longer govern it. The time was approaching when new political units had to be formed or else anarchy and ruin would settle down upon the South American continent. The colonies, no longer submissive to the pupilage in which they had been held, were clamoring for the "right of self-determination." They were driven into war. San Martin offered his services and his sword to the cause of freedom.

His countrymen needed him. They needed a statesman and a soldier. San Martin had not yet passed a year at home, when with troops but half disciplined and poorly equipped he was beating back the royalists at San Lorenzo. His success in the skirmish, for it was little more than a South American Lexington, stamped him as a real soldier. Though San Martin pleaded that his friend Belgrano should be given control of the patriot forces, he was made commander of the army of independence in Upper Peru. With the experience won in the discipline of the Old World, San Martin realized that if Argentina and the struggling colonies were to win against the regiments of the Spanish Viceroys, they had to be trained. At his own request he was made Governor of the Province of Cuyo on the Chilean frontier. It was in 1814.

It was a dark hour for the struggling republics of the New World. Except in Buenos Ayres, there seemed but little hope for the patriots. The Chileans had been routed by the King's troops at the disastrous battle of Rancagua. Venezuela was groaning under the despotism of Morillo. In the north the patriots had for the moment given up hope, while to the south dissension and discord were rife. San Martin saw that the Spanish power must be attacked at its center. The banners of independence must be carried over the heights of the Andes. Chile and Peru must be invaded. He had no army. He raised one. The men that flocked to his colors were the brave but undisciplined gauchos of the plains. They had to be drilled, armed, clothed and fed. For three years he drilled and waited. Chilean exiles flocked to him, and with them came Bernardo O'Higgins, son of the great Viceroy of Peru, Ambrosio O'Higgins. Bernardo was a host in himself. He was the Murat of South America, a dashing cavalryman, whom those Confederate "whirlwinds on horseback," Forrest and Jeb Stuart, might have envied.

Slowly and silently San Martin at the foot of the Andes forged the thunderbolt which he was to hurl at the Spanish power. Judged by modern standards his army was ridiculously small. On the thirteenth of February, 1817, the liberator left Mendoza with his heroic band for the march across the mountains. He had in all 4,000 troops, 3,000 infantrymen and a force of 1,000 cavalrymen with O'Higgins at their head. San Martin's personal aide-de-camp was an O'Brien. The Celtic names at the head of the roster of the gallant army was a happy augury of success.

After the battle of Tucuman, the life-long friend of San Martin, Belgrano, had declared, with Castilian faith and chivalry, that Our Lady of Mercy should be henceforth the Captain-General of the army of Peru. San Martin, as devout and fervent a Catholic as he was a loyal champion of liberty, named the Queen of Heaven the Captain of his host and entrusted to her keeping his commander's staff, begging her in the name of his regiments to give them victory. Then over the Andes crept the devoted band. Over those frowning ramparts of ice and snow, by dangerous passes, under beetling crags, on the brink of dizzy precipices, through silent and dark gorges, onward they slowly climbed. Up mountain slopes 13,000 feet in the clouds they dragged their guns. Neither snow, nor ice, nor the raging torrent, nor the beetling crag, nor the blast of the hurricane that swept down in fury from the hills could stop their march.

We can forgive Bartolome Mitre, the historian of the hero, when he says that San Martin's passage of the Andes was a feat requiring greater strategy and skill than the passage of the Alps by Hannibal or Napoleon. It was unrivaled until Bolivar repeated the exploit on the equator. San Martin crowned it with the victories of Chacabuco and Maipo, Bolivar with that of Boyacá. These gave liberty to a continent. "The passage of the Alps by Hannibal and Napoleon resulted only in the sterile victories of the Trebbia and Marengo."

In eighteen days San Martin and his heroes covered over 240 miles. Twenty-four days after he had left Mendoza and begun the ascent of the mountains, he met the royalist troops at Chacabuco. He completely routed them. On that field Bernardo O'Higgins deserved well of South America and liberty for it was his irresistible charge at the head of his cavalry that decided the fortunes of the day. Santiago opened its gates to the gallant chief and his victorious battalions. As modest as he was brave San Martin declined the honors of the supreme government, yielding it to his brother-in-arms O'Higgins, while he kept for himself nothing but the command of the army. The victor of Chacabuco was looking to still further conquests and thinking already of driving the Spaniard from Peru. He planned, organized, prepared for the coming blow. But the enemy was not idle. The Spanish viceroy Osorio had gathered an army of experienced and hardy veterans. He caught the victor of Chacabuco at Cancha Rayada unprepared and inflicted a heavy defeat upon the men who but a short while before had so signally routed the Spanish arms. Chile was in consternation. But not for a moment did San Martin lose heart. On March 20, 1818, he was a beaten general. Sixteen days after he met Osorio again and inflicted upon him the bloody defeat of Maipo. His victory, wrung from the very jaws of ruin, settled for good the independence of Chile. April 5 marks the crest of the career of the South American hero. His grateful countrymen have just celebrated the centenary of the battle and recalled with pride his eminent and unselfish services.

But the liberation of Chile was but one step forward in San Martin's plans. He now sought to drive the Spaniard from the powerful vice-kingdom of Peru. With the Spaniard holding Lima, he knew that the independence of South America would never be won. The Viceroy of Peru could muster 23,000 men, San Martin only 7,000. With the aid of that picturesque sailor, Thomas Cochrane, Lord Dundonald, he drove the enemy from the western coast and entered Lima. In July, 1821, the city was evacuated by the royalist troops. San Martin proclaimed the independence of the country and accepted the title of Protector. Bolivar meanwhile had appeared on the northern frontier. For awhile there seemed to be hopes that the two greatest men which South America produced would agree on a policy and work for the common good. In spite of his virtues Bolivar had no small share of ambition. He could ill brook a brother near the throne. San Martin on the contrary was absolutely unselfish, straightforward and sincere. He lacked the popular arts of the Venezuelan. But he had higher ideals and principles. Bolivar's aid was not what San Martin expected it to be in an hour of national crisis. But the victor of Maipo was unwilling that the sword he had unsheathed for the common good of South America should be drawn in a civil war. After meeting Bolivar at Guayaquil, he decided to withdraw forever from the contest. At the height of his fame when Argentina, Chile and Peru acclaimed him as their savior, he sheathed his sword and like Cincinnatus and Washington withdrew to the privacy and solitude of his ancestral home.

Republics are not grateful. The old hero was coldly received. Heart-stricken he took the road of exile. Sorrow lent its crown to his splendid life. Like another Belisarius he was left to end his career of glory in loneliness and poverty. His daughter, worthy Antigone of her sorrow-stricken sire, was his constant companion. With her at his side, he learnt how painful it is to climb the stranger's stairs. He died in her arms at Boulogne in France, August 17, 1850. To his everlasting credit, the old hero's companion in arms, the generous Bernardo O'Higgins, never forgot his chief and tried to lighten by his affection and his aid the want and the sorrows of the old hero.

San Martin was not only a great man; he was a mission. Seldom has a man's intervention in the history of his country been more decisive than his, either in the immediate conduct of affairs or in the logical development of their results. He conceived great plans. He saw them realized. If he organized armies, he did so not for his own personal schemes but in the name of his country. He founded republics, not out of hatred of kings, but out of love of the people. He was a conqueror, but left no trace of hatred behind him. At the height of his glory he abdicated his power, without weakness, unmoved by jealousy or petty spite, when he realized that his mission was ended and that another might better accomplish what still remained of freedom's task. In honor as in sorrow, as a conqueror or an exile, he remained ever the type of the Christian and the hero. He is undoubtedly South America's greatest son.

The Daily Paper

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In the two last issues of AMERICA there appeared two articles against the Catholic daily paper by Mr. J. C. Walsh. Not alone does he consider such a paper unfeasible, but also undesirable, against both of which contentions I wish merely to suggest a few arguments.

Has any one ever heard that the French speaking population of the United States is very numerous? Yet that scanty number has no less than seven Catholic dailies. The Poles have three; the Germans have two; the Bohemians one. If these people can have them, why cannot we? Holland has only 2,000,000 Catholics. Yet they have eighteen Catholic dailies. We are at the very least 10,000,000 English speaking Catholics. Cannot we have one paper? But the Hollanders are confined to a small area. Are their 2,000,000 Catholics in a smaller area than the "2,000,000 in the New York area"? Yet Holland has not only one, but eighteen, papers.

"The newspaper affirms opinion, recognizes and voices existing opinion, rather than forms opinion." Therefore its influence is small, and, I suppose, that is the reason why the Catholic daily is not desirable. Let me here cite the words of that eminent authority, the late Pope Pius X: "Again I urge you to work for the diffusion of the Catholic press, for in these days people regulate their lives almost entirely by the daily reading of the press."

Mr. Walsh himself—consistently with his opposition to the Catholic daily, or inconsistently, which?—decries the attitude of the secular press towards the Catholic Church and here is his remedy: "How would it do, every time one finds his gorge rising over some new display of ignorance or contempt of Catholic feelings in his daily paper, there and then to resolve to secure one new reader for AMERICA?"

Does Mr. Walsh consider his suggestion a practical and adequate remedy?

Mr. Neacy and the Toiler

To the Editor of AMERICA:

The Editor, in reading me a lecture on my attitude towards labor, overlooked one or two practical considerations which are less present to him, perhaps, than they are to one in the game. The beating heart, making for the continued life of any industrial venture must be the absolute stability and uniformity of wage rates in the same field. For this reason, while "Bill James," an unskilled laborer might have trouble finding a job at $12 a week, and probably would have to take what he could get, he would have no difficulty in finding one at 30 cents an hour with time-and-a-half for overtime; in fact, in the latter case Bill would be confronted with an embarrassment of findings! I do not know what statistics the Editor is using to cut down Bill so, but it is sure they give me as much mirth, as a philosophically off-color word in my letter to AMERICA seems to have furnished him. Of course, if Bill sets up to be Williard P. James and insists on selling neckties in a basement department-store, he may be paid less than he can get at productive employment (and take the rest out in personal satisfaction, which is recognized as part of wages, I believe, by the workers themselves), but if he has any honest wish to support that wife, he can pick out his job at a living wage to do it on.

It was not out of my lack of information, but rather because of the great doses of it I have had, that I spoke of "the privilege of collective bargaining" because the way it is carried out is certainly not as a right entailing correlative duties, nor does any union that I know of act as a responsible person to whom a right could belong. If the labor union really were a moral person, consistent and reliable, who can doubt that employers would be glad, even at greater price (which is usually paid for uniformity and simpleness in any commercial dealings) to treat with one man or a small and more intelligent representation of men, than to treat with thousands? But instead, the union might be called an "immoral person," with no regard for its word, no shame, no consistence, holding to nothing but its immediate interests and exhibiting a monstrous selfishness towards the great bulk of wage-earners not included in itself. No union ever lived up to a contract any longer than it seemed highly advantageous to it to allow such a scrap of paper to stand. Quite often, contrary to outside supposition, the difficulty is not a matter of wages at all. In Buffalo the other day, Uncle Sam had to step in and commandeer the bakeshops. Although wage demands had been granted by the masterbakers, the union called a strike and delivered an ultimatum for a reduction of ten minutes a day and refused to arbitrate. The Government took over the work of supplying Buffalo with a comment on the patriotism of those who would obstruct on such an issue at such a time.

But the blustering, and welching and jack-in-office interfering of the union officials, irritating to the employer and impeding as it is, is not the worst. The great impeachment against the unions: no one of them but cuts at the real wealth of the country, production.

The Encyclical, which AMERICA so justly praises, admitting that it was written twenty years ago, may have had its part in bringing about the humanitarian changes, that have since rendered its more drastic expressions obsolete. But it is certain that in this country with industrial commissions in every State, with labor laws to safeguard the workers, systems of vocational schooling, and schools of trade, labor may suffer from its own inertia and lack of distribution, but it certainly does not suffer from injustice that an employer's "taking thought" could mend. For the employer is subject to as rigid conditions as his employee, and must maintain a difficult balance between cost of output and its selling price, in order to keep going at all.

Take Out Catholic Books

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"Have you Father Sasia's 'The Future Life?'" a friend of mine recently asked one of the assistants in a public library. "No," she serenely answered. "We buy very few Catholic books now, you know." "Indeed!" exclaimed the seeker after truth. "Why is that?" "Because no one reads them," said the assistant librarian. "Catholics have come and asked us to get this book or that treating of matters presumably of interest to them, and when we have gone to the expense of buying the book desired, it is scarcely ever taken out by anyone. We are perfectly willing to procure Catholic books if they are only called for occasionally, but we really cannot use the city's money in purchasing books that will not be read. There was a zealous assistant librarian here some years ago, who managed to get a neighboring parish school interested in reading Catholic books, and the children and their teachers took out so many works by Catholics that that department grew wonderfully, and the enterprising assistant had her salary increased. But she left us last year to enter the convent and since then the work she built up has languished. I will gladly get you Father Sasia's book if you will guarantee that there will be a demand for it."

The applicant shook his head, turned sadly away, and made no comment. After all, what could he say?

Bismarck and the Church

TIME was when we sat at the feet of Germany, humbly craving enlightenment, for it was the fashion to regard Germany as a paragon, particularly in education and statecraft. We named our public schools after famous Germans, and sought to remake our educational system, from the kindergarten to the university, according to the model exhibited in Heidelberg or Berlin. Viewed from afar, the German State, like the German laboratory, seemed to approach the perfection of "efficiency." Whatever its shortcomings, "it worked," it produced results, palpable, undeniable results. When, from time to time, a humble Catholic ventured to suggest that the doctrine of State supremacy, as it was exemplified along the Rhine, was perilously like an unequal division of power between God and Caesar, he was very properly rebuked as one whose locks were still dank with the dews of medievalism.

The change which has marked public opinion within the last twelve months would be merely amusing, if it were not an encouraging sign of returning sanity. We are beginning to suspect, in a dim way, that our German models had feet of clay and that our imitations, as a rule, carefully avoided whatever excellence may have been in the models, to embody their harmful features. Bismarck is no longer held up to American children as an ideal statesman, nor are the lying maneuvers which distinguished his attacks on the Church, set forth as the noble efforts of a high-minded patriot bent on destroying ecclesiastical greed and tyranny. Writing in a recent number of Collier's, Mr. Owen Johnson admits very frankly that Bismarck was intent only upon exalting the State "to the dignity of a Faith," and that the main opposition which he encountered came from Catholics who refused to admit the abominable doctrine. "The early conflicts of Bismarck with Catholicism," he writes, "and the 'May Laws' against the Jesuits, came because of a refusal to admit this essential German doctrine of the supremacy of the State."

No Catholic, so long as he remained true to his Faith, has ever inclined to look with favor upon that monstrosity known as the "Absolute State." The opposition between Bismarck and the German Catholics was inevitable. However strong their desire to join with their fellow-countrymen in the establishment of a united Germany, their Catholic instincts made them turn with horror from the Bismarckian ideal of a supreme State, founded on the policy of "blood and iron" which at present seems to guide official Germany. As Dr. Barry has well remarked, the Middle Ages might be well defined as the period during which the Holy See fought on behalf of freedom against the encroachment of the State. Resolute in her insistence that every citizen give the State all that the State may justly ask, the Church has ever been equally resolute in condemning any doctrine which makes man, created in the image of God, a mere pawn in the game of government.

"Much Ado, Etc."?

THE fact that some Catholics have been insisting on the distinction between valid and licit matter for the Mass and have been suggesting that an indult could be got from the Holy See without trouble for the substitution of grape juice in place of wine in the celebration of the Sacred Mysteries has led one journalist to quote some of their words under the caption, "Much Ado, Etc." The assumption underlying the choice of such a title is that we, by our own admission, are splitting hairs and that the whole question of whether we shall use grape juice or wine in the Holy Sacrifice is merely a matter of unimportant ecclesiastical legislation, which would be modified almost for the asking. Nothing could be further from the truth or from the minds of those who have correctly expounded the difference between liceity and validity.

No one knows better than they that it would be a serious sin to celebrate Mass with grape juice without permission of the Holy See, and that the Holy See has given such permission only very rarely and in cases of extreme necessity. It would be very regrettable if the impression conveyed by the caption, "Much Ado, Etc.", should be given general currency, for it would render our efforts to preserve the integrity of our Catholic worship much more difficult.

Emphatically it is not much ado about nothing to insist that bone-dry prohibition laws shall not exclude the importation and use of wine for sacrificial purposes. It is by no means certain, and we cannot conceive on what grounds the contrary can be asserted, that the Holy See would without trouble grant an indult for the use of grape juice in the Mass. So sweeping a departure from the immemorial and universal practice of the Church, if granted, would be conceded with the utmost reluctance, for it would render the Holy Sacrifice, as offered by Catholics in the United States, different from the Holy Sacrifice as it is offered throughout the rest of the world. Mass with grape juice would not be an exact fulfilment of the mandate of Christ, "Do this in commemoration of Me"; for wine, not grape juice, was used by the Divine Redeemer at the Last Supper. This is the reason why every moral theology, that has the approval of ecclesiastical authority, declares without a shadow of doubt that grape juice is imperfect matter for the consecration, and its use, unless permitted for grave reasons, is a mortal sin. No priest has ever used it in the Mass except with regret, and no Catholic can contemplate without pain the prospect of being forced to use it as a general practice. Besides the use of grape juice would endanger the validity of the Holy Sacrifice, for experts declare that it is extremely difficult to keep grape juice from changing into other substances that are neither grape juice nor wine.

Right-minded Americans are far from being disposed to tamper with the central act of Catholic worship, an act which is the very heart of our religious life. It is ignorance of our position, not bigotry, at least as a rule, that has been at the root of such legislation as has not made provision for our wishes. This is clear from the decision of the Supreme Court of Oklahoma. If the worst comes to pass and we are actually forced to appeal for an indult to the Holy See, it will be time enough to talk of the distinction between valid and licit matter. Our duty at present is to impress on the minds of our fellow-countrymen that the use of wine in the celebration of the Mass, is a matter of most serious concern to us, and that all we claim is the right to have our Mass conform to the Mass as it has always been celebrated and is now celebrated in every corner of the world. It is absolutely wrong for any Catholic to let non-Catholics believe that it is a matter of little concern to us whether we shall use grape juice or wine.

The Kaiserites of Bigotry

A PRESS circular issued by the National Committee on Public Information at Washington calls timely attention to the pro-German nature of the anti-Catholic propaganda now being carried on against the Catholic Church. AMERICA has often adverted to this fact, and public-spirited citizens cannot fail to realize it. Governor Catts was rightly prevented from continuing a recent harangue against his fellow American citizens of the Catholic faith with cries of "Pro-German!" Whether these attacks are fomented by German agents, as the Committee on Public Information believes, or whether they are simply the out-croppings of religious bigotry and the intrigues of a petty and despicable political ambition, is immaterial. It is difficult to see how they can be regarded otherwise than treasonable, since they are most effectively aiding and abetting the enemy. The same is doubtless true of all similar attacks made upon any law-abiding body of American citizens, whether Jews or Protestants.

Special mention is made in the Committee's circular of the rumor, circulated at our very entrance into the war, that President Wilson's Catholic secretary had been executed for treason. In the same manner the mails have been filled with the alleged "bloody oath of the Knights of Columbus." A pro-German agent, we are told, had been caught distributing copies of it in New Jersey and was forthwith sent to prison. The Washington circular, written by an associate chairman of the Committee on Public Information and officially issued for press notice throughout the country, thus expresses its further views upon the subject:

> In Spain and the Catholic countries of South America the Kaiser poses as "the champion of Catholic Bavaria and Catholic Austria against Protestant England, infidel France, and Socialistic Italy, the enemy of the Vatican." He does not preserve that pose in Catholic Belgium or Catholic Poland. And in America the Kaiserite uses this very claim of the Kaiser to arouse enmity against the Catholics, just as in Italy the German agent used it in an unsuccessful attempt to seduce the Italian Catholics, and now in America accuses the Italian Catholics of having succumbed to the seduction. As a matter of fact, the Catholic chaplains in the Italian army were among the first to discover this propaganda among the soldiers, reported it to the officers, and combated it diligently.

These last words are particularly notable and should forever silence the mouth of calumny. Whether or not we attribute the present anti-Catholic propaganda to the agents of the Kaiser, it is certainly doing his work. The men who before the war had been making "a living out of sectarian animosities" are engaged, unconsciously perhaps, in his service today:

> They are representing the trouble in Ireland as a purely religious trouble and the opposition to conscription in Quebec as the same sort of thing: Even Rudyard Kipling recently fell into the trap and denounced the Pope and the Kaiser and the neutrals in one breath. Such denunciations overlook the fact that Cardinal Mercier, the Catholic prelate of Belgium, has been the most effective popular opponent of the Kaiser that Europe has produced. This is a war of nations, not of creeds. Prussia is as Protestant a nation as England is, and Belgium and Poland as Catholic as Austria.

Anyone, therefore, as the public circular concludes, who seeks to involve religious issues with the present war is serving Germany as effectively as if he were exclusively devoting his attention to disabling our transports or blowing up munition plants.

Rescuing the New York "Reformers"

IN the autumn of 1917, a municipal election in New York attracted, for some reason as yet unexplained, an extraordinary amount of attention throughout the whole country. Very few secular journals, either in New York or elsewhere, dared at the time tell the truth on the issues in that election, nor has the lapse of months given them new courage. They have not cared, for instance, to bring into any prominence the scandalous fact that to reelect as Mayor a now almost forgotten individual, the "reformers" thought the expenditure of $2,000,000 a necessary and therefore a legitimate expenditure. But no more decisive victory was ever won by the people than that achieved against the candidate who was recommended more strongly by his dollars than by anything he had done for the true welfare of the city of New York.

That is but the first paragraph of a long chapter which might be written for a history of the "reformers" in New York. The second would open with the action of two special grand juries, convened by the Governor, to inquire into the high cost of voting in New York. The first of these bodies returned a number of indictments. Of these, some mentioned the certification of false election-returns, others forgery, others, crimes so inconsiderable as petty larceny. In a lengthy report this grand jury asked for the enactment of legislation which "would make impossible, in future, any agreement or conspiracy, to buy an election." This request formed a fitting epitaph for New York's reformers and "uplifters." Some sixty gentlemen, low in the social and financial world, are now cracking rock and otherwise expending their large energies in a useful and edifying manner in various New York penal institutions. The majority acknowledged their guilt; but a vociferous minority, stoutly protesting innocence, were unable to demonstrate the spotless whiteness of their lives and works to a hard-headed jury.

This peremptory action promised well for the continuance of democracy in New York. Unfortunately, however, the second grand jury so far forgot itself as to return indictments against a multi-millionaire, an ex-Governor, and two politicians who may yet prove useful. Very properly, these ardent apostles of all that is pure and ennobling in politics are leaving nothing undone that will help to screen from public gaze the inner history of the last election. Most remarkably unlike Monsignor Dunn, Father Farrell, and others, accused of various crimes in the infamous campaign against the Catholic institutions of New York, the last of all things in their desires is a day in open court. Love always has its little indiscretions, even love for pure government, and to expose them to publicity is nothing short of impropriety. Accordingly their attorneys have suggested to the learned court that both the grand juries were utterly devoid of jurisdiction, inasmuch as they were, to employ a canonical manner of speaking, quite clandestine. For according to law, due notice of the convening of these juries should have been published in two New York newspapers, once in each of two consecutive weeks. One of the appointed journals complied with the law; in the other, the notice appeared, not in two successive weeks, but twice in the same week. Technically, therefore, the city of New York knew nothing of these juries. The consideration that everyone in New York who could read was aware of the fact that these juries had convened, and were examining hundreds of witnesses, willing and unwilling, in the effort to reform the "reformers" is, of course, immaterial.

If the learned court allows this amazing defense, the long line of "uplifters" who are yet unindicted or untried will again form outside the jury room in the Criminal Courts building. If the contention is rejected, all that the State can bestow upon those unfortunate "uplifters" who have already served their terms, will be a large amount of barren pity. That is one of the drawbacks in our legal methods. Another is, that it is still possible to urge pleas of the type offered in defense of the multi-millionaire, the ex-Governor, and the two politicians who may yet prove useful.

Social Legislation and the Constitution

ON June 3, the Supreme Court of the United States declared the Keating-Owen "Child Labor Law" unconstitutional. The purpose of that law was good, as the Court plainly admits. It embodied a very noble concept of community welfare: it was promoted with a rare degree of courage and unselfishness by men and women who were proud to enroll themselves as defenders of the child, against the greed of conscienceless and stupid corporations. But the Supreme Court has sustained the contention of many, that the Keating-Owen measure was an excellent example of trying to do the right thing in the wrong way.

More than once has the danger been stressed in these pages, of invoking Federal intervention in matters primarily under the control of the State. Such procedure simply means a confession that local self-government is a myth. It implies an abandonment of the Constitution, which thus far has served us well, with its nice, but fairly well-defined apportionment of power between the several States and the Government at Washington. If the States cannot govern themselves, no power known to us can supply for the lamentable deficiency, and in that sad case the American Republic as a political experiment has failed egregiously.

It was this view that AMERICA, deeply in sympathy with legislation for the protection of the child, urged strongly when the Keating-Owen bill was before Congress. The bill was founded on the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution. It seemed clear that only the most far-fetched interpretation would make this clause refer to children engaged in intrastate industrial enterprises. AMERICA's opinion that, if enacted, the bill could never stand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court is now confirmed, and on the two grounds then adduced, namely, that the proposed law exceeded the authority of Congress over commerce, and usurped "a power in a purely local matter, to which the Federal authority does not extend." It was, therefore, an unwarranted, as well as an unnecessary, invasion of the undoubted power of the several States. In the words of Mr. Justice Day, rendering decision:

> This court has no more important function than that which devolves upon it the obligation to preserve inviolate the constitutional limitations upon the exercise of authority, Federal and State, to the end that each may continue to discharge harmoniously with the other the duties intrusted to it by the Constitution.
> In our view, the necessary effect of this act . . . is to regulate the hours of labor of children in factories and mines within the State, a purely State authority. Thus the act is in a twofold sense repugnant to the Constitution. It not only transcends the authority delegated to Congress over commerce, but also exerts a power as to a purely local matter, to which the Federal authority does not extend.

The far-reaching result of upholding the act cannot be more plainly indicated than by pointing out that if Congress can thus regulate matters intrusted to local authority, by prohibition of the movement of commodities in interstate commerce, all freedom of commerce will be at an end, and the power of the States over local matters may be eliminated, and thus our system of Government be practically destroyed.

Social legislation is sure to defeat its purposes, many of which are good, if it insists on forcing needed reforms in an unconstitutional manner. The only sane policy is to set ourselves, not the Federal Government, to the task of sweeping the dirt from our own doorsteps. The work of the Child Labor Committees is not at an end; on the contrary, it has only begun. If they will now apply their great energies to the enactment of comprehensive child labor laws in the respective States, we may hope that the reign of our industrial Herods will soon be overthrown.

Literature

LORD DUNSANY

PERHAPS the war has had something to do with it—the war has something to do with everything these days! For it was scarcely the expected thing that so exotic a genius as that of Lord Dunsany should suddenly leap into popularity. But the thing has, quite obviously, happened; the dramatist who began in a very ancient, remote and aristocratic corner of Ireland, who traveled to this country by way of the experimental "little theaters," would seem now in fair way of becoming a cult far outside of the clubs and the reading circles. Last year proved that he had but to beckon with one mysterious finger to have Broadway—that is to say, Manhattan—crowding after him as Hamelin town crowded after its Pied Piper. And during the season just closing Mr. Fiske put Lord Dunsany, albeit in eminent company, "on the road." But then, he happens to be a soldier as well as a poetic dramatist!

Edward John Moreton Drax Plunkett, the eighteenth Baron Dunsany, comes, of course, from one of the great historic Irish families: the same family which flowered once in the Blessed Archbishop Oliver Plunkett, the martyr, though it has not been Catholic for now these many troubled years. He was born July 24, 1878, and most of his childhood was spent at the picturesque Dunsany Castle in County Meath, where he had but to look across at the dreamful Hill of Tara, and where he passed uncounted hours poring over the Bible, fairy-tales and legends of the world's great heroes. From popular modern literature, and from the newspapers, he was—who shall say unluckily?—debarred. Later he passed to Eton and Sandhurst for his more formal education.

In his twenty-first year Dunsany succeeded to the family title and estate; and having chosen the army by way of profession, he fought through the Boer war as one of the celebrated Coldstream Guards. In 1904 he married Lady Beatrice Villiers, daughter of the Earl of Jersey, by whom he has had one son. Then, breaking in upon a period of rich literary creativeness for the young Irishman, came the world-war. During its early months Lord Dunsany was sent to Gallipoli as captain of the Fifth Royal Inniskilling Fusiliers. And having survived that tragic campaign, and various subsequent wounds, he is today at the front again.

So it is from a romantic and an active life that Lord Dunsany's plays come to us—as plays ought to come. Nor are they the first-fruits of his preoccupation with the pen. From the year 1905 he had written curious symbolic tales of the "edge of the world." One of these collections, the "Book of Wonder," had perhaps the most briefly alluring "preface" in contemporary literature. It was the characteristic Dunsany challenge and invitation: "Come with me, ladies and gentlemen who are in any-wise weary of London, come with me: and those that tire at all of the world we know: for we have new worlds here."

Strange and whimsical and picturesque were the dream-worlds his fancy conjured: peopled by elfin, venturesome men, and by that fateful hierarchy of gods and demigods who never dwelt on sea or land, but only in the brain of a poet-Celt eager to escape modern sophistications, and perhaps not wishing to utilize the poetry of Christian symbolism. Lord Dunsany has not hesitated to create, for his own purposes, a new mythology; of which we can only say that it is highly remote—and highly efficient!

These Dunsanyan deities are in constant evidence throughout the plays, providing a background of splendid awe and often of extraordinary terror. They are jealous gods, who know justice but know not mercy: symbols of the Divine, eternal order of things which may not be tampered with by man. Of emotion or personality they have, apparently, none. And this suits well the parabolic nature of Lord Dunsany's art. He is interested in the particular type only as it leads to—or from—the general idea. His men and women, although carved often with compelling definiteness and felicity, are less human beings than vivified ideas. But the sweep and reality of his imagination save the dramatist from the too-great abstraction which might well, in a lesser genius, make wooden or marble these types of his conjuring. Truly the symbols of Lord Dunsany are neither of wood nor of marble: but of jade or of amethyst, or of ancient porcelain, and betimes they march illusively like the fabled procession within the beryl stone.

It seems to have been William Butler Yeats who first turned Lord Dunsany's attention to the stage. His first play, produced at the Abbey Theater in 1909, was "The Glittering Gate." It is, of course, the episode of two departed (and unrepentant) thieves, who attempt to pry open the great portal of heaven with a jimmy . . . only to find upon the farther side, Nothing! At first glance this bleak little drama might appear the last word in hopeless blasphemy. But the uniform, if somewhat pagan, reverence of Dunsany's other plays suggests that this first effort was merely a symbolic twisting of the truth that "Our own shall come to us," that only those who can first conceive spiritual ideals may afterward attain to them. Nevertheless, it is easily the most futile of all Lord Dunsany's plays: and in view of some recent efforts to give it a sort of succès de scandale one is glad to hear the author himself declare that "it never interested him." One feels of "The Glittering Gate," as of too many things in recent drama, that it was very tellingly done, but that there was no reason why any healthy intellect should choose to do it at all.

The next play, "King Argimenes and the Unknown Warrior," very successfully produced in this country by Mr. Stuart Walker, is a work of infinitely greater sweep. It is a study of the king and the serf: the hopeless serf, who is not even permitted a god to pray to, and who is fain to gnaw the bones of his master's dog. It is one of the most piercing arraignments of tyranny to be found in modern literature, even in Irish literature. And as an example of the enormous felicity with which

Lord Dunsany can sometimes sum up the story of two lives in a speech of as many minutes, nothing could be finer than this little colloquy between the captive king and his base-born fellow-slave:

Argimenes. If I had a sword would they follow me?
Zarb. I wish I could think of things like that. It is because you were once a king that you can think of a sword of bronze. I tried to hope once that I should some day fight the guards, but I couldn't picture a sword . . . I could only picture whips!

"The Gods of the Mountain," probably the greatest of all Dunsany's plays, was also written in 1911. Here is the story of seven beggars who come to the mythical city of Kongros "about the time of the fall of Babylon," pretending to be the seven green gods of the mountain. They are believed: they are worshiped. Humanity capitulates utterly and the world is theirs. Then upon a night comes the sound of great stone footfalls outside the temple, and the outraged gods come themselves upon the scene. And when they leave, the beggars are transfixed for all time into images of jade. It is a play of superb power, a masterpiece of horror. This same theme, a vindication of Divine justice beyond and above the tricks of men, is treated in Lord Dunsany's realistic modern "thriller," "A Night at an Inn," and again in the more remote and poetic fantasy, "The Laughter of the Gods." But it is human revenge, not Divine vengeance, which animates that terrific little drama, "The Queen's Enemies." Here, in the role of his esthetic Egyptian queen, who cannot sleep while she has enemies, and who therefore submerges them in the waters of the Nile while they feast at her table, Dunsany has concentrated something of the sinister quality of Wilde's "Salome."

"The Golden Doom" is a gentler work, a poetic satire upon the playthings of children and of kings. "The Tents of the Arabs" is a dramatic reverie upon the king who craved the peace of the desert and the camel-driver who craved the beauty of the city. And just to prove that he is not always occupied with the serious problems of the world, Lord Dunsany has written one extremely clever and ironic little farce, "The Lost Silk Hat."

There can be no doubt about the gripping power and originality of Lord Dunsany's genius. Within the chosen limitations of his field he is one of the most successful of contemporary English, or rather Irish, dramatists: a satirist and a symbolist of rare insight. He has also shown himself a poet, without publishing one line of formal verse. And what more the future will show him remains in the lap of a greater God than any his work has yet exploited.

The Cross at the Front: Fragments from the Trenches. Fifth Edition. $1.00; The Soul of the Soldier: Sketches from the Western Battle-Front. $1.25. Both by THOMAS TIPLADY, Chaplain to the Forces. New York: Fleming H. Revell Co.

The author of these very readable war books is an English Methodist minister who is quite free from the anti-Catholic rancor which now characterizes the utterances of some of his co-religionists in this country, who has a living faith in the power of Christianity and the Divinity of Our Lord, which is a refreshing contrast to much of the Protestant literature published nowadays and who tells his experiences at the front with remarkable vividness and describes with deep feeling the virtues he beheld the soldiers practising. From numerous passages of great religious and literary beauty in the volumes, it is clear that Mr. Tiplady has discerned in Catholicism, its worship and its emblems, many striking facts and truths that are hidden, as a rule, from the average Protestant. He writes for instance of "The Wayside Calvary":

On my right I could plainly see the flashes and flares that light up the battle-front at night. They held my eyes with a strange fascination as I took my solitary way. Suddenly I turned to a clump of trees on my left, and there saw what I had already seen by day—a tall, stone Cross with a small bronze figure of Christ nailed upon it. There the Cross stood in the gloom, with just sufficient light to show forth its solemn grandeur. Protestant though I am, when I looked at the fitful lights on the French front and then turned again to the Cross, I could not forbear to lift my hand to Him in salute. I know now why it is that on the French roads you see representations of the Crucifixion rather than the Ascension. It is that this weary war-stricken world needs assurance of God's love rather than of His power. There on the right were our sons being sacrificed, but there on the left the representation of the sacrifice of God's Son.

In another beautiful chapter entitled "The Untouched Cross" the author moralizes on the wonderful immunity from shellfire which the crucifix seems to enjoy, a fact which has repeatedly been observed in this war. "Amid the fiery blast of bullets He had remained with arms outstretched interceding with God for a ruined world. And not a bullet had touched Him. . . . The crucifix was the symbol of the Eternal, and of the Undying Love which no shell can touch. In all that deserted village the crucifix alone stands untouched." Mr. Tiplady bears like testimony to the remarkable preservation of a statue of "the Virgin Mary, all that the war has spared," a sight which suggests to him some admirable reflections on motherhood. The most striking chapter in "The Soul of the Soldier" is, perhaps, "The Cross at Neuve Chapelle," which is reprinted from the Atlantic Monthly in the current Catholic Mind. But Mr. Tiplady's second volume is almost as rich as his first in tributes to the strong Christian faith of the French and to the courage, piety and cheerfulness of the soldiers to whose religious needs he ministered.

A Short History of Science. By W. T. SEDGWICK, Professor of Biology, and W. H. TYLER, Professor of Mathematics, at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Cambridge. New York: The Macmillan Company. $2.50.

When Helmholtz with the aid of his newly invented ophthalmoscope first revealed to the world the wonders of the interior structure of the eye, it was said that he had unfolded the marvels of a hitherto undiscovered world. Every day science is accomplishing the same extraordinary feat. Marvelous as the accomplishments of the past have been in science we are perhaps on the threshold of still more astonishing wonders. If the authors of the present volume revise and bring it up to date a dozen years hence, they will no doubt have to add some new chapters to the great epic whose story they have so well told in the pages before us. The history of science is the true fairy tale. The wonders of the Thousand and One Nights, of the magic carpet and Aladdin's lamp pale into insignificance before it. A mere glance at the volume of the two professors of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology is enough to prove that.

The work begins with an interesting chapter on the accomplishments of early civilization, a discussion of the antiquity and the ancestry of man, then leads the reader through the mazes of the Babylonian and Assyrian era, and after a brief sketch of Hebraic civilization, this part closes with a review of the spirit and the achievements of Greek civilization. The subsequent chapters bring before the reader such captivating subjects as the early mathematical accomplishments of Babylonia and Egypt, Greek science in the great schools of Alexandria, together with the decline of those scientific studies in the City of the Ptolemies, the so-called Dark Ages, Hindu and Arabian science, the wonderful progress of mathematics and mechanics in the sixteenth century, the modern tendencies in mathematical science, and the advance of physical science in the nineteenth century.

Not a single great figure among the giants of the past or a single great discovery is forgotten. With rare exceptions the treatment is non-technical, and the reader who is not scientifically equipped to understand all the intricacies of the problems put before him, but who takes interest in the romance of the story will be delighted. The authors do not go out of their way to misrepresent the attitude of the Church towards science, but they have not always critically sifted the oft-repeated charges brought against her. It is quite historical to recognize that the Middle Ages lacked our scientific equipment and that they were deficient in physical knowledge. But those facts do not justify an author in still fastening on them the odious epithet of the "Dark Ages," long discarded by fair-minded scholars. The authors, however, have done a praiseworthy thing in publishing among the appendices to their valuable work a few passages from the "Opus Majus" of Roger Bacon, in which that extraordinary work of the thirteenth century emphasizes the importance of the experimental method in science in words which seem strangely modern. Albertus Magnus, another monk, almost contemporary with Roger Bacon, had laid down the same principle.

The book is the work of experts, authoritative in everything that appertains to science, discovery and invention. In such matters, however, as evolution, the Inquisition, and the attitude of the Church toward science, Catholic readers must carefully weigh the authors' statements. J. C. R.

Poems, 1908-1914. By JOHN DRINKWATER. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $1.25.

These finished lyrics of the six years just prior to the war carry the reader back to a peaceful, leisurely world in which "the everlasting miracle of spring" could be joyously welcomed by an English singer who keenly notes and tenderly loves his country's natural beauties. "God of the cherry-bloom in the orchards of calm" calls Mr. Drinkwater "from London," to

> "Laugh with God in God's delight,
> Create a world for every day
> And store a dream for every night."

The poet's heart is constantly overflowing with gratitude to God for the beauty of the world, and the clash of arms is not heard in his volume. He has fought in his soul the battles of the spirit, nevertheless, as is shown by these stanzas on "The Soldier":

> The large report of fame I lack,
> And shining clasps and crimson scars,
> For I have held my bivouac
> Alone amid the untroubled stars.
> My battle-field has known no dawn
> Beclouded by a thousand spears;
> I've been no mounting tyrant's pawn
> To buy his glory with my tears.
> It never seemed a noble thing
> Some little leagues of land to gain
> From broken men, nor yet to fling
> Abroad the thunderbolts of pain.
> Yet I have felt the quickening breath
> As peril heavy peril kissed—
> My weapon was a little faith,
> And fear was my antagonist.
> Not a brief hour of cannonade,
> But many days of bitter strife,
> Till God of His great pity laid
> Across my brow the leaves of life. W. D.

The Virgin Islands of the United States of America. Historical and Descriptive Commercial and Industrial Facts, Figures and Resources. By LUTHER K. ZABRISKIE. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $4.00.

The author of this book was formerly United States vice-consul at St. Thomas. According to its publishers it supplies "a detailed account of practically every interest affecting our new Caribbean possessions. The resources of the islands are fully depicted, and their future possibilities are carefully outlined." This is a rather comprehensive statement and there may be several objections to the accuracy of its claim. The volume does, however, supply a large variety of historical, commercial, political and social details about the little group of fifty or more islands in the Caribbean that were formally added to our possessions on March 31, 1917. As Catholics we are curious to learn something about our brethren there, but the information is meager. The author tells us that according to an official census taken in February, 1911, there were 7,369 Catholics in the islands and 19,717 members of non-Catholic sects. The total population at that date was 27,086. The greater portion of the planters are Irish, the remainder Creoles. The most important schools are carried on by the Catholics and the Moravians.

These figures may be supplemented for the benefit of general intelligence by a note from an interesting contribution on the islands by Bishop Corrigan in the Catholic Historical Review for April. We are told there that they are part of the diocese of Roseau, of which the present Bishop is the Right Rev. Philip Schelfkaut, C.SS.R. In St. Thomas there is one parish with three priests and 3,000 Catholics; in St. Croix two parishes, four priests and 4,000 Catholics. With these exceptions the whole diocese is under the care of American Redemptorists. Although the book is announced as containing a resume of the negotiations attending the sale of the islands to the United States the name of Dr. Maurice Francis Egan, our Minister to Denmark, is not mentioned anywhere in its pages. This is all the more remarkable when it is recalled that Dr. Egan spent a large part of the past five years in bringing about the sale and in thwarting by his diplomatic finesse the German intrigues to prevent it. President Wilson had confidence enough in him to give him practically a free-hand in the negotiations. Yet Mr. Zabriskie seems never to have heard of Dr. Egan! T. F. M.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

One of the best of the recent novels is "The Happiest Time of Their Lives" (Century, $1.40), by Alice Duer Miller. Its theme is a trial of strength, a conflict between the artificial conventions of wealth and real worth, with the final triumph of the latter. Delicately interwoven with the study of character is a triple romance, youth climbing over difficulties to happiness, maturity weathering a crisis, and age shaking off the shackles of social tyranny. The finest person of the book is Pete's mother, a charming combination of old-fashioned ideals with modern independence.——"Dr. Latimer's Progress" (Holt, $1.40) is called by its anonymous author, who is suspected of being Simeon Strunsky of the New York Evening Post, a novel of contemporaneous adventure, though it is not really a novel at all, but a series of clever observations on some of the phases of current life. Theology, sociology, the problem of the conscientious objector and other problems of modern existence are subjected to bright though not very searching criticism by an overwrought professor in the course of a walking tour. The theology is all awry, but on other topics the professor is sane and sympathetic.——Frederick P. Ladd's "After" (Duffield, $1.50) is the story of a French war-orphan, who refuses to sacrifice principle to obtain love and happiness, and in the end wins both.

"Over Here" (Lippincott, $1.35), by Lieut. Hector MacQuarrie, is a war-book which gives the experiences in America of one from "over there." They range over the period of a year, spent mostly in Pennsylvania and adjacent States as an inspector of productions. The book runs on in a chatty, frank style that disarms any bad feeling that might so easily arise in a narrative as full as this of acute observation of people and institutions. A little inconsequence about many of his conclusions, and a seeming over-indulgence to some of our faults would seem to come of Lieut. MacQuarrie's aim in writing: "to succeed just a little in helping to cement a strong, intelligent friendship between the two great Anglo-Saxon races." Despite this aim, "Over Here" is not a pretentious book, being but a record of what sharp eyes saw, kindly feeling interpreted, all tempered with a deal of plain common-sense. The author's statement of the Irish question, however, will probably be hotly challenged by some of his readers.——"How Do You Know?" is the question Henry Irving Dodge advises the readers of "The Yellow Dog" (Harper, $0.50) to ask all those who are suffering just now from "doubt-the-Government distemper." The little story tells how Mr. Walker's "Boy Detectives of America" made all "calamity-howlers" either prove their assertions or keep quiet.——Florence Tabor Holt's "They the Crucified" (Houghton Mifflin, $1.00) contains two plays in which some of the horrid deeds of our enemies in the present war are fashioned into dramatic form. Neither drama makes pleasant reading, and it is probable that neither would attract much attention were it not for the timely pictures portrayed.

In the historic contest between the Papacy and the Empire in the thirteenth century, popes and emperors alike made mistakes. But the mistakes were not wholly and entirely on the part of the popes. The picture therefore given us in Hamilton Drummond's "Greater Than the Greatest" (Dutton, $1.50) is untrue to historical facts as much as it is to the sense of literary proportion. The story is well written and marked by some dramatic incidents. But it is unfair in its presentation of the character and the ideals of the age with which it deals. It has much to do with popes, cardinals and priests, but among those drawn by the author there are very few honest men. Pope Gregory IX had his faults, indeed, but he also had admirable traits. The faults, however, are emphasized, while the finer characteristics are ignored by this novelist, Gregory is represented as the "grey wolf," hungry for power and bent on one thing: to set his tiara above the crowns of emperors and kings. Cardinal Montelengo is a disreputable and Cardinal Pandone an unfaithful priest, and Arsoli an impudent bishop. There is besides a mad friar of the Brotherhood of St. Francis who attempts the life of Frederick of Hohenstaufen after he has seen the Emperor kneel at his feet in something that almost looks like a mock-confession. The heroine, Bianca Pandone, is the niece of her worldly profligate Cardinal-uncle, who thrusts her into what might have been a very compromising situation with the Emperor, had it not been for the good sense and inherent virtue of the maid herself. All the author's sympathies go to Frederick, the shifty sensualist, the man who broke his oath to his friend Honorius and to Gregory IX. Out of the splendid records of the thirteenth century the author might have introduced at least one or two fairly decent ecclesiastics, monks, priests or bishops, to counterbalance the weight of all these evil-minded prelates. And it is a pity that the writer has not given us a more faithful and impartial picture of the times.

"Covered with Mud and Glory" (Small, Maynard, $1.50), by Georges Lafond, a sergeant-major in the French army, contains in twenty vivid chapters a description of a machine-gun company in action. The 150 men of the "Company Casanova" see plenty of hard fighting, have an admirable marching song written expressly for them by their gifted sub-lieutenant, and display an esprit de corps which was well indicated by the words the commander said to his men just before they went into battle: "We are the last company organized. You know that the machine-gunners should be the flower of the army; don't forget it. It is our first engagement. Try to show that we're there a little." The book's author does not appear to be a typical French officer, inasmuch as he confesses, though with regret, that like his horse, Kiki, he has "never believed anything" and "never will" and that he has impressed his "brutal skepticism on the beings who are nearest and dearest" to him. Maurice Barrès writes the preface, and Premier Clemenceau's fine "Tribute to the Soldiers of France" is included in the volume, which has been well translated by Edwin Gile Rich.——Under the title "A Soldier Unafraid" (Little, Brown, $1.00), Theodore Stanton edits and translates letters from the Alsatian front written by Captain Andre Cornet-Auquier of the French army. The writer, the son of a Protestant clergyman, and one of the heroic victims of the war, exhibits a tender love for his mother, an ardent spirit of patriotism, a deep conviction of the Providence of God, and a Christian affection for his Catholic comrades.

EDUCATION

The Girls' High School

SISTER MARY GAUDIOSA harbors no doubts on the subject. Sister has taught school for forty-two years, and by the law of averages and compensation is therefore permitted to hold views quite free from doubt, on at least a few subjects. "What we need most," she avers, "is a high school for girls. Not an ordinary high school," she qualifies, "but a school that will offer programs based upon an actual study of what our girls can, and probably will, do in after-life. And it must be of the highest grade; it must do everything that the great public high schools do, and do it better. But above all, it must be free. We have plenty of good Catholic high schools for girls," concludes Sister Mary Gaudiosa, "but in these times many a Catholic family can't afford to pay the fee they ask."

Where Are the Founders?

I SHAKE my head, regretfully, in deep sympathy, and with an air of "what can we do about it?" I too have pictured my ideal high school for our little Marys, Honorias and Patricias, who now either stay at home perforce, "take a course in a business school," nomen infandum, or trot off to the "Washington Park High." There I know, they will come in contact with a great many things from which I should like to shield them. But how are we to get this school of ours? Where is the generous benefactor, who in these days of touching appeal for so many worthy charities, will think of the great, almost limitless, charity, which he could inaugurate, by setting aside a million or two to build and endow a free Catholic high school for girls in our town? I know there are some who could do this, and not feel any very notable results in the way of privation. We have one such institute, the Claremont, but its accommodations are limited. Had its founder foreseen the growth of this community, the vision might have opened his purse a bit wider, for every year the applications are almost double the number of the available scholarships. This fact alone shows how badly we need at least one new school. If we had half a dozen Claremonts in the city, I think we could create a demand by offering a supply, and that without hurt to our private high schools and academies. For these institutions will always be sought by persons of means.

The Closed Door

IT is one of the joys of my life, a joy that grows keener each year, to attend our simple parochial school "commencements." I like to see the bright young faces, so simple, so full of happiness, so free from guile, so innocently confident of the unknown future. Yet a certain pain always crosses my pleasure on these occasions. These young people are now ready for some initiation in the paths of learning; yet how few, how very few, will ever rest in the shade of academic groves! Poverty presses, and I am afraid that many of our Catholic parents do not share the persuasion of our Jewish brethren, that a few more years at high school and college, will secure financial returns, compared with which, the remuneration of the boy behind a counter, or the girl bending over a typewriter, is but a sorry pittance.

Yes, education pays; it pays, as we now see, and shall see more clearly after the war, even in money. But how much more richly it pays, in the things that count, in culture, the result of living with high thought, in independence, that comes with the trained mind, lifted above servility and lightness, in the close acquaintance that it gives with the best in every age through which man has lived! Above all others in our community, next to the altar, we Catholics should love and revere the schoolhouse. For we have a noble history. We are children of that Church which, as some one has finely said, "guarded the sacred flame of learning throughout the ages," and in books found a pathway to the feet of God. And it is a sharp pain to think that so many of our little children, whose souls Faith and the Sacraments have made so responsive to the influence of all that is good and beautiful, must ever remain strangers to these things of the mind.

What the City Offers

ON a bright morning last June, I stopped in passing, at the main entrance of our parochial school, so ably conducted by Sister Mary Gaudiosa. My purpose was to dust the cob-webs from my brain, by some converse with a parcel of young things who stood there, awaiting the hour of "rehearsal for commencement." Their future plans, as far as they had formed any, came under review in our talk. At least five or six of the group, it seemed to me, had gifts which through training at high school and college, would bear rich fruit. But none were children of wealthy parents; in fact, not one, I believe, came from a household which could afford to pay even the modest stipend customary in our academies. Several had applied at Claremont, but something, what, I do not remember, had checked their applications, and that excellent school could find room for none of them. Hence with real regret, imbibed no doubt from Sister Mary Gaudiosa, they intended to register at the Washington Park.

I know that their innocence will carry most of them unharmed through the miasmas of that school, but that is rather poor consolation. With what lighter hearts should we see them in a school surmounted by the Cross of Christ, the school in which "Christ himself doth rule"! I always feel that the best to be hoped for, when a girl goes to the high school of the pseudo-educational type, so common in our large cities, is that she will take no harm, mental or moral, from the influences which will there surround her. But I have no hope at all that in her courses in literature, or science, or history, or stenography, the fact that our life here is happiest and most useful, when it is made a preparation for our life to come, will be kept steadily before her young mind. I do not look with any confidence for results positively good. I only hope that she will not lose what she attained in her first years at school.

A Pressing Need

MOST of our Catholic girls go to the Washington Parks, because we have provided for them no school of our own. Our need is realized more keenly in the larger cities, I think, than by our brethren in smaller communities. The courses, not to mention the surroundings, of the high schools in the more populous cities, are often such that we feel obliged to keep our young people from them, at all hazards. In the smaller cities these dangers are not so likely to be present, at least, not in an equal degree, or they can be guarded against. But, whatever the reason, the Catholic public does not seem to be alive to the necessity of the free high school for girls. In founding and maintaining our parochial schools, we still have many very great difficulties, and the progress of our high schools for boys, and of our colleges, is not so steady and certain that the authorities can always lie down to rest at night, free from apprehension. We have so much to engage us in these great interests, that we seem to have met the problem of the free high school for girls by not thinking of it at all. Consequently, in many fairly large and fairly well-to-do Catholic communities, it does not exist at all. It can be found in New York, Philadelphia and St. Louis, but what of half a dozen other large cities in which Catholics form a good part of the population? I do not mean to say that we have as many as we need in New York, nor, I suppose, in Philadelphia or St. Louis, but in these cities, it can, at least, be found. Our Catholic colleges for women are growing in numbers and influence, and so are our parochial schools. The system, sound at either extreme, exhibits a dismal gap in the middle, a yawning gap that should be filled by the free high school for girls.

SOCIOLOGY

Can the Worker "Pick His Job"?

IF you will take the trouble to look up your Bartlett's "Familiar Quotations," you will find that in the course of the last thirty centuries life has been compared to a great many different things. But not until this moment, I think, has it been likened to one of those mechanical contrivances which do, or in a more primitive day did, infest amusement parks, and are known, sometimes as "Shoot the Chutes," and sometimes as "Scenic Railways." The essence of these alleged amusements is, that in your wild flight through the air, or down a smooth inclined surface into a lake, you are never quite sure what is coming next. The years have glided quietly into another century, since I last entrusted myself to any of these devices; but the thrills which they gave me as a youth, I now receive from reading the letters of Mr. T. J. Neacy of Milwaukee. For while his general topic is labor and the laborer, like Mrs. Nickleby, he does not always confine himself with scientific precision to the matter in hand.

The Cause of the War

LAST March, in an unthinking moment, I unburdened myself on the subject of "The Laborer's Wage." In the course of some remarkably obvious and inoffensive reflections, I expressed my regret that "many Catholics are utterly unaware of the danger to society in any social program which fails to guarantee justice to the worker, and, primarily, his right, founded on the natural law, of entering into a free contract in disposing of his labor." To regard man, I said, > whose dignity God Himself respects, merely as an economic factor, is the apotheosis of the most stupid and crass materialistic philosophy. Not only does it destroy his worth as a rational being, made in the image of God and destined for immortality, but it makes him, ultimately, a productive factor of dubious value.

And to this I added my fear that "in our anxiety to vindicate the right to property, we have minimized the fact that man's right to live, in a manner befitting human dignity, comes first."

These rather obvious remarks aroused hostility as far West as Milwaukee, Wisconsin. An excellent Catholic in that beautiful city took up his pen to write that I was "not qualified by experience to discuss for practical men" the subject of justice for the worker, and to suggest that "what the Editor evidently has in mind is that wage-earners should be guaranteed the privilege of collective bargaining." After relating the delectable tale of the Buck Stove and Range Company, a narration as germane to the subject as the history of the One-Eyed Calendar of Bagdad, Mr. Neacy proceeded to put Doctors O'Hara and Ryan in the dock with me, and ended with a brief but fervent panegyric of the toiling employer.

Contracts and Collective Bargaining

WHOLLY irrelevant as a criticism of my main thesis, this communication was an admirable proof of my contention that many excellent Catholics were wofully unacquainted with the ethical and moral principles which must be applied in the solution of industrial difficulties. Mr. Neacy obviously held, for instance, the grotesque theory that the worker's freedom of contract in disposing of his labor consisted in this, that "he was as free as the air to accept or turn down a job." That an applicant for work may "accept a job," not because the return is in any sense equitable, but because, in the words of Leo XIII, "an employer or contractor will afford him no better," does not seem to Mr. Neacy a possibility. But even today actual cases of this kind are not uncommon, and in such contingency, both in the judgment of Leo XIII and of every impartial student, the laborer is not entering into a free contract, but is submitting out of hard necessity to "force and injustice." Yet, if I understand him aright, Mr. Neacy calls this view of the case "ridiculous." My critic's lack of acquaintance with Catholic principles and usages of speech touches even a lower depth, when he allows himself to speak of the "privilege of collective bargaining." Collective bargaining, like everything else that man can suggest, invent or use, has its shortcomings, and, no doubt, has been abused. But no amount of misuse can alter the fact that for men to join together, to secure by just means a just return for their labor, is an undoubted right, founded on the natural law. To call it a "privilege" is to misunderstand grievously the relation of employee and employer, and to make trust and confidence between the two classes impossible.

The Union and the Worker

IN his communication, appearing in this issue, Mr. Neacy passes over the answers of Doctor Ryan and myself, and again shifts his ground. The original question, the right of the worker to a free contract in disposing of his labor, is set aside to make room for a violent attack on the trade union. Again does Mr. Neacy fall into the error of holding that abuse destroys legitimate use. It is not difficult to meet the indictment, which may or may not be advanced seriously, "No union ever lived up to its contract, any longer than it seemed highly advantageous to it to allow such a paper to stand," for statements so extreme carry with them their own refutation. Yet two errors in this connection should be briefly noted. The first is, that in this and preceding communications, Mr. Neacy apparently believes the unions to represent the workers in such a degree that the two may be considered synonymous. As a matter of fact, out of every one hundred wage-earners, less than ten are affiliated with any labor organization. The second error is that Mr. Neacy's indictment of the union, even were it fully justified, cannot be urged against the right of the workers to organize. It is tiresome to expatiate upon the obvious, but while my critic's adventures with the unions may have been decidedly unhappy, that fact is not a conclusive argument against the right which all men, even manufacturers, have by the natural law, to promote by just means their progress and prosperity.

The Worker and His Wage

BUT the most astonishing statement set forth by the Milwaukee correspondent is his contention that the worker who "has any honest wish" to do so, "can pick out his job at a living wage." No proof of this assertion is offered, and I venture to say that none can be found. If true, it would imply that the majority of workers are either dishonest, or too lazy to obtain work that pays a living wage. Certainly the Manly Report of the Federal Commission on Industrial Relations has no sympathy with this Milwaukee optimism. According to that Report, between two-thirds and three-fourths of the adult male workers in this country receive less than $750.00 a year, while about the same proportion of women workers are paid less than eight dollars a week. These figures form one reason for Dr. Ryan's repeated statement, a fearful arraignment of our social and industrial conditions, "A considerable majority of both male and female laborers fail to obtain living wages." They are reconciled with difficulty, with Mr. Neacy's easy affirmation that any worker who is in earnest "can pick his own job at a living wage."

I am aware that wages have advanced since the Manly Report, but I am also aware that the cost of living has advanced, and out of all proportion to the increase in wages. Not from one but from many sections of the country comes the cry of want, arising from this inequality. Thus, the Bulletin of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, for October, 1917, represents conditions in the city of Washington as revealing "a shocking state of economic indecency." Within the last few months the Consumers' League of New York issued a set of figures on the price of living in the City of New York. The League held with justice that the lowest weekly wage upon which a woman can live decently in New York was $11.70. Yet four-fifths of the laundry-workers receive less than $11.00, one-half of the women in restaurants less than $10.00, while the average in the paper-box factories and the department stores is, respectively, seven and eight dollars. In Chicago similar conditions exist. In the Illinois Institution Quarterly for March, 1918, Mr. Eugene T. Lies, superintendent of the Chicago United Charities, writes:

> With industry humming during the whole of the year, the average person might have expected that prosperity would have glided over everybody with its magic wand, and that, therefore, charitable agencies could lock their doors and throw away the key.

But this was not the case, and the reason, according to Mr. Lies, was "the tremendous rise in the cost of living, an average of about 35 per cent in twelve months."

> We are safe in asserting that thousands of families in Chicago, in which there is a man at work, are at present living below the normal standard because they are facing daily war prices with peace incomes. While many are enjoying higher pay since the war began, many more are not. . . . Here is an argument for an adequate wage.

I would suggest that in this extremity, Mr. Lies communicate with Mr. Neacy, who will tell him that these people are on the verge of despair, only because they do not honestly desire "to pick out a job at a living wage."

Disproportion of Wages and Prices

IF Mr. Neacy wishes further information on the increased disproportion between wages and the cost of living, he can find it in the report on workers in the packing industries, made by Judge Alschuler in Chicago on March 24. I would also refer him to the report of the Railroad Wage Commission, published on May 8, and signed by the Secretary of the Interior, C. C. McChord, J. H. Covington and W. R. Willcox. If the annual minimum wage be fixed at $800—surely no excessive figure in these days—it is clear that a shockingly large number of railway employees were simply living from hand to mouth. The very slight advance in wages made during the last few years was more than counterbalanced by the fact that "each dollar now represents in its power to purchase . . . but seventy-one cents as against the 100 cents of January, 1916." The first of the Commission's conclusions is that "the cost of living has increased disproportionately among those of small incomes.'

I am simply taking up reports at random to show the absurdity of Mr. Neacy's contention, that any man can "pick his job at a living wage" if he seriously wishes to do so. A report published by the Charity Organization Society a few weeks ago, applies almost the very words of the Railroad Commission to conditions in the city of New York. Of the families studied by the Society, fifty-seven per cent had the same income as last year, twelve per cent were earning less, and only thirty-one per cent showed an increase.

> This situation would be serious enough if this were the first year of the high living costs, but this is the fourth year during which prices have been rapidly rising, and there is no indication of increases in income during the previous years which would help to counterbalance the lack of increase during the year especially studied. Desirable living standards must surely have been affected by such economic pressure as has been increasingly exerted on these comparatively stationary incomes. It would seem, therefore, essential for health and national well-being that every effort be made to keep living costs and incomes in more nearly their normal relationship.

I agree fully with Mr. Neacy, that industrial commissions, labor laws, and other forces, have done much to alleviate the hard lot of the worker, but I find nothing in our present social and industrial conditions to lead me to his opinion that the Encyclical of Leo XIII on the Condition of the Working Classes is, in any sense, "obsolete." Rather do I agree with Dr. Ryan that "we are still very far from having actualized even the minimum measure of wage justice." We have not solved the problem. We are only beginning to realize that there is a problem to be solved.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Results of the Food Campaign

WE have heard much of the splendid results of the Liberty Loan and the Red Cross drive; but we are perhaps less familiar with the remarkable success of the food-conservation appeals. The following is the latest summary of food shipments to the Allies as compared with previous years:

> Exports of pork products for March, 1918, were over 50 per cent larger than for any previous month in the past seven years, and almost three times as great as the highest amount exported in any month in the four years before 1915.
> Exports of beef products for March, 1918, were more than 20 per cent larger than for any previous month in the past seven years and more than twice as great as the highest amount exported in any month in the four years before 1915.
> From July 1, 1917, to March 31, 1918, we exported to the Allies 80,000,000 bushels of wheat and wheat flour, or 124 per cent of the amount available for export on July 1. This was possible through conservation at home. A year ago we exported to the Allies only 51 per cent of the amount available for export on July 1.
> Exports of rye and rye flour from July 1, 1917, through March, 1918, were 32 per cent larger than last year; of barley, 55 per cent larger; of oats and oatmeal, 34 per cent larger.

This is cheering news, and will encourage every one to make still greater sacrifices "to keep the food trucks moving" to the front.

The Passing of the Gary Plan

NEW YORK'S new Board of Education recently issued a report giving an account "of the first four months of stewardship." The new board, in itself something of an experiment, since it consists of but seven unpaid members, with jurisdiction over all public schools in a city of nearly 6,000,000 people, is not afraid to act, and one of its first acts was to arrange for the gradual withdrawal of the "Gary Plan." On this Plan millions of dollars have been expended, but, unfortunately, whatever benefit it might have had, both for the children of New York, and as a huge experiment in pedagogical science, was made almost impossible by the incompetents, "cranks," and politicians by whom it was conducted. The president of the board, Mr. Arthur Somers, writes:

> When we organized, there were thirty-five schools operating under the Gary Plan, with provision for extending it into seventy-one other schools, and in ten additions. This extension work was immediately stopped, and the funds available for altering the buildings will be used to improve these buildings for regular school work without any reference whatever to the Gary Plan.

At present, the Plan has been withdrawn from all the schools, except two. In these establishments, every effort will be made to give it a fair trial, and to reach, what has not yet been attained, "a satisfactory evaluation." One of the most objectionable features, that of specialization in the elementary grades, has been completely done away with in all the schools, while "shop work, cooking, sewing and elementary science are now reserved for the older pupils." Forced on the city as part of a political fight, the Gary Plan was almost foredoomed to failure. If treated by the present school administration as a plan worthy of careful study, the results may yet be found worth while.

Hedging Our Camps from Vice

THE War Department's Commission on Training Camp Activities calls public attention to the fact that the execution of its program for the maintenance of clean conditions surrounding military camps has reached a stage where its success must largely depend upon the whole-hearted support of our citizens. A particular appeal is therefore made by the National Catholic War Council to all its local councils, asking them to assist the Government to the utmost in its efforts to secure the best moral conditions for our soldiers and sailors. The more obvious evils, the Government Commission says, have been removed by the natural and patriotic enthusiasm of the camp communities, but serious and less spectacular work must now be undertaken to prevent the presence of dissolute women and other promoters of vice, and to render their access to the troops impossible. This, apparently, cannot be achieved without widespread and popular support. "The program of protection of the Navy and War Department," says the National Catholic War Council, "surely deserves the active support of all Catholic activities in and about camps."

Americanization of the Immigrant

PRESIDENT WILSON calls upon us to unite with the foreign-born Americans to make of Independence Day this year "the most significant in our national history." The Americanization of the immigrant who has not yet been assimilated into our national life is the great civic duty of the moment. While radical and compulsory methods are constantly proposed in our current literature, such as tend to alienate the foreigner and render his Americanization doubly difficult, it is to be noted that the Government has consistently held a sane and moderate course. Perhaps nothing finer has been said upon this subject, from the purely natural point of view, than the words spoken by Secretary Lane at the Americanization Conference in Washington:

> We are trying a great experiment in the United States. Can we gather together people of different races, creeds, conditions and aspirations, who can be merged into one? If we cannot do this we will fail; indeed we have already failed. If we do this we will produce the greatest of all nations, and a new race that will long hold a compelling place in the world. It is well, therefore, that we come together at such times of stress as this, and we should have come together long since and put our heads to the problems as to what are the initial steps in bringing about that harmony within our country which will give it meaning, purpose and cohesion.
> We should not be moved to this by fear. There is nothing to fear. Our wars have been fought by men of foreign birth—Irishmen and Germans, and Swedes and Scotchmen. We see their names every day in the list of those who are dead on the battlefields of France. There is no such thing as an American race, except the Indian. We are fashioned a new people. We are doing the unprecedented thing in saying that the Slav, Teuton, Celt, and the other races that make up the civilized world are capable of being blended here, and we say this upon the theory that blood alone does not control the destiny of man, that out of his environment, his education, the food that he eats, the neighbors that he has, the work that he does, there can be an ideal, a spirit, formed and realized, which will master his blood.
> Now there are several things which we have come upon recently which seem to those of us who have not been wise to be discoveries. The first is that we have a great body of our own people, five and a half millions, who cannot read or write the language of this country. That language is English. And these are not all of foreign birth. A million and a half are native-born. The second is that we are drafting into our army men who cannot understand the orders that are given them to read. The third is that our man power is deficient because our education is deficient. The fourth is that we ourselves have failed to see America through the eyes of those who have come to us. We have failed to realize why it was that they came here and what they sought. We have failed to understand their definition of liberty.
> To be an American is not to be the embodiment of conceit as to all things that are fundamental in America, or to be satisfied with things as they are, or to let things drift. We are taking a leaf out of Germany's book in many ways these days. Our ways of war must conform to her processes of destroying human life. She has made herself a composite, compact, purposeful nation by methods of education as well as by authority. We can make ourselves a composite, a purposeful nation, and impose no authority other than the compelling influence of affection, sympathy, understanding and education.
> Out of this conference should come not a determination to make more hard or difficult the way of those who do not speak or read our tongue, but a determination to deal in a catholic and sympathetic spirit with those who can be led to follow in the way of this nation, and as to those others who cannot, other procedure must be applied. The keynote of this conference is "our responsibility."

Catholics in particular should realize their responsibility in this matter. Many of these foreigners are of our own Faith and should receive from us all possible assistance in a temporal as well as in a spiritual way, that they may be made true citizens, and at the same time be preserved from the dangers and temptations which threaten the religious future of them and of their children and of our country itself.

Explanation of Government Insurance

HERE are some questions and answers selected from an official Government bulletin and explaining the main difficulties likely to suggest themselves in connection with the United States Government Insurance:

Q. Is Government Insurance the only protection furnished by the Government to its soldiers and sailors?

A. No. The Government has provided, in addition, compensation for death or injuries or diseases suffered in line of duty.

Q. The insurance, then, is in addition to compensation?

A. Yes; and they are entirely independent of each other.

Q. Who can be named as beneficiary?

A. Any one or more of the following may be named: Wife, husband, child, grandchild, brother, sister, adopted brother, adopted sister, stepbrother, stepsister, parent, grandparent or stepparent of the insured and parent, grandparent or stepparent of the insured's wife or husband. (No others can be named, although a bill is pending in Congress suggesting the inclusion in the permitted class of adopted father or mother or any person who for a certain period of years had stood in the place of a parent.)

Q. What benefits does this insurance give to the insured?

A. $5.75 per month for each $1,000 of insurance, payable in the event of total and permanent disability as long as the insured lives and is so disabled.

Q. What benefits does it give to my beneficiary?

A. In case of your death each $1,000 will pay to the beneficiary $5.75 per month for 240 months, less any payments made to the insured for total and permanent disability.

Q. Does it pay for death or total and permanent disability from illness as well as injury?

A. Yes.

Q. Must the injury or illness be suffered while in the service?

A. No; if you continue to pay premiums you are protected, even though you may leave the service.

Q. Can I carry my insurance after the war?

A. Yes; in its present form for a period of five years, but within such five years you must change it to another form, which can be done without regard to your then physical condition. No medical examination will be required for the change.

Q. Will the permanent insurance after the war continue to be Government insurance?

A. Yes.

Those who wish to avail themselves of this Government protection must apply within 120 days after they have entered the service. The persons qualified to apply are the commissioned officers, enlisted men (meaning a person, male or female, enlisted, enrolled, or drafted into active service in the military or naval forces of the United States, including non-commissioned and petty officers and members of training camps authorized by law) and female members of the Army or of the Navy Nurse Corps. The highest insurance obtainable is $10,000. More than 1,700,000 persons had applied for Government insurance up to April 12, 1918. The average amount applied for has been upward of $8,200.

Chronicle

The War.—The main theater of the fourth German offensive extended along the banks and down the valley of the Oise. After the usual heavy bombardment the Germans launched infantry attacks over the front from the River Avre at the little village of Rubescourt to the Oise at Noyon. Their object was to break down the southern side of the Montdidier salient, widen the angle, take Compiègne and then sweep around the forests which had been one of the main obstacles in their advance westward from the Marne. If this advance could be made along the western bank of the Oise, and if they could take Compiègne, the retirement of the French troops on the western bank would force the withdrawal of the other French army on the eastern bank and a strategic victory of the highest importance would have been won by the enemy.

Bulletin, June 10, p.m.-June 17, a.m.

The Germans centered their main efforts on their right, where the French, except in the west, held strong defensive positions. Between the Avre and Rollot the ground is level and presents serious difficulties to attacking troops. Beyond Rollot and between the Rollot plateau and the valley of the Matz River, the ground rises, as well as beyond the Matz Valley, and north of the Thiescourt Woods and the Divette River. The main German attack fell along the front from Couchy-les-Pots to Noyon. Under the initial impact of the enemy the first French lines, thinly held according to their present system, gave way. The enemy gained along this entire front although his furthest advance was in the center, the two wings holding fairly well. The main French line ran over the plateau through the little town of Orvillers, thence along the Thiescourt Woods and the slightly-rising ground of the southern bank of the Divette River. After a stubborn fight the Germans took Courcelles and Le Fretoy on the French right and almost reached the railroad which comes from Montdidier and then follows the Oise Valley to Paris. Subsequently, however, Courcelles was retaken by the French, who in another counter-attack drove the enemy out of Méry, where he had advanced his lines. In this attack the French took 1,000 prisoners.

In their attack on the center the Germans were more successful. They steadily fought their way down the valley of the Matz, and although they lost heavily, reached the village of Marquéglise at the bend of the Matz, a little south of Ressons-sur-Matz and slightly northwest of Compiègne. On the southern bank of the Matz the French made a vigorous stand, and although at one stage they were driven south as far as the River Aronde they counterattacked and drove the Germans back to the northern bank of the Matz. But the latter had moved troops eastward and spreading to the rear of the Thiescourt positions took the village of Antoval. This obliged the French here to withdraw and under cover of the forest of Ourscamp on the eastern bank of the Oise, they gave up the valley of the Divette and established a new line which ran west through Ribécourt.

On the eastern bank of the Oise the French line ran along the northeastern edge of the Carlepont Wood to the Oise, then along the Oise to Noyon. Previous German attacks against Carlepont Wood and Sempigny near the Oise had failed. But because of the French retirement on the western bank this position was reduced to a narrow salient with a dangerous apex at Sempigny. The French here again retired and straightened out their line through Ribécourt. In this section the offensive, except for a few local actions during the last days of the week, came to an end.

Checked on the Matz, and on the Rubescort-Ribécourt line in the Montdidier-Noyon section in their Compiègne drive, the Germans launched another offensive in order to flank the forest positions of Villers-Cotterets, Laigue and Compiègne from the Aisne southward. The attack centered between the Aisne and Villers-Cotterets. The French yielded under the first pressure and fell back across the ravine of Laversine, where the terrain is in every way more favorable for defensive warfare.

In the Château-Thierry region the Americans maintained the gains won last week and slightly added to them. In the Toul sector at Xivray they repelled heavy attacks.

On June 15 the Austrians launched a heavy offensive on a 100-mile front in Italy. From the Asiago Plateau west of the Brenta River to the Adriatic Sea, the Austrian guns suddenly opened a violent bombardment of the Italian positions, succeeded by infantry attacks. According to a statement made by Premier Orlando in the Italian Chamber of Deputies, from the Astico to the Brenta, from the Brenta to the Piave and along the Piave from the mountains to the sea, the enemy attacked the Allied lines in full force, but everywhere met with a stubborn resistance. Failure to hold their initial mountain gains was admitted by Vienna. West of the Brenta the Austrians evacuated the wooded zone of the Seven Communes, while east of the Brenta they withdrew from Rabero Mountain. The Italians regained ground between Mounts Solarola and Asolone. French and British troops are cooperating with the Italians.

The German U-boat raiders are still at large in our Atlantic coast waters and during the week sank a few ships. The ships sunk by them total twenty. With two small torpedo boats Captain Rizzo of the Italian navy, already distinguished for his daring exploit in sinking the Austrian battleship Wien in the harbor of Trieste, sank the Austrian dreadnought Szent Istvan of the Viribus Unitis 20,000-ton class as it was being heavily convoyed from Pola to a safer base at Cattaro. Another dreadnought was seriously damaged. This leaves Austria with only one of her most powerful battleships in seagoing condition.

The Siberian Problem

A council attended by Prince Fushimi, Field Marshal Yamagoto, Premier Terauchi, Lieutenant General Oshima, Minister of War, and others, was held in the General Staff Office at Tokio. The Entente Governments are bringing increasing influence to bear to induce Japan to interfere in Russia. Among the French officials who arrived in Tokio to consult with the General Staff is Major Pichon, former head of the French Military Mission to Russia, whose recall was demanded by the Bolsheviki. Major Pichon is striving for Japanese intervention in Russia with the same energy with which he formerly opposed the entrance of Rumania into the war on the side of the Entente as an ill-advised measure. He was formerly military attaché at Bucharest. Apparently Japan is at present reluctant to interfere in Russian affairs and to take any positive steps in Siberia, but the army is nevertheless undergoing the severest training. The partisans of intervention are strongly supported by Konovaloff, former Minister of Trade and Industry in the provisional Russian Government, and by Jules Destrée, who was appointed Belgian Minister to Petrograd in August, 1917. According to Mr. Destrée, it is urgently imperative for the defense of the interests of the Entente that there shall be a liberation of the Russian people from the German domination. The Trans-Siberian railroad is the only means of communication with the outside world, and this, according to Destrée, could at any time be destroyed by the German prisoners, of whom there are 20,000 under arms in Siberia.

One of the problems taken up at the Tokio Military conference was the increase of the army through increase of the divisional organizations. The war strength of a division is reckoned at 18,700 officers and men. The proposed plan would be to raise the number of divisions from nineteen to fifty. The present strength of the field army, exclusive of the Kobi or reserves, is estimated at 600,000 men.

Ireland.—A short time since Bishop Keating of Northampton delivered a remarkable speech at Jarrow, a great shipbuilding center of England. The oration which is remarkable alike for clearness and courage was printed in part by the London Universe as follows:

An English Bishop's Opinion

But at once I am up against a very sinister 'No-Popery' campaign. From the very first days of the war we English Catholics have been saddened and irritated by a No-Popery campaign, with its center in London and its ramifications right through the land in a certain section of the secular press, and with further ramifications in a very notable quarter, the anti-clerical press on the continent. We know and feel that this campaign has been manufactured by some malign hidden society that is determined to counteract as far as it can the manifest advances that the Catholic Church has made owing to the influence of the war. We know what the influence of the war has been in France; how the French army, which was composed originally for the most part of violent unbelievers, has turned to God and God's priests who are fighting shoulder to shoulder with them. And we know in our own armies the work of our chaplains; and the manifest effect of that work has been so marked, so eminently supernatural that many and many a young Protestant soldier has been made to feel that there must be something in this Catholic religion; and the No-Popery campaign is intended to drive away as far as possible the good effects that have been brought about by the devotion of the Church to the service of our armies.

The central figure, the target, at which all the shafts of malice have been directed has been the person of our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV. We Catholics, of course, understand the delicacy and the difficulty of the position in which he is placed. We Catholics know that, as the common Father of all the Faithful, as the Father of millions of Catholics on both sides, he must be impartial, he cannot declare for one side against the other side. We admire the love with which his heart has gone out towards his children without discrimination. There is no victim of the war that he has not thought of, that he has not relieved and cared for to the very best of his power. We Catholics thoroughly understand and thoroughly approve of the attitude of the Pope; but for these others of whom I have spoken he can do nothing right. If he holds his tongue it is guilty silence; if he speaks and pleads for peace it is pro-German influence. What is he to do? What can he do? Whether he acts, or whether he refuses to act, it is always possible for a malicious mind to imagine a base motive, and to twist whatever he does or whatever he fails to do into some false shape.

And now a new offensive is being launched against us on account of recent events in Ireland. The Irish Bishops have taken a very grave step. They have taken that step knowing well its gravity, knowing well the responsibility it casts upon them; and therefore they have associated their action with the most sacred moment of the religious life of their own people.

When we saw the reports in the papers of the action of the Irish Bishops with regard to conscription in Ireland, there is not the slightest doubt that English Catholics were very much astonished. Many were filled with alarm and consternation; many differed profoundly from the action the Irish prelates had taken; but it seems to me that it would be sheer impertinence on the part of the English Bishops, still more on the part of English laymen, to sit in judgment upon the action of the Irish Hierarchy. It is not our business either to acquit or condemn them. It is our business to try, as far as we can, to understand them; and I do not think we can understand them better than by following very briefly the course of events which has led up to this crisis.

The first dominant fact that we have to bear in mind is this: In 1914 the late Mr. John Redmond, God rest his soul, was able to stand up in the British Parliament and promise the Government the united support of all the Irish people of all creeds and of all politics; and he was able to back that up by filling rapidly the ranks of the Irish divisions that covered themselves with glory in the earlier stages of the war. Now, in 1918, all that enthusiasm has gone, and Ireland is discontented, sullen, and indifferent.

The second fact is that any of you can put your finger on the very event which marked the turning of the tide. It was that policy of reprisals in 1916 which was imposed upon Mr. Asquith by the London press against his own better feelings and against his own sounder judgment. Up to the moment that the Sinn Fein rebellion had been suppressed Ireland was indignant with Sinn Fein for its hot-headed proceedings, indignant also with regard to its attitude in respect to the war. But when the Irish people saw the blood of their fellow-countrymen flowing in streams, when they saw no mercy for the Sinn Feiner, though there was nothing but mercy for the Orangeman, then their indignation was blotted out in tears, and their heart was hardened against the cause of the men who had wrought these things upon their sons.

The third dominating fact is that in consequence of that change of feeling, Mr. Asquith himself, in introducing the first conscription bill, omitted Ireland from its provisions, and the whole country felt that he had done wisely and well. A few months later the Irish Convention appointed by the British Government asked a sub-committee of its own, consisting of three Unionist and two Nationalist members, to examine the question of conscription for Ireland. The sub-committee reported unanimously against the feasibility of introducing any such law. Still later, on the eve of the second conscription bill which Mr. Lloyd George felt bound to introduce (and I think we all ought to have very considerable sympathy with our Prime Minister, because he has a very difficult task to perform in resisting enemy attacks in the front and from the rear) in order to find more soldiers for the armies, or be unfaithful to those already fighting, and it was necessary for him to frame a more drastic measure than the earlier one, again the London press got to its fell work. It would make mischief if it could, and it therefore practically forced him to entertain the idea of including Ireland in the new bill. The Irish Bishops were sitting in committee, and they sent to him a resolution of warning, telling him that they knew their countrymen, they knew the state of feeling, and begged him not to be so mad as to attempt the impossible. But the die was cast; and in spite of warnings, in spite of maturer judgment, Ireland was included in the bill which was finally placed upon the statute book.

At once Ireland was ablaze. The Nationalist members, the politicians, not the priests, the leaders of all the sections of the national political parties in Ireland, went to the Bishops, for what purpose? That the Bishops might lash the agitation into greater fury? Nothing of the sort; but that, by the power that they exercised, and that none can exercise in Ireland but the clergy, they might keep this furious agitation in some sort of channel; if not in the channel provided by the law of the British Government, then at least in the channel provided by the law of God. That is the point I wish you to seize; that the Bishops did not rush into politics; they did not thrust themselves into this quarrel; they only answered a call that came to them from their children and from the representatives of their children, a call that they could not in conscience resist—a call that they have never failed to answer. If you know the Irish people as well as I do, you know that it is their habit to consult their priests in almost all the affairs of life, from the selling of a cow to the risking of their lives for faith and freedom.

Whether the Irish Bishops acted rightly or wrongly, whether they acted wisely or unwisely, the outstanding feature of the situation, as far as we are concerned, is this, that their line of action was exclusively their own. They did not seek either inspiration or authority from the Apostolic See. Cardinal Logue has said so. They did not come to the British Bishops or the Bishops of the Allied countries either for counsel, or sympathy, or for cooperation. I tell you so. Therefore, the British Bishops and the Bishops of the Allied countries have no more to do with the action of the Irish Bishops than the Labor party had; and I may say that, for myself, I am delighted to associate myself with the wise and generous terms in which the Labor party addressed the Premier a few days ago. Not for the first time when the other political parties have gone raving mad, the Labor party seems to have kept the counsels of sanity. . . . What do they expect to gain by the No-Popery cry? Is it a gain for them to alienate the whole Catholic body throughout the world? They talk, forsooth of withdrawing toleration from us. Toleration! My God, I thought England had outgrown that. Who asks for toleration? We do not. We imagined that England and America, above all the world, through many blunders and many crimes, had arrived at the principle, not of religious toleration, but of religious freedom; that every Church should be able to do its work for the souls of men without the pettifogging interference—let alone the violent repression—of any human government; that every individual should be free to follow his conscience; that there should be religious freedom for all. And now, because the Times is out of temper with us, the Times and its abettors threaten that the nation shall go back on its past and deprive us of religious freedom. That (snapping his fingers) for the Times!"

The Irish papers still continue their agitation against conscription. The trenchant Dublin Leader recently returned to the subject in these burning words:

Irish Opinion on Conscription

The English Government was mad when it fired conscription at Ireland, and unless it keeps being mad, and wild red mad at that, it will drop it. The debate and vote at the Council of Agriculture and the views expressed by the Vice-President of the Department are or ought to be if any sanity is left in the Government when it turns its red eyes on Ireland, so many nails in the coffin of conscription. The plain, blunt protest against conscription was carried by 66 to 10, but the amendment for which the ten voted was largely an anti-conscription one, as by calling on the English Government to have due regard for the requirements of agricultural labor it emphasized the labor difficulty. The resolution proposed by Mr. J. P. Farrell, M.P., was: 'That the Government having called upon Ireland to produce extra food for the supply of the people of Ireland and Great Britain and the country having responded to the extent of over an extra million acres of tillage, we, the Council of Agriculture, protest against the imposition of conscription on Ireland, which will deplete the supply of agricultural labor necessary to gather the harvest and perform the other agricultural work in connection with the production of extra food,' whilst the amendment called upon the Government 'to have due regard to the requirements of Irish agriculture as regards labor, both in the administration of the Military Service act and in the liberal granting of leave to soldiers from the agricultural districts to assist in the putting in and the harvesting of the crops at home.'

The Vice-President of the Department, a Scotchman, need not be suspected of any Irish national bias, but the facts of the agricultural situation compelled him to take a view 'pretty fairly outlined in Mr. Farrell's resolution.' The increase in tillage was such that 'already Ireland as a food producing and exporting country stands first amongst the nations of the world.' The question of labor was very serious from the first. The necessity for further labor kept pace with the increase of tillage. 'I look upon the call for conscription in Ireland,' said the Vice-President, 'from this chair solely and entirely in the light of its effect upon the labor supply for food production. We had barely labor sufficient for the last harvest. Some of the late crops were harvested with great difficulty. Since that time labor has been abstracted from Ireland by government demands in Great Britain. Thousands of men and women have been taken from Ireland by the labor exchanges for war work, and even in Ireland itself work of this character is daily abstracting hundreds, if not thousands, more. The situation then is a labor supply depleted by British demands and by the demands for war work in Ireland itself, face to face with a greatly increased tillage, which will demand many thousands more laborers than were employed last year. This is the situation which has to be met and solved, and I have discussed it with no human being who has not seen its gravity and its danger. And this is apart altogether from the state of feeling which would follow on conscription and which would be most injurious to the work of food production.'

After declaring that the Government has not, and had not "at the time of the recent debates on the Man Power Bill, any real intention of introducing, or passing, a Home Rule Bill, such as would offer the slightest hope of a settlement of the Irish national demand," a recent Nationalist statement goes on to say:

Propaganda in America

Meanwhile all the machinery of propaganda controlled by the British Government has been set in motion to blacken the name of Ireland in America, and to prejudice the American people and the American Government against the Irish nation. We feel it to be our duty as the elected representatives of the Irish nation to appeal most earnestly to the people of America and to the American Government not to be deceived by these propagandist misrepresentations, but to listen to the statement of Ireland's case coming from Irishmen in sympathy with the national aspiration of the people of Ireland, and qualified to speak on behalf of the Irish nation.

Russia.—The necessity of Allied intervention to save Russia from German domination has been earnestly urged in different quarters during the past week. Senator King of Utah, a Democrat who has strongly supported President Wilson's war-measures, offered in the Senate on June 10 these resolutions:

Intervention Urged

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States, that a commission be sent to Russia to cooperate with the American Ambassador and other representatives of our Government to overcome and neutralize German propaganda in Russia and to aid in Russia's economic, industrial and political freedom; and be it Further resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States that a military expedition be organized and sent by the United States of America, in conjunction with the Allies, including Japan and China, to cooperate with the armies of the Russian people to repel the advance of German arms and to expel from Russia German military power and establish therein the authority of the people and Government of Russia.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, but there are no signs as yet of any change in the non-interference policy of the Administration.

On June 11 the Russian Ambassador at Washington presented to the State Department a resolution unanimously adopted by the Central Committee of the Cadet or Constitutional party of Russia urging Allied intervention. The resolution runs:

We never recognized the condition of the Brest-Litovsk peace and consider that the disastrous situation in which they have placed Russia can only be ameliorated with the aid of the Allies.

The movement of the Germans on Russian soil, their perpetual seizure of new regions still continues, and there seems to be no limit to such occupation. Under such conditions we cannot refrain from appealing to our Allies, to whom we have frequently given proof of the loyalty of our feelings.

We proclaim our conviction that the appearance of a new, powerful factor on the scene of struggle undoubtedly will have a decisive bearing on the issues of the war and on the conditions of peace.

We can assure in the most conclusive manner that the information picturing that the Russian democracy does not approve of Allied aid is false. If such information has reached the President of the United States it must have originated from Bolshevist sources. The Bolsheviki in no way are representative of the Russian democracy. Their régime, a fictitious rule of democracy, is really oligarchy, demagogy and despotism, which at the present moment relies only on physical force and daily becomes more and more odious to the popular masses.

Nevertheless we consider it our duty to emphasize that the attitude of Russian public opinion toward Allied action is conditioned by the forms of its realization. Its success depends on the whole-hearted support of national feeling in Russia. It is furthermore imperative for Russian public opinion to receive assurances that the expedition will be coordinated with the inviolability of the rights and interests of Russia, and that the actions of all the Allies on Russian territory will be performed under international control.

The Cadet party is said to be the foremost intellectual organization in Russia, and appears to represent the most moderate element in the country.

The Czecho-Slovak troops operating against the Russian Soviet Government have been continuing their successes in Siberia and the Ural regions. The towns along 1,250 miles of the Siberian railroad are in their hands and they have cut off the grain that was flowing from Siberia into Moscow and Petrograd. At Novo Nicholaevsk the Szech-Slovaks overthrew the Soviets and set up a new Siberian Central Government. The Soviet Government, however, has arrested 300 plotters, among them many men of prominence. This counter-revolutionary movement for the overthrow of the Soviets is said to have extended its organization throughout Siberia and Central Russia and has for its object the establishment of a government standing for the national interest of Russia, reorganization of the army on the old basis, and continuation of the war against Germany with the support of the Allies.

Anti-Soviet Successes

Sharing Catholic Publicity with the Papers

MICHAEL WILLIAMS.

HAVING said in the first of these articles that I believed great good could be accomplished by the organization and operation of a really efficient Catholic press bureau, devoted to obtaining national publicity for Catholic news and Catholic ideas throughout the secular press, and also cooperating with the existing Catholic papers; and having in a second paper suggested ways and means by which such a bureau might carry on the apostolate of the press among secular periodicals, I propose in the present article to continue the general amplification of this most important subject.

First, I would desire to point out how such a bureau might cooperate with the existing Catholic papers—dropping, for the time, the consideration of that fascinating idea now again so much to the fore, namely, the proposal of a national Catholic daily. Generally speaking, it may, I think, be safely said that we have in the United States a Catholic weekly press which obviously could be improved, but which just as obviously, as it stands, is doing a great deal of good work.

An appreciation of realities is the first principle of all worth-while reforms. And the application of this principle to our present subject promptly shows us that sweeping condemnation of our Catholic press is as false and as foolish as self-satisfied, blind optimism. There is one school of thought which declares that it is the indifference of the Catholic laity which is the primary cause of the limited circulation, and weak influence, of our Catholic journals. There is another school which just as positively says that the laity is indifferent because the papers are so dull, so behind-the-date in their news, and so lacking in "pep." But these two schools simply cancel each other if they merely stand idly by, each singing its song of wo. Surely, Catholic thought is better employed, for all practical purposes, on the good, safe, middle ground between all extremes. On that middle ground, both these schools may come together, and profitably exchange their views. If they do so, each will say to the other: "Well, yes; you are partly right." The critics of the laity will say: "We admit that the fault does not lie wholly with the laity, with the Catholic public; and there really is much room for improvement in our press." The fair-minded spokesmen of the other school will just as freely confess: "Yes, we have been indifferent, and careless, and supercilious. It was, and is, our duty to support and promote the Catholic press. We have not been fair to those who have been carrying on that great work against such tough opposition as our own supineness has supplied. It is our business to recognize what is good and commendable in the Catholic press, and to lend a hand, not fitfully, and now and then, but consistently and constantly, to those who are trying to carry on one of the most needed and essential departments of Catholic social service, Catholic education, and Catholic culture."

With this concordat happily arrived at, the next question would be: "How, then, are we to set about the necessary business of building on what we possess, so that it may grow ever better and ever stronger?" And the answer to that question brings us back to our starting point: the proposed Catholic publicity bureau. In this, I think, would we have the instrument required. Nearly four years ago, when this idea of a Catholic publicity bureau first began to buzz in my bonnet, I went to some half a dozen writers in the city where I was then living, San Francisco, and said in substance: "You are a well-known and well-paid writer (or editor, as the case happened to be), for the secular press. But also, happily for yourself and for the world you live in, you are a Catholic. Would you not give something to the Catholic press? Would you not, for example, give one article, or editorial, or poem, or book-review, or short-story, or essay, to some central Catholic agency, if that agency would distribute your work for simultaneous publication in all the Catholic weekly papers?" And they all said, most heartily: "Yes, indeed!" But nothing further was done. Nothing more could be done. I suggested the idea to AMERICA, which gave it publication, and there the matter rested for the time. There was no machinery in existence to carry it out.

But suppose we had the proposed press bureau in working order. Remember what we have already agreed upon as to this bureau, namely, that its core, its nucleus, should be a body of well-paid professional editors and writers, clerical and lay, men and women, devoted exclusively to the work of the bureau. Would not such a practical, dignified, professional organization, endorsed, of course, by the Hierarchy, earning the respect and consideration of non-Catholic editors and publishers, also obtain and retain the good-will and assistance of scores and scores of Catholic reporters, Catholic writers, Catholic editors and publicists of various degrees, who cannot give up their own positions, or their own work, but who would most heartily contribute something to the work of the bureau?

These voluntary contributions, for which, too, the bureau would constantly reach out, suggesting subjects, proposing ideas, reminding writers of their promises, as only a wide-awake, efficient organization could do, would insure, together with the material supplied by the writers of the bureau itself, a constant output of a vital, and timely, and highly interesting flow of live Catholic material.

The existing Catholic papers should be the distributing points for this flow of live matter. Instead of printing stuff belatedly clipped from each other, each paper would receive from the bureau up-to-date, well-written, illustrated news-letters, articles, stories, verse, book-reviews and similar material. Each would continue to gather and deal with the local news in its own local fashion, according to the methods each editor finds best adapted for his own region. But with a constant, dependable flow of authoritative, well-written, well-edited national news coming in each week from New York and Washington, and special letters from Rome, or Dublin, or London, or Paris, and, by and by, let us hope, from Berlin and Vienna, too, and with good articles and high-grade fiction and verse by the best Catholic writers in the country—why, would there not be a great improvement effected immediately in practically all our Catholic weekly journals?

Moreover, there is the telegraph wire, as well as the mail service. The bureau, being always open, always working, would when occasion demanded it send out important news or views to its subscribers all over the country, if such news or views developed too late for the mail service. Then, as, here and there, in the larger cities, the best of the weeklies began to appear twice or thrice in the week, the service of the bureau would keep pace with the expanding requirements. Eventually the long-hoped-for daily might in this way be developed, instead of being arbitrarily created. We might in time have a string of such daily papers from the Atlantic to the Pacific, each attending to its local territory, but linked up for national news and national views with the central bureau.

Would editors welcome such a service? For my part, I cannot see why they should not, provided, of course, that the service offered them is commensurate with the ideas we have discussed. But why should not the editors speak for themselves on this point? Why should this vital discussion be confined to AMERICA? I am certain that AMERICA does not desire to monopolize the subject. Let us hear from the editors of the country.

I think I already hear one of the first of the questions that would naturally come up in any practical discussion of this subject. What about money? What would such a service cost each paper? What would it cost the bureau to supply it? Well, I am not a business man; so I cannot be an authority here; but I would say, with all my heart: Let us not be scared by the money ghost! Quite frankly, voicing my personal opinion, I think that the bureau ought not to be run on a basis of profit, as a business. It should, of course, be run in a business-like manner, but not as a business; not as a means for a group of men to make profits. It ought to be subsidized. It ought to be sure of an ample yearly income, enough to carry on its work without being forced to make a profit or cease its work. Then it could afford to sell its service to the Catholic weeklies for a small sum or even give it free. The thing to be accomplished here is to spread Catholic truth, not to make money by dealing over the counter with Catholic truth. I believe that the Catholic weeklies would, and could, and should, pay a suitable sum for good live matter, and that the secular press in many instances would also be glad to pay for some of the material supplied to it. But, and this point I believe to be vital, the work itself should be made independent of the problem of profits. An annual collection in all dioceses, such as is taken up, for instance, to help maintain the Catholic University; or the building up of a national Catholic press league of contributing members of various classes; together with a frank and quite ruthless assault upon the pocketbooks of some of our wealthy Catholics —such are some of the practical means which suggest themselves.

The Centenary of a Great Astronomer

A. L. CORTIE, S.J., F.R.A.S.

THE enemies of the Faith are never tired of repeating that the Catholic Church is an obstacle to the progress of science. The falsity of this charge is proved by the fact that so many of her devoted children, real practical Catholics, have been eminent in every branch of science. Not only laymen, but priests, too, and religious, whose aim in life was to teach others the way to heaven, found time to advance purely natural knowledge. Copernicus was a priest and a canon; Mendel was priest and abbot; Stensen was a bishop, and Linacre became a priest late in life. These are persons, even if they existed alone, whose claims to recognition among the great men of science no one will deny. Our late Pontiff, Pope Leo XIII, in a letter addressed to the members of the scientific society of Brussels, exhorted them to apply themselves to piety and to science so as "to prove that there never can exist any real opposition between science and religion." Such was the life work of Angelo Secchi, priest and religious of the Society of Jesus, eminent as an astronomer, among the most eminent of his day, and leading the life of a humble, obedient and devoted son of St. Ignatius.

He was born at Reggio, in Aemilia, Italy, a town situated between Parma and Modena, on June 18, 1818. His father was a joiner, Antonio Secchi; his mother, also a member of the middle class, whose maiden name was Louise Belgieri, was pious and practical. Under her care the future eminent astronomer learnt sewing and knitting. At an early age the boy Angelo was sent to the College of the Society of Jesus, which was established in his native town. He was an apt pupil, both in spiritual and in secular learning, especially distinguishing himself in Greek literature. But God was calling him to his special service, and accordingly on the completion of his college course he entered the novitiate of the Society of Jesus in Rome, on November 3, 1833, being in his sixteenth year. After completing his two years of noviceship he passed to the famous Roman College, with which his name was to be identified so intimately and so illustriously in future years. The first course he followed was one of higher literature, after the completion of which he entered upon his philosophical studies, which comprised a period of three years. It was at this stage of his training that Secchi showed the particular bent of his genius. For among the courses in philosophy was one on physics and mathematics. So great was the aptitude and talent displayed by Secchi that, though he was a student himself, he was selected to assist his professor in his courses at the College of Nobles.

It would appear that, on the completion of his course of philosophy, Secchi commenced his own career as a teacher by taking a class in grammar at the Roman College, although he also acted as a tutor in mathematics and physics. The following year, 1841, however, saw his transfer as a professor in these subjects to the College of Loretto. His teaching was distinguished by conciseness and clarity in exposition. In 1844 he returned to the Roman College to commence the study of theology, under that galaxy of talented professors, Passaglia, Perrone, Patrizi and Antonio Ballerini, who occupied the chairs of the Gregorian University. He was ordained priest by Monsignor Canali on September 12, 1847. But his theological studies were rudely interrupted when the revolution in Rome, in 1848, drove Secchi and the other Jesuits into exile and forced them to quit their native land. In a godless revolution the Jesuit, whose special work is the instruction of youth in holiness of life as the foundation of secular learning, is always on the losing side. Proscription and persecution are his lot.

With several other Fathers, among them a famous director of the Roman College Observatory, de Vico, whose eulogy in the "Monthly Notices" of the Royal Astronomical Society was written by that eminent astronomer, Sir John Herschel, he came first to England and resided at Stonyhurst College. Here he devoted himself during the few months of his stay to the study of mathematics. But Stonyhurst may claim the honor of having initiated the future great astronomer into the study of the heavens. The Stonyhurst Observatory had been founded in 1838, and at the time of Secchi's arrival the director was Father Weld, and the chief telescope the institution possessed was a four-inch equatorial, which is now mounted as a finder on the 15-inch equatorial which stands in its present state as a memorial to another distinguished Jesuit astronomer, the late Father Perry. This was the instrument with which Father Weld showed Secchi some of the glories of the heavens and excited in him that enthusiastic devotion to astronomy which was to remain with him throughout his life.

De Vico, astronomer and musician, for he is the composer of the responses and antiphons for Tenebræ which are still sung at Stonyhurst, died in London at the early age of forty-three. His death was undoubtedly hastened by the sufferings he had endured when driven into exile by the revolution. His chief assistant at the Roman College observatory, Father Sestini, had gone to the Georgetown University, Washington, D. C. Thither Secchi, with twenty-one of his companions in exile, followed him, sailing from Liverpool on October 24 and arriving in New York on November 19, 1848. At Georgetown, Secchi, while teaching the elements of natural science, found time and occasion to pursue his astronomical studies, with the help of the director of the observatory, Father Curley.

In 1849, on the restoration of peace in the Eternal City, Father Secchi was recalled to Rome by the General of the Society, to succeed the late Father de Vico as director of the Roman College Observatory. Of his work we shall speak in a separate article. But it was motived by an ardent desire to advance the greater glory of God and the honor of the Church and of the Holy See. Let him speak for himself: "To whisper to oneself how magnificent it is to reveal the works of the Creator: this is a stimulus which lasts when all other motives fail. It raises the human intellect above the dryness of mere figures, and produces from such labors a work which is lofty—nay, Divine." Honors and distinction were showered upon him as his fame spread throughout the whole of the civilized world. He was decorated with the Cross of the Legion of Honor by the Emperor of France and with the Order of the Rose of Brazil by the Emperor of Brazil. But he remained ever a humble religious, devoted to the interests of the Church. This thought of loyalty to the cause of religion and of Holy Church was one that most consoled him on his deathbed. "Oh," he exclaimed to one who visited him in his last illness, "if you only knew what comfort I feel in dying, after having spent my life in the service of the Church." It helps us to understand his amazing energy and activity in the pursuit of science and the volume of work he was enabled to produce. At the observatory one of the first astronomers of his day, at the university a professor, and yet he was commissioned in addition by the Papal Government to measure a geodetic base-line, extending over an arc of two degrees between Rome and Rimini; to design and superintend the erection of lighthouses on the coasts of the States of the Church, and even to advise as to the schemes for the water supply for several Roman towns.

The beginning of Secchi's scientific career was conditioned by the revolution of 1848; its end was to be saddened by that of 1870, since which time the Vicar of Jesus Christ on earth has become the Prisoner of the Vatican. The observatory of the Roman College had a world-wide reputation, and Secchi was probably the foremost scientific man at the time in Italy. His religious brethren were proscribed, but special exemptions were made in his case by the Italian Government, so as to retain him in the post which he occupied with so much distinction. He consented to remain, but with his allegiance to the Holy See unimpaired. He was tempted with the offer of the general supervision of all the Italian observatories, and even with the granting of the senatorial dignity, with express release from the constitutional oath. But he would have none of these things.

Father Secchi, said Pope Pius IX, when sending him his special blessing on his deathbed, has always known how to unite science with religious virtue, but the two virtues which shone most in him were humility and obedience. We know how often he was urged to accept honors and employments from the Italian Government, but he would never accept them. He always came to Us for counsel and advice, and never took a step without first hearing what was Our opinion. Truly he has been an excellent religious.

Father Secchi suffered from a malady of long duration, which finally killed him, and in the last years of his life he was compelled to abandon active observatorial work, though he still continued to direct the activities of his assistants. In the second week of January, 1878, he was obliged to take to his bed. On January 23 he received Holy Viaticum. In his last illness he seemed to have lost all thought except for the things of God, and his piety, humility, resignation and patience under suffering edified all who came in contact with him. He lingered until February 26, 1878, when he expired, at the age of fifty-nine years and three months, his last words being an act of thanksgiving to God for the great favor of dying in the bosom of the Church and in the Roman College, sanctified by the death of the angelical St. Aloysius. He had lived forty-four years of his life as a Jesuit. He wished his Cross of the Legion of Honor to be hung on the tomb of St. Aloysius and his insignia of the Order of the Rose of Brazil to be offered at the shrine of St. Ignatius. His obsequies were celebrated in the Church of St. Ignatius, the body resting in front of the altar between the four columns which support the dome, upon one of which the observatory, the scene of his life-long labors, rose above the coffin of the humble religious. Altar and observatory: here we have the epitome of the life of Angelo Secchi.

It is a life that makes for truth and holiness, for holiness by its bright example of humility and obedience, and for truth in its testimony that science is not the monopoly of materialism and rationalism, but is compatible with a deep faith in the truths of revealed religion and the teachings of the Catholic Church.

The Psychology of Religious Doubt

J. D. Tibbits

IT is a rather curious fact that the psychology of religious doubt should obtain its fullest treatment at the hands of writers of fiction. It is scarcely less curious that the widespread interest which the subject seems to evoke is so little confined to religious people. Those who have no theological convictions of their own seem specially concerned with the doubts of those who have. The indifferentist loses his indifference as soon as it becomes a question of some one else's faith. Of these truths we have abundant illustrations, two of which are of such special prominence that they may be fairly considered as types of all the rest. One of these is the marked success which attended the now somewhat historic "Robert Elsmere," the other, the latest novel of Mr. H. G. Wells. Both are alike in that each depicts a character who begins with orthodox religion and subsequently discards it; and in each instance the process is not without interest, and certainly not without suggestiveness. The interest, of course, lies largely in the dramatic setting, coupled with a distinct charm of literary style. The suggestiveness is generally believed to lie in the real or imaginary difficulties which are supposed to be urged against traditional Christianity. As a matter of fact, however, it lies in the mere vulgarity of a misunderstanding. It is true that these difficulties are oftentimes destructive to that which their authors conceive as orthodox religion, but they are destructive to orthodox religion only as their authors conceive it. And it is because the bare foundations of the faith are so invariably misconceived by those who seem most concerned to destroy them, that it may not be amiss to direct attention to a distinction of which they have apparently lost sight, but which is, nevertheless, of such vital importance as to render valueless any treatment of the subject that fails to recognize and comprehend it.

If we analyze, ever so briefly, the conceptions which these various writers of fiction quite unconsciously put forth under the label "Orthodox Christianity," we shall find that whatever be their individual differences, they yet have one point in common. That one point is the ultimate and final basis upon which they rest. This appears to be invariable and without exception; and it is best summed up in the word "impressionism." Now it is evident, indeed, that to Protestantism of all shades and degrees, no other basis is possible. It is quite the same whether we are considering the religion of Dr. Pusey or the religion of Mrs. Mary Baker Eddy. But it is equally evident that impressionism, whatever form it may assume, carries with it no guarantee of stability; in fact, if experience counts for anything, it carries with it a fairly reasonable guarantee of instability. A religious system, therefore, thus founded, will persist only as long as its basic impressions persist. As soon as other impressions invade and displace them there will ensue a corresponding change in the religion itself. That this change may appear more or less in conformity with reason is not at all to the point. It will remain impressionism just as long as it remains Protestantism; and will be quite as liable to subsequent displacement as that which it had itself displaced.

The history of Protestantism has been a continuous and consistent illustration of this fact, though much of it has doubtless been unconscious, and even more of it obscured. Whatever else the Reformation may or may not have been, it was essentially and above all things a surrender of the reason to the feelings. It is evident enough that a movement of this kind meant nothing less than a cataclysm in theology, though it is important to remember in precisely what sense this was true. The fact of Martin Luther differing from the Church of Rome in the interpretation of a text is a matter of some importance. But the fact of his abandoning the principle of authority, the only principle which imparts rationality to religion, is a matter the importance of which cannot be overestimated. It was not merely the attempt at the logically impossible; it was the poisoning of the wells in which religion finds its very source. And no matter how cleverly or how plausibly a theological system might be erected upon such a foundation it is manifestly impossible for it to escape the absurdity which, however latent, was none the less implicit in its origin.

Yet, once such a system is established, the entire aspect of the question is changed. To prefer an irresponsible impression to the authority of the Church is, both logically and theologically, absurd. But to prefer one impression to another is not only no inconsistency, but is, in a rational sense, wholly a matter of indifference. While, therefore, the act of Luther in differing from Rome strikes at the basis of all reasonable religion, the act of Dr. Lyman Abbott, for example, in differing from Luther, is but the legitimate consequence of Luther's own act. So that, while we may truthfully say that Protestantism was born of inconsistency, we cannot justly charge it with inconsistency in its development; indeed we may not unfairly say that the more radically it changes the more consistent it is, and that there can be no result, however seemingly absurd, which was not implied in its beginnings.

Still, however apparent all this may be to those who give the matter an even moderate degree of thought, it seems wholly obscured in the eyes of those writers of fiction who have essayed to deal with the question. They are evidently deluded into the belief that there is something in the religious experiences of such a type as Robert Elsmere or the Bishop in Mr. Wells's book far more profound than the mere changing of an impression, or they fall into the no less absurd error of imagining a mere changing of an impression of sufficient importance to write a book about. They forget that they are dealing with a mental process so ordinary as to make one sometimes wonder that it is not more ordinary than it is. It is surely far from surprising that religious impressions are as changeable as they are, though it is often very surprising that they are as permanent as they are. Men are proverbially liable to change their minds. That they should stop at religion, amidst the peculiar conditions which Protestantism has created, is hardly to be expected. The curious part of it all is the inexplicable idea that one can escape being an impressionist by simply changing an impression; and the failure to see that the basic principles alike of the old theology and the new are identical.

It is in the light of these facts that the distinction between religious experiences of value and those of no value becomes clear. By it we can readily understand why the experiences of such men as Martin Luther and Cardinal Newman were eminently worth recording. The one was a sort of mental topography of the part which led from reason to impressionism; the other of the converse path which led from impressionism to reason. But the path which leads only from one impression to another is far too unimportant and far too personal to possess even the elements of theological value. It begins nowhere, and it ends nowhere. No matter with what interest the cleverness of contemporary writers may invest it, it can never be transformed into a real contribution to religious thought.

The Possibilities of Cooperation

JOSEPH HUSSLEIN, S.J.

THE cooperative bank and the cooperative store have met with undeniable success. They have long ago passed the period of mere trial and fully answer the purpose for which they were established. The question of main importance is the extension of the cooperative principle to the field of production. Its most complex and difficult application is found in the cooperative ownership and management of industrial enterprises.

The cooperation here considered is entirely voluntary, and neither communistic nor Socialistic, since it is based upon the private and not upon the public or communal ownership of the instruments of production. These are to belong to the men who operate them according to the individual shares that each one possesses in the cooperative enterprise. To prevent deterioration into the old abuses of capitalism the number of shares that could be held by any individual would obviously be strictly limited, so that ownership of the means of production could not be absorbed by a few more powerful, more clever or more unscrupulous members. The old gildsmen wisely understood that it is by such means only that the greatest happiness and prosperity of the greatest number can be assured and social stability and contentment secured.

In opposing the private ownership of capital, such as would likewise be maintained in this plan by the workingmen, Socialists often refer to the communism of the early Christian Church. They fail to mention that this was not universal, but purely local; that no mention is made of communistic productive enterprises operated by the early Christians; that even in the localities where a certain form of communism existed it always remained purely voluntary and no one was obliged to participate in it as a condition for embracing Christianity; and finally that after all it was a complete economic failure, like practically every other communistic or Socialistic enterprise. The only notable exception has been the communism of the Religious Orders of the Church. The latter is possible because it is based upon the threefold vows of poverty, chastity and obedience, and is centered in the love of God.

That productive cooperation in itself is not impracticable must be manifest to all from its successful application upon the land, where both production and distribution are frequently managed cooperatively. Thus in the Netherlands alone 66,600,000 pounds of butter were produced by cooperatives in 1910, and only 27,500,000 pounds by private manufactories. Many other products are cooperatively prepared on the land for general marketing, as varied in their nature as cheese, bacon and wine. Both purchasing and selling are done cooperatively, to the exclusion of the middleman and the great gain of the farmer. Similarly the larger and more intricate machinery is cooperatively owned. In Italy Catholic cooperative societies have rented even the land. "Often machinery, oxen and utensils are owned in common," we are told by Borosini. "The harvest is often sold in advance to cooperative societies in a neighboring town." The cooperatives are jointly responsible for the rent, and the necessary assurance is given by financially well-established Catholic societies. It may surprise many to learn that the products cooperatively bought and sold by the American farmers themselves amounted to $1,400,000,000 during the year 1915.

To illustrate the democratic, or better still, the Christian ideal that can be attained under cooperation we shall quote from the article on "The Meaning of Cooperation," by Cruise O'Brien in the Irish Monthly, for November, 1917. He is describing the cooperative creamery whose members unite to own the means of turning the milk produce of their farms into butter, and of marketing it to the best advantage:

> Here [as in the cooperative store] we have the same rule as to open membership, although it would be much more profitable for the members of a creamery to close their share list when they were strong enough; and although, indeed, it often involves a certain sacrifice on their part to keep their membership open to newcomers at a time when the original members have borne the heat and burden of the day. Here, also, we have a rule limiting the amount of shares which the member may hold and limiting the interest which he may receive on his share capital.
> Each member is paid for his milk at regular intervals, usually each month, and is given, to begin with, a price less than the value it will ultimately fetch as a manufactured article. The difference in value is made up at the end of the year, and represents what is called a dividend, as in the case of the cooperative store, but what is really the deferred payment, just as in the cooperative store the so-called dividend is really a saving.
> Finally, the cooperatively organized producer in his creamery provides for a bonus to his employees, just as the cooperatively organized consumer in his store.

As outlined, this system of cooperation contains all the idealism of brotherhood. Like all things human it will doubtless have its weaknesses and its faults, yet it approximates most closely to the Christian spirit.

But we now come to the most crucial question of all. Granting that cooperation is practical in other fields, can the same be said of the cooperative ownership of industries in our cities? The difficulty can best be stated in the words of Dr. Ryan, where he speaks of the "perfect" form of productive cooperation, the only one considered here. He defines it as that form in which "all the workers engaged in a concern own all the share capital, control the entire management, and receive the whole of the wages, profits and interest." Writing of conditions as they existed before the war, he says:

> In this field the failures have been much more numerous and conspicuous than the successes. Godin's stove works at Guise, France, is the only important enterprise of this kind that is now in existence. Great Britain has several establishments in which the workers own a large part of the capital, but apparently none in which they are the sole proprietors and managers. The "labor societies" of Italy, consisting mostly of diggers, masons and bricklayers, cooperatively enter into contracts for the performance of public works, and share in the profits of the undertaking in addition to their wages; but the only capital that they provide consists of comparatively simple and inexpensive tools. The raw material and other capital is furnished by the public authority which gives the contract. ("Distributive Justice," p. 223.)

Yet, as Dr. Ryan is ready to admit, the obstacles in the way of industrial cooperation, such as the risks to be encountered and the need of considerable capital and directive ability, are not insuperable. What has been accomplished upon the land may gradually likewise be widely accomplished in the city, although the difficulties will often be considerably greater. The practical workings of such a cooperative enterprise are thus described by Cruise O'Brien:

> A number of people, who are, say, bootmakers by trade, form themselves into a cooperative society in order to carry on their work. The people who actually make the boots are the owners of the society. They elect their committee from among themselves; they provide capital, and instead of, as one might expect, taking all the profits for themselves, they divide the profits between labor, capital and purchasers. Their other rules have exactly the same features as we have noted in the other two types of society which we have touched on (i.e., the cooperative store and the cooperative creamery).

The difficulties in the way of cooperative production are in the first place the large sums of capital required in many instances. Yet we know that billions of dollars have actually been handled annually in the cooperative banks of a single country. Thus the Schulze-Delitzsch popular urban banks had 939 banks affiliated to their national federation, and there were ninety-six non-affiliated banks. According to a pamphlet issued by the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, the business transacted by these cooperative banks in Germany during 1910 amounted to no less than $3,231,801,035. Yet besides these banks there existed the rural cooperative Raiffeisen system. The management of the former banks was conducted along strict business lines. Though the immense sums referred to did not pass through any single hand, yet the existence of the National Federation shows a completely developed organization.

The second difficulty is that of cooperative management. Here again we have the example of the Cooperative Wholesale Society of Manchester whose sales per year had risen to $150,000,000 before the war, and were increasing at the rate of $5,000,000 annually. Few mercantile establishments in the entire world have ever done so large a business. Yet the society never borrowed and had money to lend. The wholesale society was made up of membership from the retail societies in a definite proportion, and the latter apparently took out one five-dollar share for each member. In reference to the management, it will be well to quote the report regarding it drawn up some years ago by the United Mine Workers of America:

> The business of the wholesale cooperative societies is managed by thirty-two directors, elected by the local societies. These directors give their entire time, at a salary of $1,750 per annum. It is almost unthinkable for the average American business man to consider a proposition of this kind: thirty-two men, coming up from the ranks of ordinary consumers, by popular election, conducting an enormous business more economically than the large establishments of trade in England, and giving their best efforts entirely for the motive of rendering good service and securing a comfortable salary, with the honor that goes with a public service efficiently performed. We should judge from what we learn that these directors are more devoted to their business than the ordinary business man. Their efficiency cannot be challenged.

These are interesting facts. With all this said, however, we cannot fail to realize the vast difference between these enterprises, which are creditors and consumers' plants, and cooperative production as exemplified in the self-governing workshop. Even under cooperation it is more than possible that one class of workers may oppress and exploit another if religious principles are set aside.

Yet one point must be borne in mind: that cooperative production, though presenting many difficulties into which we cannot enter here and which have long prevented it from attaining to undoubted success like other cooperative enterprises, may in the future be carried on more auspiciously under Government aid and oversight, so far as this may be required. A true religious spirit, such as the Catholic Church could infuse into the entire movement, would certainly lead to success. Progressive taxation of incomes, limitation in the future purchasing of shares, definite regulations regarding the shares of those who no longer are actively engaged in their respective industries, stability of prices to prevent the evils of excessive competition, and other similar methods, might yet make of cooperation the system which may become the leading factor in social reconstruction. In all probability it will coexist with other forms of ownership, both public and private, and a more perfect Government regulation.

Cooperative production differs essentially from Socialism in every regard. It is based upon the private ownership of capital by all the workers, in place of depriving them all alike of this benefit. It is purely constructive in its nature while Socialism is mainly destructive and revolutionary. It is not dependent on confiscation, on political machination or even upon the ballot, but must obtain its recognition solely through superior efficiency and the rightful Government protection. Where the Socialist promises, the cooperator acts.

Religious Rights and Supreme Court Opinions

MICHAEL KENNY, S.J.

WHEN the Civil War was over appeals crowded before the Supreme Court, asserting national jurisdiction in matters deemed previously within State control, and frequently securing it. One of these was based on every citizen's constitutional right to religious liberty, as had been the Permoli appeal; but now with different results. The Missouri legislature of 1865 was extreme in its loyalty, and exacted more loyalty than many conscientious citizens could give. As a consequence, Father Cummings of St. Louis appealed, in 1866, as had Father Permoli of New Orleans in 1844, against a provision of the new Missouri constitution under which he had been fined and imprisoned for exercising his priestly functions. The preliminary rumblings of the Fourteenth Amendment had reached the judicial ear, and Justice Field, voicing the majority of the Court (4 Wall, 332), reversed the judgment of the Supreme Court of Missouri, on the ground that the provision was "in conflict with the Constitution of the United States." But the dissenting opinion is more instructive of the change in ideas. Justice Miller said (4 Wall, 398):

> If there ever was a case calling upon this Court to exercise all the power which properly belongs to it, it was the case of Rev. B. Permoli. . . . This Court said it could give him no relief. In this case the constitution of the State of Missouri . . . declares that no priest of any Church shall exercise his ministerial functions unless he will show by his own oath, that he has borne a true allegiance to his government. This Court now holds this constitutional provision void, on the ground that the Federal Constitution forbids it. I leave the two cases to speak for themselves.

They do. The "Sovereign State" had fallen, and national sovereignty was rising on its ruins. Chief Justice Chase, who denied jurisdiction in the Cummings case, exercised far wider jurisdiction two years later in Texas v. White. During the hearing of that appeal the Fourteenth Amendment was enacted, sustaining and declaring in their full implication, the great principles of the 1787 ordinance and giving or renewing ample jurisdiction for their enforcement. The Enabling Act, which since 1864 exacts of every new State that it embody in its constitution that ordinance's main principles, and always the religious liberty provisions, are declarative of the mind of Congress that these principles do, and must, prevail.

But in regard to religious liberty, the ordinance has a force beyond that which it exercises in the constitutions that incorporate it. It proves the mind and meaning of the enactors of the First Amendment, that "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." This was the ground of appeal by a Utah Mormon in Reynolds v. White (98 U. S., 162); and in order to ascertain "what is the religious freedom which has been guaranteed," Chief Justice Waite decided that its meaning must be found in "the history of the time in the midst of which the provision was adopted." Wherefore he proceeds to explain in historical sequence that discontent with religious exactions by the colonial governments and by some States prior to the Constitution's adoption, had culminated in Virginia, and that there Jefferson and Madison drafted and had enacted a "Bill of Religious Freedom" within a year of the United States Constitutional Convention. Justice Waite traces further the influence of these leaders and of the Virginia Convention in securing the First Amendment, and decides that, in scope and in terms, the Amendment meant what they had intended it to mean.

"Virginia had recommended as an amendment to the Constitution . . . that 'all men have an equal, natural and unalienable right to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of their conscience.'" Madison, who had "demonstrated that 'religion or the duty we owe our Creator' was not within the cognizance of civil government," presented the amendment, which "met the views of the advocates of religious freedom"; and Jefferson, who had declared that "religion lies solely between man and his God" and that man "owes account to none other for his faith or his worship" and "it is time enough for civil government to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and order," hailed "with sovereign reverence that act of the whole American people." Chief Justice Waite concludes (98 U. S., 164): "Coming as this does from an acknowledged leader of the advocates of the measure, it may be accepted almost as an authoritative declaration of the scope and character of the amendment."

But it was the same "acknowledged leader" who drafted the 1787 ordinance and who in the original draft of 1784 had inserted the identical clause of religious freedom which in the same year he wrote into the Virginia Bill; and the Congress that passed the Amendment was the same that enacted the ordinance. Now, this ordinance proclaims its purpose to "Extend the principles of civil and religious liberty," and to provide for the admission of States "on an equal footing with the original States"; and, to accomplish this purpose, it ordains as an unalterable Article of Compact that no peaceable person "shall ever be molested on account of his mode of worship or religious sentiments." Intrinsically, the words "extend" and "equal footing" connote the same religious liberty in the original States which these as a national Government prescribed forever to the new; but, as a key to the mind of the first Congress, the ordinance is more firmly decisive than that action of a single State and those personal views of Jefferson which carried authority with Chief Justice Waite. It is a national document, written by Jefferson's own hand and guided by him and his friends into national enactment; and, therefore, it is still more surely "an authoritative declaration of the scope and character of the Amendment" which the same leaders, at the same time proposed and enacted to extend and forever establish religious liberty.

Referring to Chief Justice Waite's exposition, Justice Field, in Davis v. Beason (133 U. S., 342), embodies its purport in his statement that the First Amendment is not merely prohibitive, but also "was intended to allow every one under the jurisdiction of the United States . . . to exhibit his sentiments in such form of worship as he may think proper, not injurious to the rights of others"; i. e., such worship as included "no actions regarded by general consent as properly the subject of punitive legislation." This construction is further established by "uniform practice long continued," the great Justinian law of custom on which Chief Justice Waite based his suffrage decision in Minor v. Happerset (21 Wall, 162). Suffrage uniformity then extended to ninety years; uniformity of religious liberty now extends to one hundred and thirty, the full period of our constitutional life; and meanwhile, it has been repeatedly restated and enforced in law and treaty and compact regarding every State, territory, possession and person under the Union flag.

Hence it is clear that the Constitution regards freedom of religious worship as among the unabridgeable "privileges and immunities" of every citizen, and also his inalienable right; that its jurisdiction for the maintenance thereof applies equally to the old States and the new, and, therefore, "in this country," as Justice Brewer expressed it (143 U. S., 465), "no purpose of action against religions can be imputed to any legislation, State or national." Hence, also, the Permoli decision and its like prior to 1860 were unconstitutional, in so far as they denied the United States the right to protect rights fundamental and inalienable and to enforce its compacts and guarantees therefor. Since the Civil War the national judiciary has uttered no such judgment (as the Permoli). On the contrary, the Supreme Court has, in regard to religious liberty, sustained that provision of the Fourteenth Amendment which put an end not only to what Hannis Taylor calls the "solecism of a government without citizens," but to the equally ridiculous conception of authority at once paramount and powerless, and of solemn compacts dissolvable by the very acts that solemnize and seal them.

Constitutionally, religious liberty is safe in State and nation. The Supreme Court, with which the guardianship of its safety ultimately lies, is endowed and entrusted by the original and the amended Constitution with the power and the duty, and, judging by its record of the last sixty years, has itself the will to preserve it.

Catholics in the Army

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Concerning the percentage of Catholics in the army, statistics from Camp Funston, as shown by the religious census taken there early in the year, may be interesting. Catholics comprised 17.4 per cent of the men, while the Catholic population of the group of seven States from which they were drawn is only 13.03 per cent. This shows a surplus percentage of 4.37, an excess of about one-fourth as compared with the Catholic percentage of population. In the 353rd Infantry, the all-Kansas regiment, Catholics numbered 13.7 per cent, according to the statistics given out, whereas the Catholic population of Kansas is only 7.1 per cent of the total population of the State. This shows an excess of 6.6 per cent. How account for this excess percentage both from the group of States and from Kansas? Does it not indicate that the estimate of the War Department is fairly accurate, especially when we take into consideration the very large percentage of Catholics in the volunteer branches of the army?

Food and the Irish

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Mr. Alfred McCann, who has devoted a number of years to the study of foods, claims that the Irish people degenerate in America because of the foods they consume after coming here. Whether his theory is correct or not, it is more encouraging than the one advanced by Dr. O'Malley. There are many people of the opinion that the Jew thrives in the Ghetto because he continues to eat some of the foods to which he was accustomed in Europe. It is estimated that ninety per cent of the Jews in the Chicago Ghetto still use, as their principal food, bread made from entire grain. Pumpernickel is their staff of life.

On the other hand the Irish never see oaten bread or entire corn meal after leaving Ireland. They believe what physicians have told them about refined foods being more nourishing than their former coarser foods, and those who have tried to live on the same portions they prospered on in Ireland have suffered for it. I am quite sure that in the "Carey's Patch" in which I grew up sulphate of magnesia injured the health of the people more than whisky, and refined grain products made the former a household necessity. It is better diet, not better climate, that the Irishman in America needs. In spite of the fact that men degenerate when they move south suddenly for any great distance, the fighting race will be able to overcome the climatic effect if they are given proper food.

The French Sisters

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Recently a letter appeared in the public press here relative to the work which the Sisters are doing in the hospitals and camps of France. It was a distinct surprise to many people. Cannot some of the various Catholic papers take up this matter and inform weekly, through foreign correspondents, our Catholic people in regard to this important service rendered by the Sisters to the cause of the Allies?

It was only recently that justice was done to the fair name of the Sisterhoods who labored and died for their country during the Civil War. A splendid opportunity is being lost at the present time. The work of the Knights of Columbus, the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A. suffers not from lack of publicity, but the various Sisterhoods who are attending the dying and dying themselves on the battlefields of France or in the tents behind the lines receive little or no attention. So far as I know, the only mention of their work is found in John Ayscough's masterly work, "French Windows." What finer illustrations for a weekly Catholic magazine than the consecrated examples of heroism demonstrated by the Sisters of France in the present crisis? I sincerely hope that the matter will receive the widest publicity.

The Sign of the Cross

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In a recent letter Mr. William Price suggested the Trinitarian formula attached to the Sign of the Cross as an argument for our dogma on the procession of the Holy Ghost and "wondered whether Christian archeology or theology ever applied the point in connection with the Greek Filioque schism." The words "In nomine Patris et Filii et Spiritus Sancti" of the baptismal form (Matt. XXVIII, 19) are quoted generally by theologians to enunciate the distinction, co-equality and unity of Persons in the Holy Trinity. They do not constitute an argument in favor of our belief in the procession of the Holy Ghost. The Latin Church holds that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father and the Son, whereas the Greek Church teaches that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the Father through the Son. Though the formula represents the Son as intimately related with God the Father and God the Holy Ghost, it does not bring out the idea that the Holy Ghost proceeds from both the Father and the Son as from one principle. Hence it lacks force against the position of the Greek Church. Archeologists mention similar Trinitarian inscriptions in confirmation of the fact that Christians believed in very early times the dogma of the Trinity.

Spiritistic Phenomena

To the Editor of AMERICA:

It was a good deal of a shock to read Doctor Walsh's article, "Madame Palladino, High Priestess of Spiritism." One can scarcely believe the versatile Doctor has given the subject the serious thought and study it deserves. If his article is the last word that American science and literature can give us in these days, can we wonder there are few so poor to do them reverence?

Doctor Walsh's argument summarized is this: Madame Palladino sometimes resorted to trickery; some scientists were thus deceived; therefore, "supposedly spiritistic phenomena are nothing more nor less than the tricks of designing charlatans." Here fallacy stalks rampant. Does Doctor Walsh mean to deny the objective reality of spiritistic phenomena at this hour? Evidently he does, since he introduces Maskelyne as the triumphant exposer of Spiritism. But he does not mention the fact that Professor Alfred Russell Wallace, the great naturalist, testified in open court that Maskelyne's tricks had nothing in common with the spiritistic phenomena he had observed; nor the further fact that the magician had to pay five hundred pounds as a forfeit. But theology as well as true science is against Doctor Walsh. Let us stick to science.

Despite Doctor Walsh's slur, the names of Richet, Flammarion, Lodge, Crookes, Barrett, Wallace, James, are still names to conjure with in the scientific world. It is absurd to say that these men, who were as anxious as any honest man could be to disprove the spiritistic theory, and who, after forty years of experiment with numberless mediums and close observation of all the facts, were forced to abandon materialism for Spiritism—it is absurd to say they are merely victims of clever deception. Yet they have all stated emphatically their absolute belief in spiritintelligences, in the objective reality of spiritistic phenomena, in the extraneous will and preternatural power manifested through mediums. All these men base their conclusions upon years of experiment carried on under strict scientific conditions with mediums under incessant observation. One is driven here to ask what opportunities has Doctor Walsh had to acquire a tithe of the information in the possession of these men who he so glibly tells us were the victims of designing charlatans. In all the literature of the subject that has come to my notice I have never yet discovered a single man of scientific standing who based his conclusions on the blowing out of a curtain or the antics of a controlled table. Furthermore, I have myself experienced sufficient to convince me that these men are right in their belief. The only ground of dispute between them and Catholic investigators of the subject is the nature of the intelligence which is shown to be at work.

No one can deny that Spiritism is honeycombed with trickery, fraud, and deception; nor am I inclined to consider this fact an unmixed evil, since it acts as a preventive to many minds which might otherwise be drawn into it. But over and above all the trickery, apart from all possibility of deception, there remains a large body of phenomena, mental and physical, which can be accounted for in no way other than by a power, a will, an intelligence separate and apart from that of the medium. A single visit to the séance-room of a recognized medium will convince any unbiased mind. The Church, however, recognizing the mysterious influence of these spirits has forbidden Catholics to attend séances. But one is tempted to suggest to Doctor Walsh to seek the lawful authority which can provide him with the necessary information.

It seems to be a matter of sincere regret that, when the subject is so far advanced that a confrère of Doctor Walsh and several European scientists are claiming the spirits are giving us a "New Revelation," a writer of note should be asking the question whether there are any spiritistic phenomena at all.

Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In your issue of May 11 Mr. Hagan, of Tulsa, Okla., averred that the article on "Prohibition, the Constitution and the Mass," of March 13, "cannot fail to inspire amazement in every reader who is a lawyer;" yet, in the number of April 27, Mr. Paul Bakewell, of St. Louis, had written: "I heartily approve of Father Kenny's article under the above title." As Mr. Bakewell has been a lawyer of distinction longer than Mr. Hagan has lived, amazement has shifted its provenance. "Half an hour's investigation," we are told, "will establish that reliance on Federal questions in this matter is leaning on broken reeds;" but Mr. Bakewell, who has given to the study of the Constitution and decisions thereon, not half an hour but almost half a century, is convinced that in this matter the Supreme Court can be relied on "to enforce the rights of its Catholic citizens against the tyranny and bigotry of a State . . . under the spirit of our overshadowing Constitution." Even less than half an hour, by use of the key number system, will suffice to find all Federal decisions on a selected question, but the mental training and historic and constitutional knowledge requisite for this just appraisement may not be acquired in that period, and not every lawyer possesses all or any of these requirements.

The assumption that "theological questions are to be left to theologians and legal questions" to lawyers, exclusively, connotes innocence of the history of both. Up to the close of the thirteenth century legists and decretists, judges, advocates and attorneys, were mainly clerics, especially in England, where until the period of Edward I (1272-1307), the saying went: "Nullus clericus nisi causidicus." The ecclesiastical origin of the English Inns of Court appears today in the gowns, hoods, coifs and bands, of judges, sergeants and counsel, and in the titles of their four terms, Michaelmas, St. Hilary, Easter and Trinity. When the thirteenth-century universities supplied a sufficiency of lay lawyers, the Fourth Lateran Council restricted clerical practice in secular courts to defense of the poor (Maitland's "Sketch of English Legal History"); and lay pleaders began to acquire the repute connoted in the rhythm:

> Once lived St. Yves of Brittany;
> A lawyer yet no robber he;
> A wondrous thing for folk to see.

Clerics continued to influence law as Chancellors of England till Henry VIII deposed Cardinal Wolsey for failing to secure him a divorce. The legal contributions of such theologians as Aquinas and Suarez are still cited by jurists; and the doctrine of St. Thomas, as expounded by Suarez and Bellarmine, against the "Divine Right" theories of James I, that civil authority is of the people and must be exercised reasonably and for all the people, has passed in the United States Constitution.

Even in our colonies the legal traditions of clerics survived, Warren's "History of the American Bar" setting among the six outstanding facts of early practice "The supremacy of the clergy in the magistracy and the courts of New England." "Let the cobbler stick to his last" is not meant for cobblers who have minds above leather. "The Cobbler of Agawam" is known to fame as the author of "The Body of Liberties of Massachusetts;" and blessed Sir Thomas More, a lawyer by profession, won greater renown as a theologian. Legal acumen proved helpful to St. Alphonsus Liguori and others who forsook law for theology; and theologians who take up the study of law, encouraged by the Church which crowns success therein with the doctorate "utriusque juris," do not find their philosophical training amiss. Contribution of lawyer or theologian in either department must stand on its merits.

Mr. Hagan's citations of two well-known decisions relative to State Prohibition deserve consideration, and many receive it under another title; his advice to confine our activities to watching and enlightening legislatures does not. Presumably he watched and enlightened his own State of Oklahoma, with the result: (1) That no priest in that State can say Mass without breaking the law; (2) that he himself cannot hear Mass without cooperating in such violation; (3) That as State or District Attorney he would be bound to prosecute such priest if informed of his possessing wine or if apprised by his own eyes of wine upon the altar. No true American can believe that such result flows from the spirit and intent of American law, and no true Catholic will brook it.

As citizens of a State, we are bound to enlighten our legislature and community on all pending laws detrimental to justice or morality, and the best enlightened will be proof of their invalidity; but when a State tramples on our fundamental rights, it becomes our duty to assert our national citizenship and vindicate before the national tribunal the most sacred of our liberties. Hence, Catholic lawyers and theologians had better devote their powers to supplying the judiciary with reasons for the faith they have in the even justice of our law and system, than in advertising the elements that foster doubt of it.

Another Methodist Fable

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I am afraid that the eloquent words of your editorial, "A Methodist Bishop in Camp," AMERICA, March 16, will fall on unresponsive ears as far as Methodist "divines" in general are concerned. We might perhaps, looking through the telescope of charity at the words of Charles Bayard Mitchell, discover a dense, perhaps voluntary, ignorance that led to the graphic description of his visit to that Southern Camp and his apostolic work therein. Living in a land where the Methodists are engaged in the heroic labor of bringing the "true light of the Gospel" to 7,000,000 Catholics still sitting in the shades of Roman darkness, I am not surprised at the experience of their coreligionist among the Catholic boys of our army. But for downright calumny and unblushing violation of the Eighth Commandment—preserved I believe even in "the khaki-bound volume of the New Testament" in whose possession those poor soldiers now rejoice for the first time—you will have to go far afield in Methodist missionary annals before you find an equal of the following article taken from the Philippine Observer, the Methodist monthly magazine published in Manila this month, April.

BURLESQUE OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS

In January the students of the Seminary College, a large school maintained in Vigan by the Jesuit priests, presented in a benefit program for the Red Cross an amateur theatrical burlesquing the work done by the public schools. It was in the form of a musical comedy, the name of which was "The Bogus School Inspector." The theme was this: The valet of a certain new school inspector took it into his head to take the place of his master in the inspection of the schools. Because of the ignorance of the teachers and pupils, and because of the inefficiency of organization of the schools he was able to pass himself off as the inspector and make the examination, which was a farce from beginning to end. In the school scenes the premium was placed on idleness, indolence and ignorance, and the teacher was represented as a weakling who was partial to the least deserving, and who "picked" on the children who were well behaved.

The climax came out when the real school inspector appeared and found out that his servant had given the "bogus" inspection. He was represented as a wily politician who, fearing scandal and public derision, allowed the ridiculous inspection to stand, and bribed the servant and teacher to keep quiet.

The play was pregnant with allusions to the supposedly false and idle things taught in the public school, and the impression received by the hundreds of Filipinos who shouted with laughter and approval as they witnessed it, was that the public schools were not wholesome places for the education of the young, and that the governmental management of the schools was but a political machine in which men worked for money and influence, and not for the good of the people.

The Jesuit can be faithfully trusted to oppose in every possible manner the greatest institution of democracy—the Public Schools—and this is but an example of how they are trying to prejudice the public opinion. But it is not often they get so bold and insolent in their opposition.

(Signed) J. W. MOORE.

In your editorial, with rightful indignation, you write "The time has come when in the name of patriotism, if not in the name of truth and religion, an end should be put to such offensive and insulting language." And these words bear repetition in this present case.

In the name of patriotism, to assist one of the noblest works the American people ever espoused, the relief of the suffering through her Red Cross Society, the Jesuit Fathers and their students of the Seminary College of Vigan, at great sacrifice to themselves, presented to the Vigan public a splendid program in English, Spanish and Ilocano (the native dialect) to "do their bit" in the great cause. The young men's orchestra of the Vigan (Public) High School and the glee club of the same school gladly offered their cooperation. The English play was "The Bogus School Inspector," published by Fisher Co., Astor Place, New York City. This play had been staged in the College some years ago, and was later sent at the request of one of the high school teachers to Manila. Two performances were given in Vigan in January, at either one of which were present all the American professors, ladies and gentlemen, of the Vigan High School, and the provincial superintendent of schools. All expressed themselves extremely pleased with the little play, and there was not a note among them adverse to its representation. Esprit de corps and loyalty to their own school work would never have permitted any "burlesque of public schools," yet it remains for a Methodist minister—whom I did not see at either performance—a minister who is being paid a goodly sum of money each month to spread among the unregenerate youth of Vigan the pure, truthful, unadulterated doctrine of the khaki-bound New Testament, it remained for such an apostle of the Gospel of Our Lord to find, or better, invent, a burlesque that never existed and to publish to the uttermost ends of the earth, not the doctrine of our Lord, but that practice condemned by St. Peter in the sudden death of Ananias. Would not common prudence suggest to J. W. Moore that in a benefit to help on a great work dear to Americans no play would be used which could wound the sensibilities of Americans in another great work to which they are equally devoted, the public schools? Yet such is the crime of which J. W. Moore, Methodist minister of Vigan, accuses the Jesuit Fathers of Vigan! The description of the argument of the play as drawn out by J. W. Moore is a violation of the Eighth Commandment. The simple argument was that the inspector and his valet started together for the inspection of the school, the inspector misses the train, and the goodhearted valet, to protect his master, determined to examine the school himself, as neither he nor the inspector were known to the teacher. The examination, says J. W. Moore, "was a farce from beginning to end." Precisely, that was the "plot" of the play, to excite an hour of hearty innocent laughter among those who paid a peso to help the Red Cross. (I did not see J. W. Moore present.) "How many divisions of the earth are there?" asked the bogus inspector, and the first youngster, full of the consciousness of his own vast knowledge, answers: "Two—long division and short division." "What is a quadruped?" continued the inspector. "A thing with four legs," promptly answered one of the examinees. "Good. Give an example," asked the inspector. Wouldn't even J. W. Moore forget his biliousness and laugh if he heard the answer, "Cats, dogs, chairs, tables"?

In the school scene there were no "premiums"; there was no question of "idleness, indolence or ignorance," and the teacher had neither "favorite" nor those on whom he "picked."

The climax showed the inspector most angry at his valet, with absolutely nothing of the wily politician appearing, who is determined to re-examine the school, but on the representation of the teacher that two examinations would be bad, allows the matter to rest as it is. There was absolutely no allusion to the public schools, much less allusions "to the supposedly false and idle things taught" there. "The impression received by the hundreds of Filipinos" was nothing else than that received by the superintendent of public schools of Ilocos Sur and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Murphy; by the principal of the high school and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Morgan, both belonging to the Methodist Church; by Mr. Hickman and his wife, the former industrial supervisor of Ilocos Sur, the latter president of the Vigan Red Cross, and both belonging to the Methodist religion; by Mr. and Mrs. Badger, professors of the Vigan High School, members of the Methodist Church, and by the three or four other American gentlemen, professors of the Vigan High School, then present. The final paragraph of J. W. Moore, the religious pastor of so many professors of the Vigan High School, is but a fitting climax to the Ananian eloquence that preceded it: "The Jesuits," etc.

Permit me to close with the words of your own editorial, "For the honor of Methodism or denominationalism of whatever kind, such unAmerican and unchristian methods should be discontinued."

Under a Bushel

OF a pious Irish layman, Henry Owen-Lewis, who died some five years ago, it has been said, "It was one of his maxims that Catholics should take part in public life, be well up on public questions, and let their Protestant neighbors see that they are." Lewis lived up to his own maxim. He served his country in Parliament, and while in the eyes of the world, he never became a "great" man, he was always a useful citizen whose genuine unobtrusive piety was a power for good among his non-Catholic and Catholic associates.

It was, perhaps, the "fear of publicity," a relic left by ages of persecution, which in the past bred disinclination in many Catholics to "take part in public life." Too often, open hostility showed plainly that "no Catholics need apply," and often enough, the exigencies of the political game excluded the Catholic from his rightful participation, in discussing and bringing to a conclusion, questions of public interest. But the war has brought Catholics to the front in many public concerns. Our Bishops, surely, have shown that they "are well up on public questions," and on their part, the laity have responded splendidly to every call of the Government. Even were no other proof at hand, the excellent work of the Knights of Columbus, both at home and abroad, shows how well American Catholics understand the needs of the day, and how they are best met. All this quick response gives good reason for the hope that, in solving the many problems of construction and reconstruction which the country must face after the war, Catholics will do their part ungrudgingly and completely.

We never fully know what we can do until we have been forced to try. The war has discovered valuable forces, hitherto unsuspected because dormant, in our very midst, and these are forces that must not be suffered to return to their former quiescence in the day of peace. The world can never be rebuilt safely, except on the principles of Jesus Christ. We know those principles, and it will be our duty not only to live them, but to do all in our power, to make them, by our active interest in the common good, the foundation stones of a lasting and genuine democracy.

The Nemesis of Materialism

IN that now long-past era, the years just prior to the war, most of our authors, speakers and publicists, it may be remembered, were accustomed to find in the achievements of science and invention, which were ever growing more and more marvelous, the sole hope of humanity. The world was to be regenerated by means of chemistry and physics and the universal practice of every social, moral and economic virtue was to be promoted simply by diffusing everywhere the sacred truths of biology. Electricity would make saints; petroleum, scholars; and gasolene, patriots and statesmen. As for the inauguration of a world war, that was quite "unthinkable"; man, of course, was now too highly civilized ever to resort again to that barbarous method of settling differences. Then suddenly, like a bolt from a clear sky, the present dreadful cataclysm burst upon the world and the very inventions and discoveries that were to be the means of accomplishing mankind's highest destiny swiftly gave birth to such pitiless engines of horror and destruction that the cost, ruin and carnage of every previous war in the world's history sank into comparative insignificance.

No one, perhaps, has shown more forcibly than M. René Boylesve in his recent novel, "You No Longer Count," that the war now raging is nothing but the logical result of the materialistic philosophy that prevailed so widely in Europe and America a few years ago. In passages like the following he tells what a grim harvest the world is now reaping from its absolute faith in the regenerating power of machinery and gases:

> Man has already abdicated in favor of a machine. The war that is being waged is a war no longer of men but of material. Man is belittled; the machine surpasses him! A rudimentary intelligence suffices to set the true force in motion. We are still believers in the ancient saying that the true force is manly virtue, the fine, old-fashioned bravery. We have belittled the only thing in the world which might be wholly great—man. Do we profess to worship that bravery of man which all the past has justified? Why, by the scientific character of war it has become—one dares permit himself the blasphemy—almost a sign of inferiority. We reckon upon the mystical value of our bravery, and we send our men by the thousands against an army of tools! By virtue of our century-old prejudices we honor only the man who exposes himself, sacrifices himself, furnishes, however uselessly, his proofs of courage, when the glory of our arms will belong to him who shall most securely have sheltered his divisions behind gigantic steam-hammers! The applied sciences have caused a moral revolution. By riveting man, who is before all else a soul, to material elements, they have destroyed whatever might be justifiable in the great contests of humanity. A paltry little engineer behind his disguised heavy cannon, or with his mitrailleuse under thirty metres of cement, counts for more than our superb heroes with their courage, their loyalty, and their white gloves. Man, chained like a galley-slave to a machine, to a chemical substance, is forced to unlearn what it is to be a man. He appears very intelligent when he is equipped with algebra and terminology; yes, we must grant to matter all that it can give, but pause a little: have you not an impression that something superior is lacking in so abnormal a compound? They have domesticated the forces of nature; they believe themselves Titans; and there they stand glowering at one another like beasts; they cannot distinguish themselves from these material fabrics that surprise and overwhelm them. They call themselves masters of matter, and matter is all the time jeering at them.

If the world that is to survive the conflict now raging will never forget that the misfortune which befell European civilization in 1914 was but the logical result of a widely diffused materialistic philosophy, the chief object will be attained which the just and merciful Ruler of the Universe no doubt aimed at, when He permitted the nations to be chastised by this red scourge of war.

A Minister's Jubilee Statistics

A PROTESTANT minister in a New England town who recently observed the golden jubilee of his entrance into his church's pulpit found the occasion an appropriate one for publishing the statistics of his parish for the last fifty years. He presents figures which the thoughtful will doubtless consider quite significant. For the pastor of this "very good parish" has baptized during the past half-century only 123 children, or less than three a year, though he celebrated 315 marriages within that period. It should be said, however, that a good proportion of his flock probably did not think it worth while to bring their rare little ones to the font for Baptism. But it was funerals that kept the jubilarian busiest, for his fifty years' incumbency were marked by a melancholy total of 629 deaths, or an average of more than one each month. Struck by the disparity of the foregoing statistics the Boston Evening Transcript remarks:

It is one of the disadvantages of the position of the New England Protestant minister that his work, in the long run, tends to degenerate into a sort of mortuary function. His success in the parish really seems to be measured by the number of people he has managed to bury. The gateway at which he stands is distinctly marked "Exit." In the first place, there are generally more deaths than births in his parish, and in the second, the early days of even such children as are born among his people do not in any way involve his ministrations, as they do those of his Roman Catholic brother, who is always the chief figure at the inevitable and required christening, who may be said to guard and guide the earliest footsteps of the lambs of his flock, and whose later functions at the confirmation of the young Christian are an event in the life not only of the new communicant but of his entire family. It is a defect of the New England and Evangelical system which, as we have said, tends to remove the minister from the beginning of life and associate him only in a marked manner with its dark decline.

Apposite and just as the foregoing reflections are, the minister's fifty years' statistics should bring home to old New Englanders another lesson which is of such vital importance that they should learn it at once, unless indeed they are ready to see their race completely die out. The reason why the Catholic priest is kept so busy with Baptisms, First Communions, Confirmations and weddings is simply because his parishioners keep the law of God, respect the purpose of marriage and rear large families. The New England Protestants of a century ago seem to have been almost as conscientious about this important matter as are the American Catholics of today, and their sturdy and numerous offspring helped to build up the West and win the Civil War. With regard to the character of the average Protestant parish in New England today, however, could anything be more significant than those 123 Baptisms conferred in the space of fifty years, contrasted with the 629 funerals held during the same period?

The Women of France

THERE is no courage like that of women. Men have more physical daring, but in steadfast endurance of heroic sacrifice, in high moral strength which is undismayed and unmoved in the presence of overwhelming sorrow, in power to rise superior to personal grief in the realization of their country's need, women are easily the superiors or men. What is true of all women, is especially true of the women of France. If the French soldiers are pre-eminently among the bravest, it is because they are the sons of those than whom there are none braver in all the world; if they laugh at danger, smile at pain, and go to death with a song on their lips, it is because they have caught fire from the wives and sisters and sweethearts and mothers who have sent them forth to fight for God and for country. The world and humanity owe a great debt to the women of France.

A wife, a laundress at Lourdes, stood by the mangled body of her husband. She was unlettered, unversed in worldly graces, but she possessed what is far better, a heart as strong as steel. "He has given his life for France and so has done well," she said. "France was his mother. I am only his wife." A young girl wrote to her betrothed the following words which deserve to be chronicled in letters of gold: "Always remember that you belong to France. I come far after her. . . . Go forward, beloved, and may God guard you, if the country will not lose by it. Living or dead, you will be my only love." A sister, from a home dark with the black shadow of death, sent this message to her brother: "They have taken them all. Out of eleven, eight are dead. Dear brother, do your duty, that is all we ask." The answer of the men, it could not be otherwise, has been the ever memorable words: "They shall not pass."

The mothers of France are perhaps the bravest of all. "I am a poor woman who have never known the joy of giving," said one. "I know it now, I have given my all to France, my four sons." Another, far gone in years, was found by some gendarmes, weeping over a fresh-made grave in the awful land of Verdun. Bravely she said: "Five of my sons had already fallen in the war. I have come here to see where the sixth is buried—my last son." Her thanks for the military honors they gave her was worthy of the sons she had borne: "Vive la France!" Madame de Castelnau, as was to be expected from the wife of the great general, will be an inspiration for the women of all time. Two of her sons had been killed, a third had been made a prisoner; then they came to tell her of the death of the fourth. "I know what you are going to tell me," she said. "God's will be done. But the mothers of France would do wrong to weep for me. Rather they should envy me."

No wonder France is unconquered! Defeat is impossible, while she has mothers like these. Such, too, are the women of the United States. Like their sisters in France, they have given their all. Similar in generosity, they will be similar in courage. They will not indulge in regret or repining. They have sternly counted the cost. They have sent their loved ones to do battle for right and for freedom. Should their forebodings be realized, they will smile through their tears, and be glad to have given their own blood to share in the saving of the world.

When Understandings are Perfect

ONCE upon a time a certain timorous Frenchman who was visiting in the country expressed to his host some misgivings he felt regarding the intentions of a barking dog that barred his way. "It's all right," said his host. "Don't you know the proverb: 'Barking dogs never bite'?" "Ah, yes," said the Frenchman, "I know ze proverbe, you know ze proverbe; but ze dog—does he know ze proverbe?" Unquestionably the point emphasized by the astute Frenchman was the important one, for the chief difficulties met with in practising daily the art of living pleasantly with others arise from imperfect sympathies, from a defective grasp of our neighbor's point of view, or from a failure to realize his intellectual limitations. To understand all is to forgive all.

The doubt suggested by the Frenchman's anxious query is one that could be profitably entertained by a discontented wife, for instance, who assumes that her stolid husband understands perfectly how much every little domestic annoyance irritates her at the end of a long and trying day; or by the critical and parsimonious parishioner who loudly wonders why his pastor cannot run the parochial school on fewer funds; or by the gifted teacher of English grammar who cannot understand why her goslings, though they seldom hear from their "unlettered" parents a perfect English sentence, are not filled with such admiration for the unearthly beauty of the concords that they grow faint and pale at the bare imagination of a solecism; or the stern drill-sergeant, a department store clerk only six months ago, who disconsolately vows that "the service" is going pell-mell to the dogs, because those hopelessly stupid "rookies" who came to camp last week do not yet clearly understand wherein the use and construction of the British Hales rifle grenade No. 3 (percussion) differs from the make and employment of the German cylindrical grenade with friction tube (regulation type).

"But ze dog—does he know the proverbe?"—that question sternly put to oneself and pondered long and well whenever the temptation comes to speak or act hastily, with little sympathy, or from a very imperfect knowledge of a case's extenuating circumstances, will no doubt result, much to the sweetening of the acerbities of human intercourse, in leaving unsaid many a sharp word and unkind judgment, or in leaving undone many an inconsiderate act and regrettable deed.

A Catholic Students' Convention

TO make the world safe for democracy and democracy safe for the world is a worthy ambition. But to render this work durable the world must first be won for Christ. The same enthusiasm, therefore, which has distinguished our Catholic colleges in filling with blue stars the ample spaces of white enclosed within the red borders of their service flags, should now also urge them on to do their utmost in the supreme work of the world-apostolate. What more cheerful news then, than to learn that the first missionary conference of our American Catholic students is actually to take place this year, in spite of all the difficulties created by the war. Here is the spirit that must win.

About twelve seminaries and colleges are at present expected to send representatives to the meeting, but it is to be hoped that many more will soon report. Methodism is even now confidently seeking to raise $70,000,000 for its mission work and is preparing gigantic plans for its foreign apostolate. Other denominations are hardly less active. Though Catholics are not entertaining ambitions, for the period of the war, conceived on so vast a scale, they may not stand alone in neglecting to give their utmost attention to the task of instilling the missionary spirit into the young men and women who are to be our future leaders. If this work is overlooked in our day, the Catholic Church may in future resign herself to total defeat in her own glorious mission fields. This conclusion, it is true, is based on purely natural reasoning. God can still manifest His power and dispense the bounties of His grace in wonderful ways, without our cooperation, but we have no right to neglect the obvious means He has given us for promoting His glory and spreading the light of His Gospel among the nations of the earth. It is mere presumption for us to hope that we shall reap where no man has sown.

The seminaries and colleges which have hitherto pledged their hearty cooperation to the Students' Mission Crusade, have most properly decided, by democratic vote, to hold their first convention at Techny, Ill., July 27 to 30. From this quarter the first impulse was given to this great undertaking whose good results have already extended across the ocean and suggested a similar plan to the Irish students, of establishing a branch of their own Students' Mission Crusade in every Catholic college and secondary school of Ireland. "Though the world should totter on its foundations," is the cry sent forth from St. Columban's, in Galway, to every school in Ireland, "we must not lose sight of the cause of Christ. This spirit, and this alone, will win. Catholic students cannot fail to answer our appeal, and join in one great cry, like the Crusaders of old, 'God wills it!' The world for the Sacred Heart."

In giving his enthusiastic approval to our own American Students' Crusade, Cardinal Farley trusts that "the superiors of all our educational institutions will champion this cause." It would be difficult indeed to see how any could stand aloof from this movement, so pregnant with precious fruit for God and for souls. Rightly his Eminence insists that a vigorous mission crusade among our students is particularly needed at the present moment owing to the conditions created by the war in our mission fields. Vocations and financial support from American sources must be increased, and this effect, as he concludes, is to be obtained "by enlisting the sympathy of the next generation of Catholic leaders."

No Catholic educational institution can fail to see the importance of the opening convention of our Students' Mission Crusade. It will leave its deep imprint upon future organizations. It will determine the constitution of the new society and its methods of propaganda, bringing into existence new systems of bureaus for practical work. It is highly desirable, therefore, that as many institutions as possible should be represented in order that the right impetus may now be given to the entire movement. It is an impulse that will mean much to our entire system of education and can be made to exercise a profound influence not merely upon our own country, but upon the course of the world. In the words of the students of Ireland: "We owe it now to God and our country to make a big effort to push forward the frontiers of Catholicism in this century." No school, no student should be a slacker in this Crusade.

Literature

THE POPULAR WRITINGS OF NEWMAN

IT has been much the habit to speak of Newman as a preacher, to write of him as an historian, to scrutinize his passages as examples of English well composed, to read his studies and his tracts as documents in a philosophical controversy. But all this is deep, unpopular, and therefore unprofitable stuff. The time has come when we must point out that his sentences are not always long, his thought not always abstruse, his subject-matter not always complicated. Newman deserves to be considered a popular writer on four counts.

The first is the direct sincerity and simplicity of the "Apologia pro Vita Sua," which ranks as one of the four or five best specimens of autobiography in the world. The second is the rich fervor and sheer power of his poem, "The Dream of Gerentius," which represents "emotion remembered in tranquillity" and produces "an exaltation of the soul": the two standards by which we may always distinguish true poetry. The third count is "Callista: A Tale of the Third Century," and the fourth is "Loss and Gain: The Story of a Convert."

It may with more exactness be stated, however, that "Loss and Gain" is also autobiography, for Charles Reding is Newman himself. Both went to Oxford at the same time. Both were confused in their studies amid the turmoil of religious inquiry. Both were sensitive, high-minded, thoughtful, earnest, truth-seeking, restless in error. Both looked for authority. Both encountered difficulties in the Anglican Establishment. Both temporarily resolved those difficulties. Both were bothered by chattering "party" people of one religious persuasion or another. The book was published anonymously, but any one who knew the life of Newman prior to his conversion must have guessed the author.

Not only in the broad outlines, but even in trivial and seemingly inconsequential details are his life and the fictitious life of Charles Reding strikingly similar. Both are received into the Church by Passionists; both in arguments have recalled a remembrance of visiting a Catholic Church in early boyhood and being impressed with the sheer beauty of the ritual. This novel is interesting, though, as a sharp satire on fruitless discussion of religious principles and on frantic propaganda. It is a unique expression of the personality of Newman. And it is only fitting that he should have had his say in this fashion three short years after his conversion, and have produced a book—you could hardly call it a novel—which ranks with Disraeli's "Lothaire" and Shorthouse's "John Inglesant" as one of the three keenest pieces of fiction dealing with religious subjects which the nineteenth century was able to produce.

Newman's other novel, "Callista," has more of structural perfection and more sustained interest. It likewise is a tale of conversions, the conversion, slowly and painstakingly, of a young North African, Agellius, and the sudden, swift, exalting conversion of a beautiful Greek girl whom he loves. The plague of the locusts, though marvelously well depicted, is not the greatest plague of all, for the greatest is the plague of persecution which ravages a town and sheds the blood of innocent people. There are political intrigues as pernicious as those in Kingsley's "Hypatia." In fact, these two North African stories might well be contrasted. Kingsley reveals the struggle between paganism and Christianity. Newman has molded his tale into a form of beauty and delicacy, rising to a powerful conclusion where we see spirits exalted and hearts lifted up. "Callista" may be taken in conjunction with "Hypatia," and with Wiseman's "Fabiola" as examples of the manner in which Scott's impersonal and impartial historical novel of the early nineteenth century could be transformed by two decades of religious controversy into an instrument for zealous propagandists who were also incidentally novelists. Such a role did Newman play.

In his "Apologia," in "The Dream of Gerontius," in "Loss and Gain," and in "Callista," he represented people who were not ever thus nor prayed the kindly light to lead them on. He represented the appeal, the call, which worked through the reason and transfigured those who heard. In these four pieces of literature, Newman has been popular with the reading public. These are his popular writings and, though not so weighty nor set forth in such stupendous periods as his more scholarly historical works, these are the writings which, for us in this day and generation and to ordinary mortals accustomed to ordinary fare, are the most profitable and pleasant. In amusing ourselves with these, we may likewise bring home, as Bacon would say, to the business and bosoms of men, some vision of clearer thought and richer comprehension of the truth, Semper Eadem!

EXPERIENCE

Deborah danced, when she was two,
As buttercups and daffodils do;
Spirited, frail, naively bold,
Her hair a ruffled crest of gold,
And whenever she spoke her voice went singing
Like water up from a fountain springing.

But now her step is quiet and slow,
She walks the way primroses go;
Her hair is yellow instead of gilt,
Her voice is losing its lovely lilt,
And in place of her wild delightful ways
A quaint precision rules her days:

For Deborah now is three, and, oh,
She knows so much she did not know!

A Minstrel in France. By HARRY LAUDER. New York: Hearst's International Library Co. $2.00.

"Captain John Lauder killed in action, December 28. Official. War Office," ran the telegram which Harry Lauder, the world-famed entertainer, received on New Year's Day, 1917. The shock of his only son's death was such a severe one that the author of this excellent book had actually determined to leave the stage forever, but "Carry on!" John's last words to his men, became his father's heartening motto too, so Mr. Lauder after trying in vain to enlist threw himself with all his energy into war-work, traveled through England and Scotland singing and speaking, proving himself "worth a brigade," owing to his success in stimulating recruiting, for it is estimated that he sent some 12,000 men to the front. There is many a moving passage in the book, such as the father's loving tributes to his son, the description of the author's return to the stage and of his visit to his soldier-boy's grave. When Mr. Lauder's heart is deeply stirred he writes in the Scotch dialect of his songs, and there is a beautiful spirit of Christian resignation pervading the book. He writes, for instance, of himself and Mrs. Lauder in their bereavement:

> Almighty God, to whom we prayed, was kind, and He was pitiful and merciful. For presently He brought us both a sort of sad composure. Presently He assuaged our grief a little, and gave us the strength that we must have to meet the needs of life and the thought of going on in a world that was darkened by the loss of the boy in whom all our thoughts and all our hopes had been centered. I thanked God then, and I thank God now, that I have never denied Him nor taken His name in vain. For God gave me great thoughts about my boy and about his death. Slowly, gradually, He made me to see things in their true light, and He took away the sharp agony of my first grief and sorrow, and gave me a sort of peace.

During the past year Mr. Lauder has been in France entertaining thousands of soldiers at the front, frequently giving them as many as seven concerts a day and singing as often as thirty-five times. Whenever he met a body of men he would stand up in his motor-car and sing, the soldiers joining in the choruses. "I will always believe," the author avers, "that I sang a little better on that tour than I have ever sung before or ever shall again." "A Minstrel in France" is a story of courage and service that will do all its readers a world of good.

Donatism. By ADRIAN FORTESCUE. St. Louis: B. Herder Book Co. $0.90.

In the year 1839 Cardinal Wiseman drew a remarkable parallel between the Donatist schism and the Church of England, which was not without its effect on Newman and has been for many years a stumbling block in the way of Anglican apologetic. Bishop Gore in reply to the deadly comparison strives to point out a difference between the English and Donatist Churches, while Mr. Lacey maintains that Donatism is a mark of the Church of Rome. It is love's labor lost. Adrian Fortescue with great clearness not only demonstrates that Wiseman was not mistaken but also convicts the defenders of Anglicanism from their very mouths.

The Donatist movement was schismatic. Of this there can-not be the shadow of a doubt. "I charge thee," says St. Augustine to Petilian, "with the crime of schism, which thou deniest, but I will prove at once. Thou art not in communion with all nations, nor with those churches founded by the labors of the Apostles." Had the learned Bishop of Hippo lived centuries later, he could have addressed the self-same words to Henry VIII and the subservient Cromwell. Nay, more, he could have shown that the English Church and the Donatist are alike in their birth, in the constitution of their episcopate, and in their methods of defense. Both were brought into existence by the working of human passions, both replaced legitimate bishops by usurpers, and both embraced the alluring will-o'-the-wisp of the branch-theory. Anglicanism in birth and growth has been Donatist. Donatism has seen the end of its days. The religion of "bluff King Hal" and "good Queen Bess" has long ago reached its zenith.

The Escape of a Princess Pat. Being the Full Account of the Capture and Fifteen Months' Imprisonment of Corporal Edwards, of the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, and His Final Escape from Germany into Holland. By GEORGE PEARSON. New York: George H. Doran Co. $1.40.

"Ladies from Hell." By R. DOUGLAS PINKERTON. Illustrated with Photographs. New York: The Century Co. $1.50.

These two books by Canadian soldiers are such powerful indictments of Prussian militarism and give so revolting a picture of what the war has made of the German nation that they ought to fill their American readers with an iron determination to fight on till a decisive Allied victory is won, cost what it may. The dreadful carnage of a modern battle has seldom been more vividly described than by Sergeant Pinkerton when he tells how 800 "Ladies from Hell" as the Germans called the kilted soldiers, obeyed an imprudent order to charge the enemy's trenches and were slaughtered to a man, and how, at the Battle of Lille, only 800 of the author's battalion of 4,000 survived to answer the roll-call. He is of the opinion that "No man can go into the trenches and long remain an atheist" and believes that "War has converted more men to a true Christianity than any other force of modern times." Sergeant Pinkerton computes that there is now a machine gun, or one of larger caliber, every nine feet along the Allied front, but thinks that the line of artillery must be made solid before victory is won. Much of the advice the author gives Americans is offered so tactlessly that it is rather offensive.

Like Lieutenant Patrick O'Brien, who in a book reviewed in our issue of April 27, describes how he jumped from a German train and evaded capture, Corporal Edwards, with the aid of George Pearson's pen, tells how he and a companion escaped to Holland and freedom from the military prison at Oldenburg. The absence of bitterness in the author's account of the Germans' merciless treatment of the wounded and of their prisoners is far more effective than the most fiery rhetoric would be, and the patient way he bore the privations of his prison life and the hardships he had to suffer during his break for freedom bear eloquent testimony to Corporal Edwards' soldierly qualities. From this book it is clear that civilized men cannot live in a world dominated by German militarism. That horror must be crushed out forever before America and the Allies lay down their arms.

Illustrations for Chaucer's England. Edited by DOROTHY HUGHES, M.A., with a Preface by A. F. POLLARD, M.A., Litt.D. New York: Longmans, Green & Co. $2.50.

This is a source-book for students of England in Chaucer's century, the fourteenth. About one-half of the documents quoted treat of the French and English wars of the period, while social history, ecclesiastical affairs, political and constitutional history, form the subjects of the remaining documents. The citations and translations seem to be well and fairly made, and fill in the local color for one already acquainted with the English and French history of the century comprised within the scope of the book. The book, like all source-books, is of value for advanced students of history. Its value for Chaucerian students is problematical.

To appreciate Chaucer one needs but know that he is influenced by three great historic changes, of which his life is a part. The first is that England is breaking with France and realizing itself as a nation whose tongue is English not French; the second is the religious unrest and querulousness growing out of the Avignon Papacy in vassalage to France, and the subsequent great schism; the third is the immense current of the Renascence, with its literary and religious upheaval, which was already bearing Chaucer away in the first of its wreckage or salvage, according to one's estimate of what the Renascence stands for. These are the three great lights in which Chaucer is made clear. The rest are but fireflies which may illuminate a phrase or fact of Chaucer here and there, but contribute little to the understanding of his work as a whole. J. M. P.

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

Readers of the New York Sun who have learned how to pick out from its columns the witty and graphic "copy" of Mr. Frank Ward O'Malley, the brother of Dr. Austin O'Malley, whom our readers know so well, will enjoy his description of "The War-Whirl in Washington" (Century, $1.50). He tells how he and "the wife" journeyed to the capital last winter and there found by actual experience that all the tales told about the city being "overcrowded" are grimly true. There are amusing descriptions of how Prohibition works, or does not work, in Washington; of the talcum-powder soldiers who bravely "go over the top" of their desks with their spurred and booted feet; of how a new bottle of ink, when the red tape has at last run out, is procured in the War Department; of the "hello girls'" little joys; of the profiteers' hopeless depravity, and of the winter idyls of "The Mutual Admiration Club." Many of the best things in the book are "misquoted" from the author's clever wife.

Carl W. Ackerman crossed the Rio Grande last summer with the object of securing for the readers of the Saturday Evening Post a first-hand explanation of "Mexico's Dilemma" (Doran, $1.50), which he says has three horns: (1) Financial ruin and internal disorders unless a loan is obtained; (2) the danger of subjugation to German influence; (3) co-operation with the Allies and America. The author seems rather hard put to it, however, to fill his book. He reports that Carranza "remains the strongest political figure in Mexico" and that "there is no organized revolution today." The country is in such a helpless state that what happens there is not likely to cause either Germany or the Allies much concern. Provided Mexico keeps "neutral" and leaves her oil-wells open to England, she will probably drift along as she is till the war is over.

"Diplomaticus," the Anglican author of "No Small Stir," that admirable explanation of "What the Pope Really Said about the War," which appeared in the Catholic Mind for January 22, and has been in great demand, has out a new edition of his pamphlet published by the Society of SS. Peter and Paul, London, and he inserts in it an additional chapter on the Holy Father's Peace note of last August. In the course of his keen analysis of the Pope's letter, Diplomaticus shows that whenever a "particular point under discussion involves a clear and acknowledged issue of right and wrong the words of the Sovereign Pontiff are definite and peremptory," and then calls attention to the fact that > by its unreserved acceptance of these great liberating principles for which the Allies are fighting and against which their enemies are desperately struggling, the Papacy, in the person of Benedict XV, has once again, as so often in the past, placed itself in the vanguard of modern progress. From the dawn of the Papacy as a European Power this conflict between armed barbarism and the principles of European civilization has persisted beneath a variety of forms, and today, as when Leo turned back Attila from the walls of the western capital and Urban rallied Europe at Clermont against the menace of the Sultans, a Pope once more maintains the cause of liberty. Passion may obscure this fact for the moment, but history will record it for all time.

The Entente critics of the Peace note who persuaded themselves that it is a pro-German document are reminded that "A little logic is a sound thing, even when attacking the Papacy." The Catholic Mind for June 22 opens with Bishop Carroll's excellent paper on "Labor Problems and the Church," shows that a living wage, reasonable hours, sanitary conditions, work suited to age and sex, proper compensation laws, the use of surplus wealth for the common good, are some of the remedies the Church suggests. There are no stronger reserves with which to meet and repel the drives on the Pope that are made here and there so often nowadays than the arguments in "No Small Stir," or in Archbishop Neil's "The Pope and the War," which is also published in the Catholic Mind.

The current Dublin Review opens with a timely paper by Canon Barry on "Rome and Jerusalem." "If the Prophets were the founders of Christianity," he asks, "may we not argue that the Gospel which has taken its rise in Judaism will one day bestow its riches on the Moslem world?" "Seven Sonnets from the Persian," translated by the late British Ambassador, Cecil Spring-Rice, are full of mystic beauty, and Bernard Holland's excellent article on "Patriotism" offers some seasonable Catholic correctives to the excesses of that virtue that are common in times like ours, and calls attention to the fact that "The expression of fanatic feeling is more found among writers, among old men, and, above all, women, than among soldiers." Mgr. Sigourney W. Fay's "The Genesis of the Super-German" and Dr. James J. Walsh's "Bishop and Surgeon" (Theodore Borgagnoni) are the two papers by American contributors to this number of the Dublin. Dr. John G. Vance has an essay on "Immortality," Father Vassall-Phillips writes on "Simplicity in Religion," and Mr. Shane Leslie reviews in his usual brilliant style the life and writings of "Canon Sheehan of Doneraile," keenly analyzing the genius of the novelist and justly assigning him his place in Irish literature. Mr. Leslie also contributes to the book-review a fine appreciation of Gilbert K. Chesterton's "Short History of England."

In the June number of the Bookman, a magazine which will be published, beginning with the September issue, by the George H. Doran Co., Professor William Lyon Phelps continues his discerning study of "The Advance of English Poetry in the Twentieth Century" and examines the work of two-dozen young American poets. In his opinion "It would be difficult to suggest any improvement" upon this quotation from Sara Teasdale entitled "Twilight":

> The stately tragedy of dusk
> Drew to its perfect close,
> The virginal white evening star
> Sank, and the red moon rose.

"I know of no poem by any American published in the year 1917," writes Professor Phelps, "that for combined beauty of thought and beauty of expression is superior to this little masterpiece, William Alexander Percy's 'Overtones'":

> I heard a bird at break of day
> Sing from the autumn trees
> A song so mystical and calm,
> So full of certainties,
> No man, I think, could listen long
> Except upon his knees.
> Yet this was but a simple bird,
> Alone, among dead trees.

EDUCATION

Schools for the Negro

"YOU can't keep the black man in the ditch," the late Booker Washington used to say, "without staying there yourself." A series of volumes could not sum up better than this one sentence, the whole case of race prejudice. If mercy ennobles both the giver and the recipient, it is equally true that race prejudice is more hurtful to the man who nourishes it, than to the object of its stupid hatred. The times are now happily past, when the negro's possession of a rational soul can be questioned, and we are beginning to see, even south of the Mason and Dixon line, that some, at least, among our black brethren, are not only capable of what in the old days was called "book larnin'," but that they and the community profit by the acquisition. Even now it is not always easy to discuss negro education in a spirit altogether free from prejudice. In the first six decades of the last century, the negro, through no fault of his own, found himself at the center of the greatest of all our political storms. It is not wonderful that, in the height of the storm, no great attention was paid to his literary or esthetical development, nor scarcely less wonderful that, after its passing, he found himself alone in the wreckage, equally neglected by all parties to the political combat. But with the lifting of the smoke from Fort Sumter, and the passing of the unwept "carpet bagger," our vision became clearer. Leaving justice and humanity out of the question, it began to seem possible that to educate the negro might prove a profitable economic investment.

The Negro's Progress

FIGURES have a bad reputation, but sometimes they enshrine a truth. In the case of the negro, they suggest facts so clear as to be beyond dispute. The truth is, that the negro, with very little help from his white neighbors, has made progress in a degree unparalleled in the history of any other race. Before the Civil War, ownership, even among "free negroes," was so small as to be negligible; in 1915, almost 1,000,000 negro laborers were cultivating about 100,000,000 acres, of which they owned or rented about forty per cent, and owned outright more than 20,000,000 acres, an area equal to that of Vermont, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Rhode Island. Speaking at Boston, in 1915, Booker Washington showed that in the past ten years the negro's farm property had increased 128 per cent. The value of all negro farm property was, at that time, in excess of $1,000,000,000. "A landless race," he said, emphasizing a deep and significant truth, "is like a ship without a rudder." His own appreciation of this truth, which continually urged him to withdraw his people from the grime and squalor of the typical "negro quarter" of our cities, to the productive life of the farm, would work untold good, were it a stronger and more present force in all education. Nor had the negro neglected other opportunities for material advancement.

> In 1863, we had as a race, 2,000 small business enterprises of one kind and another. At the present time, the negro owns and operates about 43,000 concerns, with an annual turnover of about $1,000,000,000. Within fifty years, we have made enough progress in business to warrant the operation of over fifty banks. With all I have said, we are still a poor race, as compared with many others; but I have given these figures to indicate the direction in which we are traveling.

Even more encouraging than this record, is the story of the negro's progress in education. In 1860, the percentage of illiteracy was about ninety-seven; in 1915, it was about thirty-three, and much less, if the data be restricted to negroes between the ages of ten and twenty. Furthermore, the contributions of the negroes themselves to educational institutions show a steady annual increase.

What Yet is Wanting?

THIS hasty summary is enough to indicate the falsity of the dictum, still current in some localities, that to educate the negro is to "spoil" him. I have no illustrative figures at hand, but it may be stated, on Dr. Washington's authority that, as a rule, it is not the educated, but the illiterate negro, who finds himself in trouble with the law. Decreasing illiteracy and crime, together with increasing ownership of land, achieved largely by his own efforts, are certain tokens that the negro can develop into a desirable type of citizen.

But much yet remains to be done, and in default of higher motives, self-interest should prompt, particularly in the South, a vigorous policy in improving and extending schools for the negro. Of 10,000,000 American negroes, about 9,000,000 live in the South, where they form at least one-third of the population. In no sense can it be advantageous to abandon these 9,000,000, forming a school population of about 2,000,000, to their own resources, or to administer to their needs less sedulously than to the requirements of the white children. "The inadequate provision for the education of the negro is more than an injustice to him," wrote the signers of the open letter of the Southern University Race Commission, "it is an injury to the white man." These men, familiar at first hand with the conditions they describe, point out that "the South can never realize its destiny if one-third of its population is undeveloped and inefficient. . . . Our appeal is for the negro on the ground of common justice and the common welfare. He is the weakest link in our civilization, and our welfare is indissolubly bound up in his."

Some Actual Conditions

IT should be noted, however, that much apparent or real neglect of negro education in the South has been due rather to poverty than to ill-will. Yet in fifteen Southern States, reported by the Bureau of Education in 1916, while the per capita annual appropriation for white children was only $10.32, for colored children the appropriation fell to $2.89. The lowest appropriation, $1.31, is credited to Louisiana; the highest, $9.96, to Oklahoma. How inadequate even this maximum must be, is obvious. Nor do the teachers fare better, either in preparation or in recompense. About seventy per cent of the instructors in "the black belt" have less than six grades of elementary education, and according to the Bureau of Education, "the public provision for training colored teachers is negligible." The work of the schools is further crippled by the fact that in practically all the Southern States the average term is less than six months. In five States it is less than five months, and in only four, Oklahoma, Kentucky, Virginia and Texas, is it "slightly over six months." As to the material equipment, it may be sufficient to quote the statement, attributed by the Bureau of Education to "a representative Southerner": "The negro schoolhouses are miserable beyond all description." The annual average recompense of teachers, white and colored, for the States in which complete figures could be obtained, is given in the following table:

	Whites.	Negroes.
Alabama	$355.53	$158.78
Florida	305.02	168.70
Georgia	318.63	119.35
Kentucky	322.70	310.05
Louisiana	529.04	159.89
North Carolina	196.83	118.59
South Carolina	333.28	110.54
Virginia	322.69	172.63

In a report, made in 1916, the Bureau of Education gives some interesting statistics of schools for the negro under Catholic auspices. The principal workers in this field are the Josephite Fathers, the Sisters of the Blessed Sacrament, better known, perhaps, as "Mother Drexel's Sisters," and the Catholic Board for Mission Work, directed by Monsignor Burke of New York.

According to this report, the Church maintains seven schools, rated as "larger, more important," and 105 smaller establishments. Of these 112 schools, nine are in the North. They count 404 teachers, of whom twenty are negroes, and 13,443 pupils. In general, due to the superior training of the teaching staff, they rank far above the public schools, but lack of financial resources greatly restricts their growth. Their value is clear from the comment of the Bureau, "Their educational work is effective."

The Catholic's Interest

WHAT Dr. Johnson said of the dancing bear may be predicated of illiteracy among our colored brethren. Considering the general inadequacy of the means at their command, the surprising fact is not that illiteracy should exist, but that the percentage is so small. Along what lines the education of the negro should develop, is a discussion which may be left to another time; here it is sufficient to have shown his remarkable progress since the Civil War. The whole question should be of deep interest to Catholics, whose support of the agencies at work in the South still leaves very much to be desired. Without insisting too much upon the judgment that "in all essential respects the negro is still a child," and therefore ripe for the kingdom of God, it is true that the souls of many of these black folk are ready to receive the Gospel of Christ. Jefferson Davis thought that the Church was the only organization which really held the soul of the negro, and experience has shown that a Catholic church, with a well-equipped school, not only keeps our Catholic negroes firm in the Faith, but is a powerful factor in leading the entire negro community to a higher moral and intellectual level.

SOCIOLOGY

Lawless Patriots

I LAST saw little Johnny Thatcher more than twenty years ago. He was then a locomotive, dragging a huge train of cars up a steep grade, and he whistled for me to get off the track. Tonight little Johnny Thatcher is dead, dead on the field of glory, somewhere near the Marne, and dead too, I have no doubt, with his young face turned towards the enemy. For he came of a fighting stock. John Thatcher, Senior, wore an empty sleeve at the time his comrades surrendered to General Grant under the famous apple tree, and his father lies in an unknown grave, south of the Texas border. Last month Johnny wrote me from the "front." It reminded him "of about a million Fourth of Julys rolled into one," but most of his letter was about "this most beautiful of all countries, France. I think there is every variety of song bird here. I wonder how they can stand the noise. But they sing on, as if nothing unusual were taking place." I am proud and grateful that the boy who gave his life for his country, thought enough of me to write me frequently from France. But my heart is heavy tonight, and with my sorrow is mingled a fierce indignation against the tyrant whose lust for power shall be broken only after thousands of our boys, our sons, our brothers, our sweethearts, have bled and died on bitter fields, far from home.

The Fruit of Contempt

YET I do not think that this righteous indignation would justify me in attacking our cook, an Austrian, I think, and skewering him with a brace of his own roasting-pins. It is ill jesting with an aching heart, but it does seem to me that, since two wrongs never make a right, and never did, my indignation works to no good purpose if it urges me to take the law in my own hands. If the Austrian cook is actively or constructively seditious, my best course is to report him to the proper authorities. That is not only my best course; it is my strict duty, a duty imposed upon me by the natural law, by the Fourth Commandment, as I interpret it, by my gratitude to my country, and, finally, by the law of the land.

But what to me, dwelling at my ease in this peaceful city of New York, appears so obvious, does not seem at all obvious to certain Americans whose habitat is in other and unquiet sections of the country. In the words of a modern critic, "a more or less mild contempt for law" has from the beginning been an American trait, and a strain of lawlessness seems to have been naturalized in the American blood. Nor has that contempt been always mild. If we have had extreme examples of contempt for law expressed by Socialists, anarchists and members of the I. W. W., even the best friends of the working man must admit that labor, in its attempts to gain a thoroughly just end, has not always stopped short of employing means thoroughly unjustified. I have no intention of holding up the "capitalists" or American employers in general, as a race of long-suffering individuals, patient under gross and multiplied injuries; I rather incline to the opinion that their more refined and extra-legal violence has done more to fix the stigma of "lawlessness" upon us than the occasional outbursts of men smarting under deep and undeniable wrongs. However the blame may be distributed the product of this malign spirit, at work for generations in this country, and often stimulated by careless and overtolerant tribunals of justice, is "lynch law."

Lynch Law and Murder

AND lynch law is always murder, foul, despicable, cowardly murder, whether the victim of its tyranny be a cowering black brute, or a German caught in open violation of the tradition, customs, and law of this country. No doubt, in our polyglot population, there will be found elements, loud, lawless, insolent and irresponsible, to strain to the breaking-point the patience and justice of loyal Americans. It is hard for a man who has given his son to his country, to refrain from inflicting physical chastisement upon the skulker who remains at home to calumniate the country to which his parents fled for a protection gladly and generously accorded. It is more than galling, when a whole community knows that sedition, disloyalty, and perhaps even treason, flourish within its limits, and that the civil and military authorities are doing nothing to check the growth of this unhealthy condition. That many communities have witnessed unrestrained exhibitions of disloyalty, is unfortunately true. It is also unfortunately true that in some of these localities, the law has not been suffered to take its course, but has been supplanted by violence.

We entered this war that the cause of democracy, by which we understand justice, honor and freedom, might be protected against rapine and aggression. The misguided men who "take the law in their own hands," fail to realize that the wrong involved in thus usurping the functions of justice, is immeasurably greater than the wrong involved in the plotting of a pro-German against the Government, or that their action is a direct assault on the very democracy for which we are fighting. The country that cannot protect the foreigner, friendly or hostile, within its borders, will soon be unable to protect its own citizens. Violence always begets violence, and when private individuals, however numerous or influential, presume to set themselves above the law, we have no democratic State, but only the sure presage of anarchy.

The New "Unwritten Law"

THE claim that a group of citizens may band together to secure the redress of wrongs, real or fancied, by violent means, has been urged by certain factions in this country for years. The majority of these advocates are now either in jail, or are fugitives from justice. But some are yet with us, and in his address to the American Bar Association, the Attorney-General of the United States urged "a campaign against the lynch law" which they uphold:

> We must set our faces against lawlessness in our own borders. . . . For us to tolerate lynching is to do the same thing that we are condemning in the Germans. Lynch > law is the most cowardly of crimes. Invariably the victim is unarmed, while the men who lynch are armed and large in numbers. It is a deplorable thing under any circumstances, but at this time, above all others, it creates an extremely dangerous condition.

Murder trials, extending over the course of the last ten years, have made us familiar with the crime that seeks protection under the "unwritten law." The older version of that "law" was, that any woman might kill any man whose behavior rightly or wrongly displeased her, and that any man might kill any other man, provided there was a woman in the case. The newer version, as yet somewhat crude and unformed, seems to be that any man or group of men, may sit in supreme judgment upon any case growing out of the war, and even inflict death, provided that the duly constituted authorities fail to act, or to secure a conviction. That this statement is no exaggeration, becomes clear on an examination of the defense offered in the Prager case.

Now no one can regard except with disgust, the hypocritical protest which Germany is said to have entered in this case. Germany is never so indignant as when contemplating the crimes of other peoples, and never so smug and complacent as when plotting new barbarities to advance her interests. The difference between the United States and Germany in the present instance is, simply, that while the Governor, and the Attorney-General of the United States, have denounced the murderers in Illinois, Germany has advanced to high honors, the murderers in Belgium.

Did They Die in Vain?

BUT while the verdict, acquitting the men who had been indicted for Prager's murder, may be thoroughly just, it is perfectly plain, first, that Prager was murdered, and next, that the plea of their attorney, was a plea in defense of murder. For that gentleman, doing his best for his clients, is quoted as having urged, that it is sometimes expedient, or even necessary, especially in time of war, for the people to take the law into their own hands. Applied to the Prager case, this meant that Prager was suspected of disloyalty; that the civil authorities, for good reasons or for bad, had failed to arrest him; therefore, it was right, proper and just that an armed mob should set upon this man, and, without the semblance of a trial, hang him by the neck until he was dead.

I cannot see that this is patriotism, or democracy, or righteous indignation, or common decency, or anything but murder, murder of a cowardly and barbaric type, a crime that calls to Heaven for vengeance. Johnny Thatcher is dead, but if we have any mind to tolerate this violence, he has died in vain, and we had best call our other Johnny Thatchers home. For he died, and they are offering their lives, that justice may live.

NOTE AND COMMENT

Summary of K. of C. War Work to Date

ACCORDING to the latest information, published in the Columbiad, some $2,000,000 have recently been expended in the purchase of property at embarkation ports and other army centers in France for the erection of Knights of Columbus huts. Forty-five of these have been contracted for, and the majority are already in operation. The building at 16 Place de la Madeleine, in Paris, was leased and equipped as the Knights of Columbus headquarters. Particularly gratifying is the news that the French Government has assigned fifty English-speaking soldier-priests, with the promise of assigning 100 more in the near future, to assist the corps of Knights of Columbus chaplains. Secretaries and chaplains are now leaving our ports for France at the rate of twenty-five a week. It is stated that no fewer than 1,500 volunteers responded to the call recently issued for Knights of Columbus war workers. Out of these 500 will be selected. The excellent work accomplished at home is sufficiently obvious to all. Approximately 150 Knights of Columbus recreation centers are at present in operation throughout the country and this number may be augmented by fifty more within a few months. The total cost, according to the computations just made, is estimated at $7,000,000. In detail $2,500,000 were expended for construction and equipment, $1,500,000 for operation, $2,000,000 for chaplains, secretaries and stationery, $150,000 for community and welfare work, $100,000 for administration and $1,000,000 for the extension of the work already established. Of all these expenditures and advances for the current year about $3,000,000 were devoted to work at home and $4,000,000 to work overseas. Yet our Catholic war efforts have only begun:

> These $7,000,000 are the financial measure of the work accomplished during the fiscal year; but this work will be, so far as men and material and results are concerned, about sextupled during the forthcoming twelve months, for it has been the experience of the Knights of Columbus that the Order's war-relief services are in urgent and extraordinary demand, a demand far greater than anybody ever calculated, and this demand is made by the scores of thousands of non-Catholic soldiers and sailors as well as by hundreds of thousands of Catholic boys with the colors.

Expenses, moreover, will increase as our forces are steadily growing, but there is no doubt entertained by the Knights of Columbus that our Catholic people, aided by their non-Catholic friends whose sons and brothers are no less benefited by this work, will liberally supply all the funds demanded for this great undertaking.

Catholic Church Extension Society of Canada

THE idea of Catholic Church Extension has now taken firm root in Canada. The society, founded in 1910, almost doubled its receipts during the past year. This is a hopeful sign, although the grand total, amounting to $61,682.52 is only a small fraction of the money received by the Presbyterian Home Missions. Catholics constitute forty-two per cent of the population of Canada, while the donations given do not represent five per cent of the population. Yet the first step towards success in the mission cause is education, and this work has now been courageously undertaken in Canada as well as in the United States.

Polish Soldiers Under Polish Flag

A DIVISION of 50,000 Poles, we are told, has taken its position in the Allied fighting lines under the colors of their own race. They are recruited from the United States, from Canada and South America. Says the New York American:

> This is a most interesting and sentimental event. It is the first time since the treacherous destruction of Poland by Austria, Germany and Russia that the Polish flag has flown over Polish soldiers. The unfurling of that flag over the Polish legion, summoned by the call of their blood from all parts of the world where they had been living under different flags, is the pledge of the forces of democracy to an independent Poland.
> No people deserve better their resurrection as a nation than the Poles. No people deserve more at the hand of Christian civilization than the Poles. It was the Polish army that saved Europe from Mohammedan Turks. Marching in response to the wild cry of Austria for help, under the very walls of the Austrian capital they defeated and hurled back the Mohammedans, saving Europe and Christianity from being overrun, as the Far East had been overrun, by the followers of Mohammed.

Within a hundred years the very nations whose existence was then most threatened dismembered the country that had saved them. Today America salutes those "resurrected colors."

Chronicle

The War.—With the exception of small local engagements there have been no serious developments on the Western front. The only battle of importance was the German attack on the sector about the city of Reims. After several days of comparative inactivity the Germans suddenly attacked both flanks of the large semicircle north of the city, concentrating their efforts in the vicinity of Vrigny, on the west, and near Fort de la Pompelle, on the east. The French were not taken by surprise, and the Germans failed to advance their positions.

Bulletin, June 17, p.m.-June 24, a.m.

On June 21 Premier Orlando announced in the Italian Chamber of Deputies that victory had been achieved by the Italian troops in the first stage of the Austrian offensive. The following day the Italian War Office announced that the drive had been brought to a standstill. The facts bear out both of these statements, and it is clear that for the present the great effort of the Austrians has failed. Throughout the length of the more than 100 miles of line which has been under attack and which stretches from Lake Garda to the sea, the Italians have held firm, and in some place has even advanced their positions by counter-attacks. The slight gains made by the Austrians have not only been very costly but will prove very dangerous to them unless they are followed by further gains for which preparations are being made. The Italian defense has been unique in this sense, that contrary to other drives launched on a great scale, the Austrian effort did not succeed except for minor local gains, even in making any considerable initial advance.

The Austrian Offensive

The fighting on the sector from the Asiago Plateau to the Piave has quieted down almost completely, and the Austrians have made no advance. Along the Piave, where they were halted last year, the Austrians made their greatest effort and had some measure of initial success. Crossing the river east of Nervesa, they took the town and gained positions on the northeastern edge of the Montello Plateau, a place of considerable elevation, which dominates the surrounding territory. Instead of pushing forward at this point, however, they were content to consolidate their advance, but it was clear that unless they captured the entire plateau, their foothold would be of little value. More than 35,000 troops crossed the river in the vicinity of Nervesa, and held about six miles along the bank, but the river having risen in flood and destroyed the pontoon bridges, they were cut off from their main body and were in a dangerous situation.

Further south the Austrians crossed the Piave between Maserada and Candelu, and near Fagara, but at these places they were held, if not, as at first reported, driven back. Their most effective gain has been still further south, where they crossed the river at Dona di Piave, took Capo Sile, reached and crossed the Fossalta Canal, and overran the entire sector south of Dona di Piave to the sea. This gain, however, is not regarded as in any sense vital. On June 24 General Diaz published a brief report to the effect that the tide had turned and that the Austrians were retreating along the forty-mile stretch from Montello to the sea, defeated, closely pursued and in great disorder. Their difficulties are increased by the fact that the Piave is still in flood.

Canada.—As in England and Ireland so in Canada the actions of religious fanatics are doing immense harm to the cause of the Allies. The chief actors in the disgraceful and unpatriotic scenes are the Orange Sentinel, a Presbyterian minister, named Palmer, and one Spence, president of the Guelph Ministerial Association. Palmer recently preached a sensational and altogether untruthful sermon in which he accused the Jesuits of Guelph of harboring in their novitiate fugtives from the Military Service act. The main accusations are:

No Popery in Canada

In the novitiate are forty-six men. Twenty-two of these are of military age. Nineteen of these twenty-two have entered the novitiate since the passing of the Military Service Act. All of these are sons of prominent Roman Catholics. Among the number is one J. A. Doyle, who presumably is a defaulter from justice, also a J. O'Leary, who is an acknowledged defaulter from justice, also a son of the Hon. C. J. Doherty, Minister of Justice, who is 20 years of age and came from the Province of Quebec and entered the novitiate on or about April, 1918, presumably to escape military service.

Not one of these men has obeyed the regulations of the M. S. A. in any way, and the Dominion Police who forced an entrance to the building on Friday evening, June 7, say they are all fit and would make a fine platoon in any regiment. On the evening of June 7, the Dominion Police, led by Inspector Menard, and Assistant Provost Marshal, Capt. A. C. Macauley, with a strong squad of men raided this institution.

On receiving the report the editor of AMERICA sent this wire to the rector of St. Stanislaus: "(1) Has there been any evasion of the Military Service Act? (2) How old is Mr. Doherty, the novice? (3) Are Doyle and O'Leary in your house? (4) Are they fugitives from justice? (5) How many men in your house? (6) How many have entered since passage of Military Service Act? (7) How old are the latter? (7) Was your house raided June 7?"

The answer received reads: "(1) None whatever; (2) On entering, nineteen years and three months; (3) No Doyle here. False report. O'Leary was an uneducated returned soldier with regular discharge. No connection with (Jesuit) Order. Gone hence now; (4) Not as far as we know; (5) Forty-four; (6) None; (7) All under military age on entering except John Holland, tonsured before Act and therefore exempted, and John O'Halloran, American subject; (8) Yes, most outrageously and at night. Cordon of fifteen armed men around the house. Breach of domicile. Notwithstanding protest entire community summoned to hall for examination. Three novices arrested unjustly to be brought to London, but not removed from house on account of Minister of Militia interposing by 'phone. Captain, chief of raid, punished. Government apologized. Whole trouble originated in bigoted agitation of Protestant minister who claims credit for it. Letter and clippings follow." From this it is clear that the preacher spoke only one true sentence, to wit, that there had been a raid. The rabid Orange Sentinel unconsciously shows the animus of the affair in these words:

So strong is the feeling among the Protestant ministers and people of Guelph that an indignation meeting has been arranged for the evening of Monday night next, when this whole affair will be discussed and ventilated. It will be held in the Norfolk Street Methodist Church, when it is expected that every Protestant denomination in the city will be respresented and resolutions submitted dealing with the case. It has excited the most intense indignation, which is spreading throughout Western Ontario.

A further significant item from the Ottawa Evening Journal reads:

The next step of the Guelph Ministerial Association in connection with the visit of military police to the Jesuit novitiate here is problematical. A meeting is being held this afternoon of the committee appointed to deal with the question, when it will be decided whether to go on with a public meeting of protest early next week.

The rector of the caluminated institution has issued this calm statement:

Particular pains had been taken at all times to accept none into the Order that were subject to the Act or any regulations or orders-in-council. Representatives of the Government had visited the novitiate and made inquiries, all of which had been fully answered, and the representatives had been given every opportunity to make any investigation they saw fit. It is understood that an official statement will be issued promptly by the Government dealing with the whole matter.

Mr. Doherty, the Minister of Justice, father of one of the accused Jesuits, writes in Le Devoir:

I desire to say simply that this article is false in everything that it insinuates concerning my son who would be culpable to have desired to violate or elude the law of military service. At the time when he entered the Order, he was not, by reason of his age, in any way subject to the law. Furthermore, it had been determined in the most authorized manner that he was physically unfit for military service.

Just at the time these items reached AMERICA the following news was received from England:

The Provincial of the Society of Jesus has just offered eleven more priests as chaplains to the Forces, and most of them crossed over to France on Tuesday last. This makes eighty-three members of the English Province of the Society who have become chaplains to the army or navy. Of these two have been killed, three have been invalided out of the service, and six have been wounded.

The Orange Methodist agitation should be judged in the light of these facts also. The best comment that has appeared on the Canadian affair is that "If the parsons of England and Canada continue in their present course they will win the war for the Kaiser, despite the efforts of the valiant Roman Catholic priests to defeat him."

Ireland.—Strange to say, the Irish Bishops are finding valiant defenders of their policy in England where feeling still runs high. After ridiculing the charge that the Irish Bishops and priests are playing a political game, the London Chronicle says:

Defense of the Bishops

The intervention of Cardinal Logue and the Bishops has been criticized in this country with much less than justice. They averted an armed outbreak by the more desperate spirits at a stage when otherwise it would have been a question of days and hours. They cannot avert it forever; but so long as they can, the situation remains one in which it is possible to negotiate, and that is all to the good—greatly to the good. Individual Bishops may be pointed to, who are not moderating influences, but they are not characteristic of the episcopal body; and they, too, are in effect restrained by the general action which the body has taken.

We see with unqualified regret the attempt which is being made to raise a "No-Popery" cry against them in this country. It only makes for further disintegration and bad blood, and entirely misrepresents the Irish situation. Most absurd of all is the notion that the Vatican inspired the action of the Bishops. There is no reason for regarding Cardinal Logue as any less free in his political action, so far as the Pope is concerned, than Cardinal Mercier or Cardinal Amette have been. The Vatican has very seldom intervened in Irish politics since the Union. When it has, it has done so on the side of order and the established government: as in Parnell's day, when it frowned on the plan of campaign.

Shortly after this appeared, Bishop Amigo of Southwark, England, declared:

The Irish people might have been with this country throughout in the fight against the common foe, but their sympathy has been alienated. It is time the Irish nature and the Irish question were better understood. The Irish Bishops have been blamed for their recent action, precisely because the situation in which they found themselves was not properly grasped by some people in this country. The Bishops of Ireland are learned and holy men, and I, for one, would not presume to sit in judgment on them. As a matter of fact knowing them as I do, I am in agreement with them. They could not have done otherwise, and the policy they adopted was one that had the effect of calming the Irish people and preventing more serious evils than people realize. Rather than criticize, we should pray for those splendid guardians of the flock.

England has revealed the alleged Sinn Fein plot and Irish and English opinion about it may be gaged by the following editorial comments from the Liverpool Catholic Times and Catholic Opinion:

The Plot

The Government has told its tale of the Irish-German plot to justify the arrest and internment of over a hundred Irishmen. Never were men arrested and deported from their own country on such a vague charge. Throughout the whole statement there is not even the pretense of definitely associating a single one of them with the alleged conspiracy. Nay, not a tittle of proof is brought forward to convince any reasonable person that in all Ireland a single individual had anything to do with the secret intrigues. . . . In the official statement it is asserted that it became clear very soon after the rising the Sinn Fein leaders were asking Germany for help. But at this time the Sinn Fein organization had been smashed up. Those of the leaders who had not been shot were in prison or interned for more than a year. How then could it be stated with accuracy that, as the Government says, negotiations between the Executive of the Sinn Fein organization and Germany had been virtually continuous for three and a half years?

The insinuations of the Government's statement are wanting in definiteness and collide, instead of harmonizing, with facts. Are we to assume that the sternness and vigilance of the Maxwell and Duke régimes, under which the police and courts-martial were constantly at work, were useless and that Sinn Feiners in Ireland were, nevertheless, able to conspire with Germany? The assumption would be preposterous. There is no proof of any such plotting.

This particular editorial warns the Government that the British workmen will not tolerate such knavery. A second editorial declares:

With the exception of some officials, a few Orange newspapers that are always hostile to Irish democracy, and lastly the editor of the Irish Times, the paper which called for a further application of "the surgeon's knife" after the Dublin executions, all Irishmen, Nationalist, Unionist, and Sinn Fein, ridicule the Government's "German plot" as a manifest absurdity. That is the common attitude of the people, as attested by the special correspondent of the Daily News. In Dublin, he says, even Unionists and the most violently anti-Sinn Fein of the Nationalists simply laugh at the Government's "evidence." They take it for granted that the Government are acting insincerely. This atmosphere of utter disbelief in the truthfulness of English Ministers pervades the whole fabric of society. Mr. William O'Brien is convinced that since the "Popish Plot" there has been nothing more disgraceful to English statecraft and that Mr. Lloyd George's story has been read with the same mingled indignation and contempt as were read the forged letters published by the authors of "Parnellism and Crime." Cardinal Logue, the Archbishop of Dublin, the Archbishop of Cashel and the other Catholic prelates share the sentiments of the people and are facing the crisis with the same resolute determination.

A third comment is:

Since the Government's account of the plot has appeared in the press it has been subjected in Ireland to criticism which leaves it a wreck. For the events connected with the rebellion of 1916 a number of men were executed. The Government appear to have forgotten that a large number of others, including leaders now under arrest, were sent to penal servitude or interned. The official statement says: "It became clear very soon after the rising that the Sinn Fein leaders were again asking Germany for help." It has been pointed out that the alleged appeal must have been made twelve months before De Valera and the majority of the men now interned were released. Bernstorff is represented as having sent a long message on July 25, 1916, explaining that the work of reorganizing the rebels was making good progress. Obviously if Bernstorff despatched such a message it did not affect men who were imprisoned or interned. Again, on January 18, 1917, Bernstorff stated that his Irish committee held that without German troops a rising would be useless. At that time the leaders were still in prison or interned at Frongoch. It is ridiculous to say, as the official statement does, that "negotiations between the Executive of the Sinn Fein organization and Germany have been virtually continued for three and a half years," for the Sinn Fein Executive has, it seems, been in existence only since June, 1917, having been formed after the release of the prisoners and those who were interned. Thus from an examination it becomes evident that allegations made in the official statements do not tally with facts.

On June 20 Earl Curzon announced that the Government's plan for Home Rule had been abandoned "for the time being"; conscription too is to be held off, for the Earl and the Cabinet feel that it is better to get 50,000 volunteers than to secure a larger number of recruits "at the cost, perhaps, of civil war." The announcement of the abandonment of self-government for Ireland has raised a storm of discussion. The London Daily Mail comments:

Home Rule's Fate

Home Rule is dead.' Irish conscription is dead, and the whole Irish policy of the Government has fallen crumbling to the ground. From the opening to the close of this last wretched chapter in the history of the Irish question the Government has been consistently disingenuous, vacillating, and dilatory. . . . Apart from military considerations, the condition of Ireland today is a mockery of every profession to which we give utterance as vindicators of the ideals of justice and freedom.

The Manchester Guardian says:

So there is an end of the whole policy of conscription and Home Rule alike. The whole procedure is in the highest degree discreditable to the Government and is barely even intelligible, except on the assumption that conscription was introduced for the express purpose of getting rid of Home Rule. A less circuitous method might, one imagines, have been contrived, and one which did not involve the locking up in Ireland, at the very crisis of the war, of good men.

The Dublin correspondent of the New York Times cabled under date of June 22:

Lord Wimborne's declaration of his disbelief in the existence of any new plot, and his statement that he and all the members of his administration were in ignorance of any fresh evidence, is regarded as proving that the plot story was merely designed to provide the Government with an excuse for breaking its pledges to the Irish Convention and to Ireland. His challenge to Lord Curzon to put the accused on their trial is quoted already as vindication of the prisoners and proof of the injustice of their detention without trial.

The dispatch proceeds to say that the feeling produced in Ireland is reflected in the East Cavan election by which the deported Sinn Feiner, Arthur Griffith, was elected to Parliament over the Nationalist candidate by a vote of 3,792 to 2,581. The London Times commenting on this state of affairs affirms that conscription will be carried out later.

Rome.—The effects of the Holy Father's successful negotiations of the exchange of prisoners are still being made evident. The fifteenth exchange of prisoners between Italy and Austria took place recently when thirty-four officers and 263 privates arrived at Como from Austria and 290 Austrians departed from Italy. On May 8 the Swiss Red Cross transferred to Como 320 Italian soldiers, among them many officers.

Exchange of Prisoners

The Holy See denounces the action of those speculators who deceive the relatives of the missing and the wounded, and demand money under the pretense of interesting the Pope and of obtaining information concerning prisoners and of securing their return to their native land. Many letters have arrived at the Vatican exposing the infamous traffic. As a consequence the Holy Father again announces that his efforts in behalf of the prisoners and the wounded are charitable in the complete sense of the word, and that no compensation whatever is expected for what he does. Those who offer for a price to enlist his favor are frauds indulging in a despicable form of deceit with which the Holy See has no part and against which the solemn warning, already given, is once more repeated.

The Pope recently took occasion to protest against the campaign of calumny to which he has been unjustly subjected. The following dispatch from Rome summarizes the autograph of the Holy Father A Papal Autograph which appeared in full in the Osservatore Romano:

The Pope complains of the sad period the world is going through and also of attacks from "the enemies of religion to the supremest authority, Jesus Christ." He adds that he is greatly afflicted "not only by the indescribable horrors of the war, which, without parallel in the history of the world, threatens to drag poor Europe to the bottom of an abyss, but also by an insidious and skilful campaign of calumnies and hatred against the person of the Pontiff and his work."

The Pope, in a recapitulation of his action since the beginning of the war, says that his efforts to bring about peace have been misjudged and misinterpreted, even his silence about this or that crime being calumniously interpreted, his critics not admitting that "in the present uncertainty of this blaze of passions, it is impossible to inflict condemnation for each crime while all are included in a condemnation pronounced according to the general principle."

The Pontiff regrets that such a campaign has been conducted also against the clergy and Catholics, thus spreading the seeds of discord among various classes. The autograph ends with a protest denouncing the campaign, not only to the Faithful, but all honest people, wherever they happen to be, and a reaffirmation that it is the Pope's duty to defend the sanctity and honor of the Church.

The dignity of this appeal to fair-minded persons is well calculated to act as a check to the anti-Papal propaganda which has been rife in Europe and to some extent has been taken up in the United States. However, in some quarters, the Holy Father's words will have no effect. For instance, on Monday, June 17, Il Progresso of New York asserted that on June 29 the Pope would issue an important document on the war, and on June 22 the New York Times contained an alleged dispatch from Charles Grasty to the effect that "a message has been intercepted from the Papal Nuncio in Vienna to the Pope, forecasting definite plans for an early peace meditation by the Vatican." The significance of this sinister journalism will escape no one.

Russia.—"A new autocrat rules in Russia. This autocrat is the thug and his scepter is the gun," reports Mr. Simeon Gest, a musician who arrived in New York last week from Odessa. He left the latter city early in March when the Bolsheviki were in complete control there, and thus describes their regime:

The Odessan Terror

The Bolsheviki made their presence first known in Odessa by the inauguration of mob rule. Out of the slums, the very dregs of criminal life, these men who called themselves Bolsheviki came in great hordes to rob, pillage, and destroy. Conditions were especially frightful in the week of January 27. The young Russian officers and the military cadets joined the Ukrainians. They fortified the railroad station with guns and were able to resist attack from the Bolsheviki until the latter seized a big battleship in the harbor. From the battleship they trained their guns on the city, and treated the inhabitants to a nightly bombardment for several nights in succession. Men, women and children went crazy with fear. Under the protection of the battleship the Bolshevist Red Guards rifled the city high and low. They were made up of hooligans, released criminals from Siberia, drunken soldiers and sailors, and a mob of the unemployed, idle because they would not work. Wherever they saw a row of quite respectable looking houses, they seized upon that zone as a field for immediate operations. Placing their machine-guns in the street, they would bombard house after house, smashing windows, doors, and demolishing everything in the interior.

After 6 o'clock it was taking one's life in his hands to walk out. You would hardly have turned the first corner before a Bolshevik would approach out of some shadow and shout "Hands up!" Hands up it would be if you valued your life. Then the Bolshevik would go through your pockets at his leisure and take whatever of value he found.

Under the decree of the Soviet of Workmen Without Work, the Bolsheviki one day issued a decree that the rich of the city should turn over to the Bolsheviki 10,000,000 rubles forthwith. The Mayor advocated that the 10,000,000 rubles be utilized for inaugurating public works which would give employment to the great army of unemployed, but the Soviet of Workmen Without Work considered his suggestion counter-revolutionary.

The Bolsheviki issued a decree that the bourgeosie must pay 40,000,000 rubles for no reason but that they believed that sum existed in the city at the time. They seized ninety-six of the richest men in the city and imprisoned them until they paid over most everything they had.

One day they seized all the army and naval officers they could find and took them down to the waterfront, where they drowned them one after another. They took General Tomashgevitz, President of the League of House Owners in Odessa, hurled him into a furnace of a battleship and burned him alive.

The people had no protection against these outrages. On being attacked you might call to your assistance some gendarmes, only to find that the gendarmes had also become Red Guards and were out to rob you.

An After-War Problem

FRANCIS CARDINAL BOURNE

I AM honored by the invitation of the Editor of AMERICA to say a few words to his readers on the subject of the social problems which will have to be faced by the Catholics of the English-speaking world, when the prolonged years of the war come at last to an end. These problems will have to be faced by all; Catholics can confront them in the light of clearly ascertained and well-defined principles.

I am taking it for granted that in the main outlines the conditions of social life are the same on both sides of the Atlantic. Naturally I can speak with personal knowledge only of the conditions as I see them here in England.

There are two main principles which must guide us to a true solution. First, the right of every human being to a true human, and not a mere animal, existence; and, next, the account which every man must render to his Creator of the use of the talents that he has received, including material wealth.

The observance of these two principles is practically impossible in very many cases at the present day. There is quite a large section of the community condemned by undeserved poverty to a non-human mode of existence. There is a considerable number of men whose wealth is so colossal as to be beyond their own real knowledge and control.

It is in the readjustment of these two abnormal conditions that part at least of the solution of the main problem is to be found.

Leo XIII has established once for all the right of every man, who is willing to labor by brain or hand or both, to a living wage, and to all that a living wage connotes. He will need more as his existence develops and he passes from the single to the married life. The one room that sheltered him in decent comfort as a bachelor will be no fit dwelling when he has taken to himself a helpmeet to share his life and fortunes. And the modest tenement, fit and suitable in the days of early married life, will no longer be sufficient when God, by his means, has brought other persons into being who need space and air and house-room in conformity with the decencies of life.

In like manner his wages must also grow. The lad of sixteen or eighteen, living in his parents' home, needs evidently far less than the man who has to fend for himself; and the same man will be debarred from marriage, or unable to fulfil the duties of a married man, unless, progressively, the rewards of his labor are made commensurate with the natural claims upon them.

Lastly, a man must have some guarantee that the human life, which he has rightfully built up for himself, shall not be ultimately and utterly shattered by ill-health or unemployment.

There are millions of persons in our countries for whom these necessary conditions are never realized. All their lives they are forced to be content with dwellings that are badly built and equipped, unfit for a growing family, and wanting in ordinary conveniences. They are tied by the exigencies of their daily toil to a particular locality and must perforce put up with the accommodation that they can find. Their weekly income will never rise beyond a miserable pittance, to be eked out, perhaps, by the labor of the wife and mother whose time and thoughts and leisure are, and ought to be, abundantly absorbed within the walls of the home itself. Before their eyes there is ever the specter of the possibility of unemployment if health fails, or a business collapses. In many cases there is only the bare margin of a weekly wage between them and the abyss of destitution, to be guarded against only by the gradual sale, in other words, by the destruction of the slowly and painfully acquired goods, chattels and adornments of the laboriously constructed home. When this destruction has taken place, a man may well think that all the hope and joy of his life are destroyed for ever, and that for him, his wife and children a human existence is no longer possible.

When we turn to the other side of the picture, we realize that there is nothing in the nature of things to render such a condition in any way necessary. It cannot be urged that the goods of this world are insufficient for the maintenance of all those who dwell therein, and, that, therefore, some must inevitably go short. We see everywhere, and on every side, and nowhere more than in the English-speaking countries, evidences of wealth and plenty. Money is being acquired and heaped up in the ownership of individuals to such an extent that it must be quite impossible for the possessor to control adequately either its acquisition or its outlay. He does not know, in many cases he simply cannot know, at what cost in human life and energy and happiness it is being obtained. The production of enormous personal fortunes is nowadays of so complex a character that all contact has been lost between the producer and the receiver. The great landowner, rich in the rents and products of his farms and lands, might indeed be hard and selfish and self-seeking, but he had the means of knowing and the opportunity of discovering, if he chose to do so, how his dependents lived, and the power to ensure them housing, comfort, and permanency of occupation. He could know their lives and enter into them. Men like the late Duke of Norfolk regarded their possessions as a sacred trust, to be preserved indeed and handed on from generation to generation, but charged with many a duty of justice and charity and religion. So, too, are we told of the Duke of Northumberland, who passed away the other day, that he regarded his position as one fraught with vast responsibilities, imposing upon him a personal duty of which he must render an account to God. In the case of the industrial magnate, whether he be an individual in sole control, or one of a numerous corporation, the account of his stewardship, and the giving back of his five talents enhanced by yet another five, is a vastly more difficult business. What can he know, in many cases, of the conditions of life of those who are toiling with these talents. How can he answer for them to God?

If the acquisition of his wealth brings with it an enormous burden of responsibility, the disbursement of it is hardly less responsible. The use and enjoyment to be gained from wealth is after all of a limited nature. Even when the multi-millionaire has exhausted every satisfaction to be derived from a palatial town residence and a country property of many acres, from a steam yacht and a racing stable, from the entertainment of his friends and the distractions of foreign travel, there will still be a vast residue to be held and employed as a trust from God. If a rich man's salvation is essentially a difficult matter, what shall one say of those who are so overweighted by their wealth as to be unable to trace effectively either its origin or its destination, or to bear adequately the obligations attaching to it?

Clearly such conditions are unnatural and abnormal. The poor man is forced to struggle for his living wage, obtained too often after weary struggles and at the cost of strikes which disorganize and paralyze industry. The rich are led to think that the accumulation of wealth is the main object of life, and the strike is fought by the lock-out. In both cases the sanctification and the salvation of souls created for an eternal destiny are exposed to needless jeopardy. Meanwhile, there is wealth in plenty to satisfy both worker and capitalist, to give the toiler due comfort, security and rest, and to ensure to the employer every legitimate satisfaction that he may rightfully claim. The problem to be solved is to find a way of distributing the surplus wealth so that the poor man, manual laborer or inferior clerk, may have the additional remuneration that he so urgently needs; and the rich man no longer receive the heaped up increment which he in no sense requires and cannot efficiently control.

The war, which is gradually leading men to seek solutions of difficulties too little regarded in less strenuous times, has recently brought into existence in England a "National Alliance of Employers and Employed," which, after several conferences, has arrived at a mutually accepted concordat covering such points as the living wage, hours of labor, women's pay, workshop conditions, housing, knowledge and efficiency, joint committees, maximum output and wages, security of employment, organization and agreements, education and technical training. Such an effort is surely entitled to the warmest sympathy and support on the part of Catholics. While the true principles which must underlie co-operation of this kind, if it is to be effective, are furnished to us by the full revelation of the teaching of Jesus Christ enshrined in the Catholic Church, we cannot hope to make those principles an active force in our countries, where non-Catholics are so numerous, unless we bring them into operation among those who are willing to accept them, even though they are unwilling or unable to recognize the real source from which those principles spring. It is in this quiet persistent infiltration of Christian and Catholic teaching that the hope of the future is to be found. The old materialism is dead; the political economy of forty years ago has been declared bankrupt; men are looking forward to a new era of happier human relationships after the war. If Catholics are to be, as God most certainly means them to be, powerful instruments for the regeneration of mankind, they must not be satisfied with a knowledge of their religion which will suffice for their own personal piety and devotion; but they must see how modern problems are to be solved in the light of the teaching of the Catholic Church; how, in other words, the eternal unchanging truths of the Gospel answer the questionings of the restless modern world.

This is the new insistent mission of those who have received the inestimable gift of the Catholic Faith. Some, from their advantages of education, position, natural talent, can accomplish more than others. But all, from the humblest laborer to the most powerful captain of industry, have the duty of proclaiming the social value of the doctrine of Jesus Christ. In his own sphere and measure every Catholic may be, nowadays more than ever, the light of the world, and the salt of the earth.

In every land, under every flag, new opportunities are given to Catholics to carry out this mission which they alone can discharge. Nowhere will the opportunity be greater or more full of hope than in the two great peoples who use the English tongue, and who are now so closely and providentially united in a common seeking after justice under the Stars and Stripes and under the Union Jack.

Father Secchi's Work

A. L. Cortie, S.J., F.R.A.S.

IN appraising the life-work of Father Secchi, it is well to remember that he was one of the pioneers in a new department of astronomical science, and was one of the founders, with Huggins and Lockyer in England, Janssen in France, Young in America, Zöllner and Spörer in Germany, and his countryman, Respighi, of what is now known as astrophysics. The older astronomy dealt mainly with the observations of the positions, motions and distances of the heavenly bodies, and the laws to be deduced from such observations. The newer astronomy is concerned more with the physical appearances of the heavenly bodies; and more particularly with their constitution as revealed by the spectroscope.

The "Encyclopædia Britannica," Ed. 9, Vol. XXI, p. 616, gives a short account of Secchi's life, and a list of his principal works. It speaks of his devotion and perseverance in researches in physical astronomy and meteorology and his preoccupation with spectrum analysis both of the stars and the sun. It sums up his scientific work by declaring that "though his publications always bear witness of his indefatigable zeal and energy, they are often uncritical and wanting in accuracy." This judgment is typical of the insular Protestant prejudice of some of my countrymen and is a process familiarly known as "damning with faint praise."

Much more generous is the judgment of the anonymous writer of his obituary in the "Monthly Notices," Royal Astronomical Society 39, p. 241, who declares that his was "a career which had shed luster on his country and had added another to the long list of names of which the Jesuits are so justly proud." The writer praises the Italian Government in its dealings with Secchi, so presumably he was not a Catholic.

In 1910 a meeting of the members of the International Union for Cooperation in Solar Research was held at the Mount Wilson Observatory, Pasadena, California. Besides many leading American astronomers and physicists, there were present delegates from Austria, Canada, France, Germany, Great Britain, Holland, Italy, Russia, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland. It was with extreme pleasure that the delegates heard Professor Ricco of Catania speak of the projected Secchi Memorial, and a formal resolution was passed which expressed "the hope that the Secchi Memorial Fund now being raised in Italy may be devoted to a tower telescope with spectro-heliograph." This at least is an index of the esteem in which Angelo Secchi's name and work is held by those who were representing the leading astronomical and physical societies and academies of the world.

Secchi's output of scientific work was enormous, and, exclusive of his larger books and the publications of his observatory, is comprised in some 300 memoirs and papers which were contributed by him to various scientific societies and journals. It may be briefly summarized under three heads, astrophysical, geophysical, and physical. When Secchi was called to the direction of the Roman College Observatory in 1849 he commenced his career by building a new observatory. As early as the year 1750 one of his predecessors, the illustrious Father Boscovitch, had conceived the design of erecting an observatory on the summit of one of the massive piers which support the dome of the Church of St. Ignatius. This design was resuscitated by Secchi and carried into execution, aided by the generous contributions of Pope Pius IX and of the General of the Society of Jesus, Father Roothan. The new observatory was opened in 1852 and speedily equipped for astronomical work by the acquisition of a a refractor, nine-inch aperture, made by Merz of Munich, a large meridian circle by Ertel, and a smaller refractor, three-inch aperture, for observing sunspots. Powerful spectroscopes, many of them of Secchi's own design, were later added to the equipment.

Seven years of hard work resulted in a revision of Struve's catalogue of double stars. The number of stars passed in review was 10,000. The results appeared in the Memorie del Collegio Romano (1859), which were succeeded by two supplementary lists published in 1868 and 1875. Secchi was most versatile, his observations embracing almost all the heavenly bodies. He made a nonchromatic map of the great crater on the moon, Copernicus, and the Royal Society of England had many photographic copies of this map distributed among observers. He was also a pioneer in lunar photography. He made numerous and valuable observations of the planets Mars, Jupiter and Saturn and of the four greater moons of Jupiter. These studies were detailed in one of his later works, "Il Quadro Fisico del Sistema Solare," published at Rome in 1859. In 1852 he detected the companion to Biela's comet, and in 1874 was the first to observe the complete hydrocarbon spectrum in that of Coggia's comet.

But these observations, valuable though they are, were merely subsidiary to his main line of research, which was solar and stellar physics. The magnitude and importance of Secchi's solar observations can be gaged by a perusal of his monumental work, "Le Soleil," published at Paris in 1870 and reprinted in 1875-77, or by consulting the books on "The Sun" written by Young and by Abbot. In every department of solar work he was eminent. He studied the nature, the distribution, the life histories, the depths, the movements of sun-spots. As early as 1861 he suggested that the sun was mainly gaseous, and he was one of the pioneers in the registration of its effective radiation. When in 1860 Kirchhoff and Bunsen had introduced spectrum analysis as an adjunct to astronomy. Secchi was quick to appreciate its importance in relation to the study of the sun. He commenced a series of systematic researches on the hydrogen envelope of the sun, called the chromosphere, and on the solar prominences. He distinguished four aspects of the former and three orders of the latter. The observations which he inaugurated at the Roman College Observatory are still continued, so that no other observatory in the world possesses a series of observations of this character, maintained for so long a time. Secchi's name is also prominent in that he was the first astronomer to elucidate any clear idea about the distribution of prominences on the solar limb (1869-71). He also made a map of the solar spectrum and noticed the absence of helium absorption among the dark lines of the spectrum. He attempted to measure the effective temperature of the sun's photosphere, and in 1870 made a careful study of the separate effects of the action of the solar atmosphere on luminous, thermal and chemical rays, deriving a value, eighty-eight per cent, of the total absorption of radiations taken together, and demonstrating that the light from the limb is no longer white, but reddish brown.

The first attempt to photograph a total solar eclipse was made in 1851, when a daguerreotype taken by Berkawski at Königsberg showed the solar prominences. At the eclipse of 1860 Secchi and Warren de la Rue first employed photography effectively. Their photographs showed the prominences so well that a comparison of the pictures proved that these prominences were progressively obscured by the edge of the advancing moon. This was conclusive evidence that they were of solar origin and did not belong to the moon, as had been supposed by some eminent astronomers. The solar course barely visible on De la Rue's plates, was well shown, with all its details, to a distance of fifteen minutes of arc from the sun's limb on those of Secchi. Ten years later he successfully observed another total solar eclipse in Sicily, on December 20, 1870. That was the eclipse at which the American, Young, discovered the reversing layer, a narrow envelope in which the absorption which gives rise to the dark lines in the solar spectrum is effected. The warning of the approach of the "flash spectrum," or the reversal of all the dark into bright lines, is given by the gradual fading out of the dark rays, a phenomenon which had been accurately described by Secchi in 1869.

But Secchi's greatest and most enduring work as an astrophysicist was the division of stellar spectra into four groups or classes. With Sir William Huggins in England, Secchi is deservedly regarded as one of the founders of stellar spectroscopy. The work of each supplemented that of the other. Aided by a chemist, Miller, Huggins directed his observations to the accurate determination of the origins of the spectral radiations in stars. Secchi's work was more extensive and consisted in a spectroscopic survey of the heavens, in which he observed the spectra of no less than 4,000 stars. From these observations he derived his great generalization by which the stars are divided into classes of gradually increasing complexity of spectrum. To type 1, in which the lines of hydrogen are very marked, he assigned about half the stars in the heavens. Type 2 contains the stars which are characterized by numerous faint dark lines in their spectra. Our sun is a member of this class. In the stars of type 3 is a system of nebulous bands which are sharper on the edges turned towards the violet end of the spectrum. In type-4 stars a band spectrum is also in evidence, but the bands in this case are more defined on their red edge sides. Many fainter deep red stars belong to the category. Father Secchi rightly ascribed the appearance of the bands in the stars of this class to the presence of carbon in some form in their atmosphere. He published numerous catalogues and lists of star spectra, the result of many laborious observations. Two of his best-known memoirs dealing with stellar spectra are the "Catalogo delle Stelle di cui si è Determinato lo Spettro Luminoso," published at Paris in 1867, and "Sugli Spettri Prismatici delle Stelle Fisse," published at Rome in 1868. Of necessity modern researches have considerably amplified and extended Secchi's types. Various rearrangements have been suggested, in particular the Draper classification of the Harvard Observatory, now universally adopted, but even so, Secchi's types still form a first and ready term of reference for the greatest number of stars in the heavens. They fit admirably into the Harvard classification as genera to species.

Geophysics includes the sciences of geodesy, terrestrial magnetism and meteorology, and in each of these departments Secchi was a distinguished and original worker. In 1854 he was commissioned by the Papal Government to execute the measurement of a geodetic base-line for the triangulation of the Papal States, extending over an arc of two degrees, between Rome and Rimini along the Appian Way. With regard to terrestrial magnetism, he founded in 1858 an observatory for its study, which for a long period was the only one in Italy. In meteorology he derived his inspiration from the eminent American hydrographer and meteorologist, F. M. Maury, with whom he formed a close friendship during his stay at Georgetown University in Washington. Secchi invented the celebrated meteorograph, an instrument by which automatic registrations are made at the same time and at short intervals of time, of barometric pressure, temperature, rainfall, and the direction and velocity of the wind. One of these instruments was exhibited at the Paris Exhibition in 1867 and gained for him the gold medal. He was also decorated with the Legion of Honor by Napoleon III, and with the Grand Cordon of the Order of the Rose by the Emperor of Brazil. In connection with his activities in geophysics, one episode in his life is worth recounting. On the occasion of the Metrical Congress, which met in Paris in the year 1872, the Italian Foreign Minister, Viscount Venosta, protested against the recognition of Father Secchi, the Vatican delegate, as a representative of a "State." Accordingly Count de Rémusat, the French Foreign Minister, gave a formal declaration that the presence of Father Secchi on that occasion could not constitute a diplomatic precedent!

In physics Secchi is best known by his book, "Sulla Unità delle Forze Fisiche," which was an attempt to coordinate all natural forces under the general notion of kinetic energy, an original idea in those times. The work is of course based on a theistic foundation, and traces back all the phenomena of matter and motion to a Divine creative act. It appeared first in Rome in 1864. The second edition, published at Milan in 1874, had a great vogue, and was translated into French, English, German and Russian. One of his best purely physical memoirs on "Electrical Rheometry" was contributed to the Smithsonian Contributions to Knowledge, III, 1852.

How he found time to undertake all these labors is difficult to surmise, for he was actively engaged in the direction of his own observatory and was also a professor of astronomy. He also delivered many lectures to the public on his favorite science, the most famous being that on the sun, which was attended by more than 300 of the Bishops of the Vatican Council.

Honors were showered upon him; he was elected a foreign member of the Royal Society of England in 1856 and an Associate of the Royal Astronomical Society in 1853. He was also a member of the French Academy of Sciences, and of the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg. In his native land he was one of the Società Italiana de XL, and was for some years president of the Accademia dei Nuovi Lincei. But above all he ever remained a loyal and devoted son of the Catholic Church and a humble, zealous priest.

Catholic Publicity and the War

MICHAEL WILLIAMS

WITHIN the last few weeks I have read in daily papers and in secular weeklies and monthly magazines a large amount of matter concerning the war work of the Y. M. C. A. and the Salvation Army, and, of course, the Red Cross. But as the latter is truly a non-sectarian, national organization, in which Catholics are heartily and efficiently represented both as supporters and as active workers, nothing more need be said, in the present connection, concerning the Red Cross. My design at this time is to point out, with all the emphasis its grave importance demands, the fact that while the Y. M. C. A. and the Salvation Army, both of which are militantly and exclusively Protestant in their nature, their leadership, and their essential purposes—however much the Y. M. C. A. incidentally may assist individual Catholic soldiers and sailors in temporal ways—are receiving widespread and persistent publicity, Catholic war work is not.

Yet Catholic war work, in the hands of our Bishops, promoted by the laity, and so largely managed and carried on by the Knights of Columbus, whose national organization now appears as a most palpably providential mechanism for meeting the vast emergency of the times, far transcends in genuine and lasting importance all other forms of war work, and this for the simple reason that spiritual concerns are always, and of necessity, more important than temporal affairs, even as the soul is more important than the body. And our Catholic war work seems to be getting itself organized and carried on with wonderful vigor and effectiveness. Wherefore it is all the more deplorable that it is not receiving wider and better publicity; and it is all the more necessary that our publicity methods be changed and broadened and enlarged to be commensurate with the greatness of our opportunity.

During the big K. C. drive in New York city a few months ago the papers were full of the news of it, full of the inspiring patriotism and splendid zeal of it; full, too, at the end, of the wonderful and hopeful success of it. From time to time since then the daily papers have told the tidings of Catholic chaplains who proved themselves heroes under fire. When chaplains have been appointed to important posts, and other notable things have occurred in Catholic war work, the papers have paid attention. But let us remember two things which are of great importance, first, that the publicity achieved by the K. C. drive was mainly dependent upon our own organized effort to obtain adequate publicity on that memorable occasion; and, second, that when chaplains are decorated for bravery, or fall on the field, or when really big public meetings are held, or announcements made by cardinals or bishops, such events are in themselves of a kind to compel attention on the part of newspapers, news agencies, and war correspondents. But the Protestant bodies engaged in war work very wisely refuse to depend upon the fortune of events, or the work of others, in the tremendously important matter of publicity. They organize their publicity departments. They "work the press," and, let me add, in a thoroughly legitimate and commendable manner. For example, the press of the country only a day or two ago carried the news that the Y. M. C. A. had despatched one of the best-known and most interesting special writers in the country to France to organize its publicity work in the field and write special articles about the Y. M. C. A. Every Saturday the Boston Transcript publishes one of a long series of special articles written by a Y. M. C. A. special commissioner who has studied religious conditions as affected by the war in practically every country of Europe; and I believe that this same excellent, but thoroughly Protestant, series of articles is appearing in syndicate form elsewhere.

Now, I take it for granted, though I do not know for a fact, that the Knights of Columbus have established a publicity bureau in connection with their war work. Perhaps it is only chance that has kept me from observing the results of their publicity work in the secular press, even although I keep a pretty sharp eye upon the press. Possibly, however, in the great stress of the times, in the rush and grind of the war work itself—work which is of course more essential than publicity—the detail of publicity has been swept aside, at least for a time. But surely, surely, it will be only for a short time! Surely we must see and grant—and then act upon our knowledge of the fact—that we should be doing a far-reaching and noble and knightly and charitable service to the Knights of Columbus, to our Church, and to our beloved country, by organizing and carrying on a really practical, professional, efficient, up-to-date publicity department in connection with Catholic war work, at home and abroad.

We cannot, we must not, we ought not to trust to the secular press for our publicity. It is a most obvious fact that the secular press does not pay to Catholic news and views an attention at all commensurate with our numbers and our real value to the nation. But this fact is not due, in my judgment—and again I must repeat that I speak from an experience of some twenty years as an active newspaperman—to bigotry or malice. It is due to two things, first, to the fact that newspapers are not omniscient, all-wise things produced by spiritual beings or agencies, but are the productions of very human "humans" who are mostly in the same condition concerning Catholicism that sixty or seventy out of every hundred persons are in, namely, dense ignorance—I do not say invincible ignorance; nay, God forbid;—and second, it is due to our own supineness and indifference. The fantastic, injurious Christian Science humbug, a sect with perhaps 200,000 regular members at most, obtains from the press more respectful and constant attention than 18,000,000 Catholics. The reason why is simple: The C. S. people go out after the publicity. Therefore, if I may use the vivid vernacular, they "bring home the bacon." The primary lesson of publicity today is the necessity of the press agent or agency. Of course, you may say, if you like, that Catholics should ignore the press, and not compete with the Protestant sects and the queer cults for public attention. But if you say that, you incidentally set up a claim to be more spiritual and wiser and more Catholic than Popes Leo XIII, Pius X, and our Holy Father, Benedict XV; and also our Cardinals and our Bishops, our priests and our publicists, all of whom have repeatedly urged upon American Catholics the usefulness and the need for adequate Catholic social action through the press. Fellow-Catholics, let us listen to our God-given leaders, and then obey and follow them!

For myself, I believe that never has the opportunity to establish the apostolate of the press among the secular journals, and to broaden and better its work among our own papers, been so apparent and so appealing as today. It looks as if this opportunity were squarely up to the Knights of Columbus, and the Catholic societies and individuals so loyally backing up the Knights. For the full effect of the war work of the Knights, and of Catholic war work in general, will not be garnered, will not act upon the great mass of our fellow-countrymen as it should unless in connection with the war work there is carried on a publicity campaign which shall bring this work, and its underlying principles, to the attention of the whole nation. Our publicity methods should be made adequate to the greatness of this unique and incomparable opportunity.

For surely it is now obvious even to the most rudimentary intelligence that the great war is not merely a political war, nor a racial war, nor an industrial or commercial war; nor is it only a war between the two opposing principles of autocracy and democracy. Of course, it is partly political, partly commercial, partly racial, partly a struggle of two opposing philosophies; but we now know, even those of us who at first were blind, that fundamentally the war is the outward expression of the world-old struggle going on in the soul of man between the spiritual forces of good and evil. Predominantly, the war is religious, in the sense that through this vast catastrophe men and women are being forced to the feet of God. The greater part of the world had turned away from God; therefore, the war, or some equally great disaster, was bound to come; and now, upon the issue of the war, upon its spiritual issue, depends the future of mankind. Before us all is the question: What of Christ?

Catholics throughout the whole world in the storm and stress of the war have proved the social and national value of their principles. They have demonstrated their patriotism. They have displayed the light of their social philosophy which always makes for true social progress without revolutionary excess or deadening conservatism. Above the bloody whirlpool of clashing nations, parties, ideals and ideas stands immovably the Rock of Peter, and from it the Light of the World streams forth. Aye, but remember that the world must be told, and retold, and told again of all this; the world must constantly be reminded, or else the world will forget, and thus ignore the lesson. Remember, also, that bold and powerful, yes, and subtle and unscrupulous enemies of Christ and His Holy Church are active as never before in modern times. Be very sure that these enemies, even more than our misguided and mistaken Protestant brothers, will never neglect the press. If it is our opportunity to make known the beneficial and inspiring nature of Catholicism at this crisis in the history of the world, still more is it our duty. If ever there was a time in the whole course of Christianity when social action was required on the part of the Church, unquestionably this is that time, and truthful, vigorous, skilled, interesting publicity is one of the most potent branches of Catholic social action. Consider our opportunity. Think of the 60,000,000 American citizens who live outside the circle of any Christian belief. Think of the 20,000,000 or more who, though they are lamely and haltingly Christian, are outside the one true Church. Surely, then, it is a duty, it is the call of charity, to let the light of which we, though unworthy, are the custodians, shine forth. We must do so. But we cannot do so as we ought unless we do our social service in an up-to-date, practical, American way. We must organize our press service. Here, with our war work to begin with, and then, after the war, with our constructive and healing ideas, laymen may really work for and with their Bishops and their priests, and for their Holy Mother the Church, and for Our Blessed Lord, Jesus Christ, who alone can save this shattered world from plunging back into barbarism, or, what is perhaps worse, yielding to those forces which are striving so mightily to mold it into the awful form of a modern paganism whose social system would be State Socialism, which is slavery, and whose religion would be the last and worst of all idolatries, man's worship of himself.

French War Orphans

J. HARDING FISHER, S.J.

FOR some time Catholics have been disturbed by doubts as to the propriety of contributing to the association called "The Fatherless Children of France." Priests and editors have been consulted on the subject and numerous inquiries have been sent to AMERICA. A categorical answer is difficult to give, but the following facts may aid those who are interested to form their own judgment on the matter.

The alleviation of the pitiful lot of the French orphans whose fathers have so heroically died for the sake of freedom is a work which in itself is beyond criticism. The sincerity of those Americans who have realized the crying need and have opened their purses and given without stint to the noble cause, cannot be questioned. No suspicion whatever attaches to the American men and women who are soliciting funds for the French orphans. Nevertheless well-informed persons in France and elsewhere, about whose love for the French children there can be no doubt, have repeatedly expressed their fear that American money, and in particular that collected by "The Fatherless Children of France," is being used, contrary to declared wishes of its contributors and collectors, to subserve the purposes of anti-clericalism and anti-Christian hatred and to further a deliberate political scheme to rob French children of their faith.

The principal spokesman for this fear is M. Jean Guiraud, the editor of La Croix, the well-known Catholic daily of Paris, a newspaper that voices Catholic opinion so authoritatively that Mgr. Martel, the Bishop of Digne, recently spoke of it in the following terms of high commendation: "Never have the Catholics and the clergy had at their disposal an organ so well adapted to their needs and of such value." M. Guiraud is in Paris and has shown the deepest interest in the entire movement in favor of the French orphans, not merely in its broad outlines but also in all its ramifications. His broad-mindedness, accurate information, sterling Catholicism, and interest in the children is unquestioned. His opinion, therefore, especially as reinforced by the attitude of the educated Catholic body, has great weight. It has been expressed fearlessly, repeatedly and in the face of a rigid censorship, in many issues of La Croix, the files of which may be consulted by those who are interested.

One of the grounds of his anxiety is the concord which exists between the dominant political party of France and "The Fatherless Children of France." This association, according to Miss F. M. Schofield who has been perhaps the most actively interested person in its organization, is "merely a development of the Orphelinat des Armées." The latter association, as appears from a telegram sent to a delegate of "The Fatherless Children of France," on April 18, 1916, by M. Alfred Croiset, the President of the Orphelinat and at the same time the General Correspondent of "The Fatherless Children of France," is in entire agreement with the French Minister of Education. And it appears needless to remark that any society which is in entire agreement with the French Minister of Education must be regarded by Catholics if not with suspicion, at least with misgivings.

Twenty years and more of bitter experience with this branch of the French Government has made Catholics the world over very suspicious of any move made by it with regard to school-children. Its character and purposes are sufficiently clear from the Associations law, the expulsion of the religious, the confiscation of ecclesiastical property, and the removal of the crucifix from the schools. Recent events have only intensified deep-seated mistrust.

In the spring of 1916 M. Viviani fathered a project introduced in the Senate, which was to give the Préfet, that usually anti-clerical person, practical control over more than fourteen hundred thousand children. M. Viviani's name was in itself enough to fill Catholics with fear, but the articles of the bill further confirmed their anxiety. Eventually it passed the Senate; later it came before the Chamber; and on July 27, 1917, it became the law, which is known as the Loi sur les Pupilles de la Nation.

The adoption by the nation of the war orphans, which was the ostensible object of the law, had the fullest sympathy of Catholics, for they, no less than others, were eager to provide for the care and education of those whose fathers had fallen in the defense of France. The provisions of the law were such, however, as to give them only too well-founded reasons for serious apprehension. They made no secret of their anxiety lest the execution of certain articles of the bill should be so applied as to make of the children not so much wards of the nation as wards of the dominant political party and a prey to anti-Christian propaganda.

Accordingly they proposed amendments to the law which would guarantee the preservation of the faith of the children and insure its just application. Their amendments were swept aside, their protests disregarded; and in spite of their insistent representations, the political animus which permeated the entire bill controlled the debate, resolutely refused concessions, and vitiates the law now about to be put into operation. M. Painlevé, addressing the Masonic Ligue de l'Enseignement, voiced his jubilation when he described the war orphans as the "sacred battalion of democracy." This phrase, which has a sinister ring to all who know the nature of this powerful Masonic organization, was later characterized publicly by M. Guiraud as one that "unveiled his own [Painlevé's] designs and those of his friends to make these children minister to the triumph of the dominant political party."

The people of the United States, taken as a whole, have no realization of the true spirit of the law, but some of them have expressed doubts about it, and to reassure them concerning the education which the law proposes to give the children, M. Will Auberl, the Directeur des Services d'Etudes et d'Information at Washington, in a letter addressed to an inquirer on April 8, 1918, spoke of the law "as voted unanimously and without alteration in the Senate and the House." He added: "The most punctilious Catholic will not find therein anything to rouse his indignation or cause him worry."

These statements, emanating from the Haut Commissariat de la République Française, require some explanation. It is true that the bill, notwithstanding certain changes made in the Senate, was voted through practically unchanged, but this was done in opposition to Catholic wishes. The modifications accepted in the Senate were taken by the Catholic Senators to be a manifestation of good-will and the bill received their votes, not, however, without formal reserve as to many of its articles, in the expectation that it would undergo still further changes in the Chamber, without which it would be neither acceptable nor satisfactory. They were deceived. When the bill came before the Chamber the Catholic deputies pleaded most earnestly for alterations in a number of articles, but were voted down systematically by the majority. When the final vote was taken the bill passed unanimously, but merely because M. Groussau and his party abstained from voting. Not approving of the bill, and finding in it grave cause for objection, they could not in conscience vote for it; on the other hand, being pledged to the union sacrée, they could not in honor vote against it. As a consequence they did not vote at all. No one can attach any value to so factitious an unanimity.

As for the further statement that "the most punctilious Catholic will not find therein anything to raise his indignation or cause him worry," it is not borne out by actual facts. The law has caused Catholics extreme indignation, it has caused them great worry in France, England, Ireland and the United States. The fact is that the worry in France has been so acute that it has stimulated French Catholics to unprecedented activity in order to obtain the modicum of minor positions open to election; it has led them to publish minute commentaries on the law with a view to making the beneficiaries aware of their rights; it has been the occasion of repeated warnings to Catholics to be on their guard against Government officials and not to let themselves be made the victims of disastrous deception. Catholics should remember the words of M. Guiraud on the subject:

> In spite of the acceptable changes which our friends have made it undergo in the Senate, in spite of the liberal promises extorted in the Chamber from the one who reported it and from the Government, this law is still full of danger for the autonomy of families, the religious conscience of the children, and the liberty of private and Christian charity.

Catholics have not forgotten M. Guiraud's declaration that the law was drawn up by the worst enemies of the Church and that its single purpose, in the beginning, at least, was the Masonic monopoly of the war orphans. They still recall the words of M. Groussau, who, making an official report on the law at the request of Cardinal Amette, the Archbishop of Paris, exposed its many dangers and stated that the just or disastrous execution of it would depend on the contingency whether the Catholics could and would mass sufficient strength to hold in check the great Masonic machine.

Such is the opinion which French Catholics entertain concerning the French Government's attitude towards the war orphans, as manifested in the recent law. Yet we are told by an official in high standing in "The Fatherless Children of France," that the association is in entire agreement with the French Minister of Education. The nature of this agreement needs some explanation before Catholic anxiety can be set at rest. Catholics are eager to assist the French orphans, but they do not wish to play into the hands of the French Freemasons in the scheme to rob the children of their faith. A second paper on the subject will give further details of the campaign against the children of France carried on, unfortunately, by the aid of American money contributed in part by Catholics.

"The Great Thousand Years"

JOHN C. REVILLE, S.J.

IT was not in vain that the poet sang of the happiness of the man who knows the causes of things. For he it is who penetrates to the heart of life and reads the secrets of nature, humanity and God. He is the true philosopher. Such a man does not merely see in the physical, moral and spiritual world a succession of incoherent events, the loose and fragmentary counters of an insoluble puzzle. He sees a correlated whole. On the stage of life he beholds something more than the actors of a meaningless puppet show, moved by blind chance or cruel fate. He holds in his hand the thread which will lead him from the perplexing mazes through which so many stumble. He grasps an underlying principle around which countless facts naturally and easily cluster. It has ever been the dream of historians to discover such a principle around which they might group the events of the past. Bossuet and St. Augustine behold in the midst of the ceaseless activities of the race, contradictory though they may be, selfish and even criminal, the ever-watchful Providence of God using all things sweetly for His own Divine purposes and forcing even falsehood and evil to serve the cause of virtue and truth. Buckle in his "History of Civilization" maintains that the essence of history consists in intellectual progress, while a widely-spread system holds that economic laws lie at the foundation of all historic development.

The man who will contribute an explanation of the facts of history that will really deserve the name of a true philosophic principle will accomplish a great and lasting work. For history is not a mere collection of dates, the mere chronicling of battles, sieges, fortunes, the recording of the rise and the fall of empires. It is the study and the grasp of those motive powers which impel men along a certain definite course, not blindly, for men are free and the captains of their fate, but through their spontaneous correspondence and cooperation.

As in the life of the meanest flower that blows, there is a law of progress and development from birth to maturity and decay, and as the solar systems that sweep above our heads have their rising and their setting, majestically describe their pathway in the heavens, and then sail out of our ken on their downward curve, so humanity describes its orbit and keeps on in its appointed path. According to Mr. Ralph Adams Cram in his original essay, "The Great Thousand Years and Ten Years After" (Marshall Jones Company), in that orbit there is a rise and a fall. Each phase comprises 500 years. The ascent and the decline, the rise and the fall constitute the great cycle in which the race rounds out in miniature, if that expression can be used, its destinies, to swing once to the height of noble achievement, then to step on the down-grade of mediocrity or to be hurled into the depths of some world-wide calamity such as we are now witnessing.

Hitherto historians have not looked to the history of the race with that broad vision that encompasses a thousand years as its historical unit. Less extensive fields have so far caught their gaze. They have seen Rome at war with Carthage, Greece embattled at Marathon making a bulwark of her hoplites against the barbaric hordes of Persia; Spartan Kultur triumphing over Athenian culture in the Peloponnesian war; a Pope saving Roman civilization as Leo turned back Attila from the gates of the Eternal City, the Crescent humbled before the Cross at Lepanto, Vienna and Belgrade. They see now, with a broader vision and larger horizons, democracy fighting against autocracy for the liberties of the world. They have written of the Hundred Years' War, and the War of the Spanish Succession, and the Thirty Years' War and the Seven Years' War, and the Seven Weeks' War. No historian has yet given a complete philosophical survey of the cyclic thousand years, of their mighty struggles and underlying currents. But as Mr. Cram says in his suggestive essay, some time or other the truly original and authoritative historian will come, who will overleap the narrow spaces of history in which too many are now cabined and confined. Such a man will not be satisfied with the little space of a kingdom or a continent, nor the little span of the life of a race, much less a party or a dynasty. To such a man standing on the hill-top of vision "all times will unroll themselves in majestical sequence between darkness and darkness: coming from the shadow of the unrecorded, vanishing in the shadow of the unforeseen":

> Then will appear the unity of history, the Titanic pulsation that throbs through all time; and eras and epochs will take their proper place simply as sequent minutes assembling into the hours that make up the long day between the night that precedes and the night that follows after.

There can be no doubt as to the nobility of this conception of history. It is broad, simple, bold. It has a fine unity of perspective and purpose. Is it founded on actual facts? Is there a sufficiently strong foundation in the history of the race, especially from the coming of Christ, on which to build such a theory? It is not to be expected that all will accept what might be called Mr. Cram's "rhythmic" or "cyclic" theory of history, for it is as novel as it is startling. But he gives in outline a series of facts which go far to support it. That theory takes into account the law of unity that underlies the works of the Creator and admirably harmonizes the workings of the human heart in its long history, with those of the physical world. The diastole and the systole of the physical heart of man, Mr. Cram sees reproduced in the thousand years' diastole and systole of historic man. In history he sees the heart of the race throbbing in five-hundred-year epochs, "a tide that rises and falls in obedience to some primal and unknowable law, signalized in its beatings by the lives of men who are the instruments of the will of God, and such efficient instruments that now and then one almost feels that they themselves are the effective energy."

"The Great Thousand Years" of Mr. Cram are the years that extend from the time when Benedict of Nursia, the Patriarch of the Monks of the West and the Father of modern civilization, promulgated his rule in the year 510 of Our Lord to the year 1539, when, under the bidding of a tyrant, Richard Whiting, Benedictine Abbot of Glastonbury, sealed his faith with his blood. To many the statement will seem almost incredible. Yet novel and startling as the thesis may be, Mr. Cram has undoubtedly solidly built it up. Following, unconsciously perhaps, that scholastic theory of which in the "Substance of Gothic" he has already shown such a mastery, he sees in the Benedictine spirit, whether Cluniac or Cistercian, Augustinian, or Norbertine, Dominican or Franciscan, the form that vitalizes the society of those thousand years. The matter which that form vitalizes, the society with which it has to deal, is no longer the exhausted and effete stock of the South which had already done its work in Greece, Rome and Byzantium. It is the hardy stock of the North, the blood of Saxon, Frank, Burgundian, Lotharingian, and of the hardy tribes who looked upon the rugged shores and the billows of the northern seas. "The Great Thousand Years" are the offspring, then, he tell us, of the bridals of monasticism and northern blood.

The Boy Scouts

To the Editor of AMERICA:

John F. Fogarty's article, "Boy Scouting for Catholic Youth," in your issue of June 8, proved a lucid and interesting treatment of a timely subject. His effort to explain the changed attitude of Catholic churchmen toward the Boy Scout movement is commendable; how far his effort succeeded, must be left to each individual reader. In my opinion, vital phases of the question are left untouched.

The apparently radical change in the attitude of Catholic churchmen and educators in regard to this movement is very disturbing; many laymen are bound to be dismayed by such changes of Catholic opinion. As "scoutmaster" for a Junior Holy Name society, the past three years, conducting hikes, camping trips, etc., at considerable expense and an almost endless amount of troubles, my efforts to keep the Catholic lads from this scout movement, have been constant and successful. I was acting with the approval and at the request of the parish priest; I was led to believe that the movement was not the thing for Catholic youth. Now after three years of untiring effort, comes a reversal of opinion; this Holy Name Society is disbanded and supplanted by a troop of scouts! I hear the very movement from which I have been striving to keep the Catholic boys, openly recommended and lauded from the Catholic pulpits of the city.

Mr. Fogarty did not explain the position of Catholics regarding the boy scout manual. This is the official handbook of the society, which scouts are supposed to possess, to read and to study. In the chapter on "Health and Endurance," under the division "Conservation," a disgusting little dose of sex hygiene is administered to boyish readers, and a book on sex hygiene is boldly recommended to them. Are we to understand that Catholic scouts are permitted to read such matters? If they are forbidden the official scout manual, their position becomes inconsistent.

Again, how are Catholic troops going to maneuver around the question of summer encampments? In this city, where conditions are perhaps typical, the scouts maintain an elaborate camp where all troops of the city gather during the summer months. If the Catholic lads are recognized troops, they will be expected to attend the regular camp. They are thus brought into contact with the boys of various denominations and their leaders, as they would be in the public schools. They will have their Catholic scoutmasters, perhaps, but so would they have a sprinkling of Catholic teachers in the public schools. The same applies to patriotic gatherings in the Protestant churches, boy scout participation in public affairs, such as Billy Sunday revivals, Y. M. C. A. meets, etc. If it is necessary to safeguard the faith of Catholic soldiers at enormous expense by maintaining the K. C. army work, it should be even more necessary to safeguard Catholic children by keeping them in distinctively Catholic societies, and especially growing boys, whose fathers and brothers are fighting the battle of freedom.

We are surprised at the extremely large percentage of Catholic boys fighting for liberty in France. They are not the product of the Boy Scouts which has existed in America only for a brief ten years, but of the Junior Holy Name societies and the St. Aloysius Sodalities. Even the small branch of the Holy Name with which I was connected, in the three brief years of its existence, gave two seventeen-year-old boys to the service.

Another disadvantage arises from the notorious apathy of Catholic laymen, scored so frequently in these columns. Upheld for a time by the novelty of the thing, Catholic scoutmasters will soon lose interest. Then the Catholic troops will languish and die. The boys, however, will have been given the taste for "scouting" and we shall see them enrolled by the hundred among the Protestant Church troops. Satisfactory Catholic scoutmasters will continue to grow rarer as the Catholic men continue to respond to the call of their country.

The belief that the Catholic Church has to keep up to the times, is a fallacy. By keeping behind the times, the Church has saved civilization for the world. During the decline of the Roman Empire the infant Church had to decry courageously even the art of pagan Rome. She saved civilization, however, and it was not long before she produced Cimabue, Giotto and their followers, even to Da Vinci and Raphael. We need have no fear of our God-guided Church getting behind the times. For my part, the idea of the "Ancient Beauty" getting into the boy scout business, to keep up with the times, actually hurts!

I fail to see how the Scout movement, at its best, can be any improvement over the glorious confraternity of the Holy Name of Our Lord Jesus Christ, for Catholic boys at least. Nor can I see why the better features of the movement cannot be embodied in the Junior Holy Name Society, or any other Catholic boys' organization. A tasteful uniform could be adopted, branches formed under a national board, along the same lines as the scouts. The fact that a certain weak type of American Catholics object to the religious name is to be deplored; surely, there is little danger of inculcating too much piety among Catholic youth in this day and age.

The Chapel at Annapolis

To the Editor of AMERICA:

I was greatly interested in Mr. McWilliams' letter proposing a Catholic chapel at the Naval Academy, and hope it will soon be feasible. The naval authorities show the midshipmen every consideration in the exercise of their religion, but at the best it is difficult for the Catholic men to attend to their duties. St. Mary's, the Redemporist church in Annapolis, is the only Catholic church in the city and serves too for several country districts. It has a large and mixed congregation, both of city and country people, besides the midshipmen and Catholic residents in the Naval Academy, and there are at present only two priests to do the work of the parish, besides attending two country missions, at Millersville and Robinson respectively. These priests are full of piety and zeal, but they are heavily taxed, and outside of the routine work, they are unable to accomplish many of those things that are needful in order to raise and keep Catholic standards to the high plane so necessary, particularly in times like these when all religion is on trial as never before, with opportunities for good as never before. There are many things I would like to see accomplished for Catholicism, but the most practicable project from a financial standpoint is a chapel at the Naval Academy, where our Catholic midshipmen can attend Mass, not only on Sundays and holy days, but every day, where they can assist too at Benediction and other devotions, and have the Blessed Sacrament near enough for frequent visits. We can imagine the great good that would result. As it is, the midshipmen can attend one Sunday Mass only in town; they cannot get to Confession on Saturday, but have to go to Confession during Mass. There is usually only one available priest to hear Confessions at this Mass, and sometimes, though they hurry as fast as they can with propriety, the Confessions are not through in time for all to receive Holy Communion until after Mass; then they have to hurry immediately back to the Academy, making their thanksgiving on the way. But under these trying circumstances, which are the best that can possibly be arranged under regulations, the devotion of the midshipmen, their manner of assisting at Mass, going to Confession, receiving Holy Communion, are truly edifying, while never, no matter how hurried they may be, have I found them failing to show the courtesy of true Catholic soldiers. I must relate an incident:

It was the Sunday before the Feast of Corpus Christi when I attended the seven o'clock Mass, which is the midshipmen's Mass. I usually go at eight o'clock and had forgotten it is the midshipmen's privilege to go to Confession before the civilians. Arriving early, I went up at once to Father Rector's confessional. There was one midshipman ahead of me; seeing a lady approach, he bowed and stepped back, which I acknowledged with pleasure as an act of pure chivalry, for "first come, first served" is the rule at the confessional and altar rail, regardless of color, age, sex or race. Possibly as unaware of the midshipmen's privilege as I, a number of civilians were in line on the other side. Presently the whole squad of midshipmen arrived and lined up on both sides of the confessional, and there was quite a crowd of civilians also. As Father Rector came in he announced that the midshipmen would be heard first. I immediately entered the pew nearest me and knelt there to wait. As I left I heard a murmur of protest from the midshipmen behind me, whose soldierly chivalry shrank from seeing a lady give place to them, but I shook my head and signified my willingness to wait. Then the midshipman who had first relinquished his place to me, stepped forward and insisted I enter, holding the door of the confessional open and closing it after me. At the altar rail I again received the same chivalric courtesy. A midshipman, himself going to Communion, guided me through the crowd to an opening at the rail, although I am sure he lost his place and had to wait. Now there was a large crowd in church that morning and the midshipmen had every right to exercise the privilege given them by the Rector, yet they let their privilege wait on courtesy. They are strangers to me, but they have my earnest prayers. These are the kind of Catholic soldiers we need, whose devotion and chivalry is excelled only by the Catholic knights of King Arthur's Round Table. Knighthood today is not dead, for the Catholic religion still lives to foster this spirit in the hearts of her men. Catholic mothers have every reason to be proud of their boys at the Naval Academy. May they soon have a chapel there!

The Oklahoma Decision

To the Editor of AMERICA:

In AMERICA of June 8, Father Blakely states that "the Oklahoma decision, finding intent of the law in the intention of the legislator indicates that in case the State Legislature should enact a law for the specific purpose of forbidding the Mass we should have no redress in the State Courts, and if the opinion of those commentators, most in favor, be accepted, we should have none in the Federal Courts." The Oklahoma decision presents no such indication, neither does that or anything else indicate that the commentators referred to are "most in favor." Judge Owen, voicing the Supreme Court of Oklahoma, did not base his opinion merely on the actual intent of the Oklahoma legislators. He did consider that intent, as Justice Brewer, whom he cited, has considered the intent of Congress regarding the Holy Trinity Church case; but the U. S. Supreme Court Justice had gone further; and Judge Owen went along with him, embodying Judge Brewer's opinion in his own: "But beyond all these matters no purpose of action against religion can be imputed to any legislation, State or national, because this is a religious people."

Having quoted or referred to Judge Brewer's exposition of the historical foundation for his conclusion, Judge Owen cites the Enabling Act whereby Congress required the Oklahoma Constitution to provide that "perfect toleration of religious sentiment shall be secured, and that no inhabitant of this State shall ever be molested in person or property on account of his or her mode of religious worship." He finds similar and constant recognition of religious obligations in the various State Constitutions, and having asserted the national necessity thereof, adds: "We should not impute to the framers of our Constitution, and to the members of Congress who enacted the Enabling Act, the intention to prevent or interfere with public worship."

Justice Brewer's statement extends the basis of the Oklahoma opinion, which embodies it, to all legislative intent, State and Federal, and therefore far beyond the intent of Oklahoma's legislators; and Judge Owen's repeated insistence on the requirements of the Enabling Act extends it to all State Constitutions formed under like requirements. Hence, should such a State enact a law specifically forbidding the Mass, the logic of the Oklahoma opinion would compel any court, State or Federal, to pronounce, that such a law is contrary (1) to the general intent of legislation in this country, State and National, "because this is a religious people," (2) to the intent of Congress as manifested in Enabling Acts; and that it is, therefore, invalid. The court could find other grounds for redress, but these of the Oklahoma decision, would suffice.

New Hampshire's former religious restrictions, and others of the kind, no more prove constitutional warrant therefor, than did the acts of the Hartford convention, of South Carolina, and of the Southern Confederacy prove that Secession is Constitutional. The extreme State Right contention, on which these acts were based, died between 1860 and 1865, and its death was Constitutionally recorded, 1868, in the Fourteenth Amendment. The New Hampshire point would have pertinence only in case the Supreme Court had since pronounced that State's restrictions constitutional. It has not done so.

We should certainly "watch local legislation"; but in many States all our watching would prove futile once legislators of the Catts variety become satisfied that they can legislate against us constitutionally. It is time to stand together for all our constitutional rights, State and National, and cease to engage in controversy while Rome is burning. M. KENNY, S.J.

A "Technical Foul"

To the Editor of AMERICA:

"The letter killeth, the spirit quickeneth!" Thus quoth I after writing a check for the revenue officer to be drawn from the meager treasury of the Young Men's Sodality of St. Mark's Church. And we are still facing the 200 per cent penalty for not collecting or making returns of war tax on a total admission of approximately 937 persons to games during the basketball season of 1917-18. Like hundreds of other boys' clubs, this sodality was organized for the religious, moral and educational good of the young men of this little Catholic parish. Club rooms were devised with the help of beaver board, etc., in one end of the parish school basement, and the school hall has been utilized for a gymnasium.

But as every manly priest knows, one cannot keep the boys coming to monthly Communion in a body, or attending meetings regularly where topics of educational and national importance are discussed, one cannot get them to come to the clubrooms nightly to spend a few hours of innocent recreation in a healthful moral atmosphere, usually with their spiritual director, one cannot accomplish all or any of these religious, moral or educational ends without the means of honest attractions, amusements, clean sports and even a "feed" now and then. In fact in order to get our ordinary working boy to join the club the successful director must almost completely cover up the religious and moral aim and make it appear as a social and athletic organization. Hence we have our piano and pool tables, our bowling alleys and basketball court, etc. These attractions, however, entail great expense for equipment and suits, lighting and heating, wear and tear, not to mention the guarantees to visiting teams. Whence the "wherewithal"? Paid admission to games and entertainments is the ultimate answer.

Then just when you have closed the indoor season and are thanking goodness that the boys escaped bankruptcy, when you have paid $4.25 for the window that was broken the night of the big game, and are counting the remaining change to see if you have enough to repair the tennis court, along comes the revenue officer, flashes his badge, tells you your sodality is a social and athletic association, "an organization within an organization," and because your money is not turned directly over to the church treasury, though you know it amounts to the same thing, you are taxable and accountable to Uncle Sam for that 200 per cent penalty. And incidentally he tells you that the Y. M. C. A., whose team you beat twice last season, refuses to pay anything because it is an organization maintained for religious, educational and charitable ends, and that it will escape taxation.

Now I know that there are many ways of getting around the difficulty. I am mindful of Chesterton's remark that "the best way to get around some things is to swallow them." But we are not trying to teach the boys to evade the laws, and we are not going to swallow this silently, because it would stick in our Catholic crops too long. Our boys' clubs are doing too much good for the nation to be put out of business by the Federal law. Hence it would seem that this law in question was not intended to bind in these circumstances.

The Time for the Eucharistic Fast

To the Editor of AMERICA:

Will you kindly oblige me, and probably many other readers, by deciding when the Eucharistic fast should now begin. Is it to be observed according to the ancient sun time, or is "from midnight" to be reckoned according to the congressional limited put-the-clock-forward-until-October rule? The doubt came to me the other day, but remembering the lessons of my happy convent school days, at some personal inconvenience, I did not act as I would have liked. But how about future emergencies of similar tenor and import?

New York. K. B. M.

[The daylight-saving scheme has not altered the actual hour of midnight; it has merely set forward our watches and clocks one hour. When they indicate one o'clock a. m., it is really midnight. Therefore if one fasts from midnight, that is one o'clock by the present reading of our time-pieces, he is keeping the Eucharistic fast.—Ed. AMERICA:]

The Holy Father's Day of Prayer

ON May 11 President Wilson, it will be recalled, issued a proclamation urging the people of the United States to observe Memorial Day this year as a day of "public humiliation, fasting and prayer," on which they should offer "fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of our cause, His blessings on our arms, and a speedy restoration of an honorable and lasting peace to the nations of the earth." Without question every Christian in the land rejoiced to see our Chief Executive officially attesting that "It has always been the reverent habit of the people of the United States to turn in humble appeal to Almighty God for His guidance in the affairs of their common life," and begging all his fellow-citizens to beseech Almighty God to "forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth, to accept and defend all things that are just and right and to purpose only those righteous acts and judgments which are in conformity with His will." For that proclamation, being a humble acknowledgment of God's sovereignty and of our utter dependence on Him, presented a striking contrast to the absence of any similar official acknowledgments on the part of the European belligerents.

By a remarkable coincidence, on May 10, just a day before President Wilson issued his proclamation, Our Holy Father, Pope Benedict XV, by a motu proprio addressed to the Universal Church, named June 29, the Feast of Rome's chief Patrons, the great Apostles, Sts. Peter and Paul, as the day on which all the clergy and all the Faithful should unite with his Holiness in earnestly entreating Almighty God speedily to "give back His peace to the world and restore the reign of charity and justice among men."

After reminding his children that since he took up the burden of the Supreme Pontificate, almost four years ago, his Holiness has with anguish of heart shared in all the sorrows and sufferings of his children of every race and nation, he assures them that out of a burning desire to bring the war to an end he has "omitted nothing which consciousness of his Apostolic duty or the charity of Christ suggested" to him. He realizes, however, that Almighty God, "who rules the hearts of men and the course of events," and who "heals whilst punishing and forgiving saves," must first be appeased and made to forget the just anger which the world's iniquity has aroused in Him. "Humble and suppliant prayer," the Pope continues, "offered with perseverance and trust, will contribute much to this end; but more efficacious still in obtaining the Divine mercy is the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass in which we offer to our Heavenly Father Him 'who gave Himself in redemption for all,' and lives still to intercede for us."

The Holy Father ends his letter by expressing the hope that if every priest in the Church, with all the Faithful of course assisting, will celebrate Mass that day and unite their intentions to his, the restoration of peace to the world will not long be delayed. "Thus will the whole Catholic priesthood," his Holiness says in conclusion, "in union with the Vicar of Christ, offer on every altar in the world the Host of propitiation and of love and by doing violence together to the Heart of God will strengthen the hope that at length that for which all people long may be realized: 'Justice and peace have kissed.'"

The Pope's choice of the day and his selection of the means for propitiating Heaven and thus securing the return of peace could not be bettered. For the two great Apostles on whose feast the prayers of Catholic Christendom are to be offered up will effectively intercede with God to give the world that freedom from war's horrors which is so necessary a condition for the spread of the Faith among heathen peoples. St. Peter, the foundation stone of Christ's Church, will surely pray that the sheep and lambs committed to his keeping may no longer be scattered and ravened by the dogs of war, and the holy Apostle Paul, the preacher of truth and the doctor of the gentiles, will not cease to intercede for the beloved little ones, whom he brought forth in Christ, until God mercifully lays aside His anger and gives them peace. But far more efficacious even than the intercession of Sts. Peter and Paul is the clean oblation that will be made on all the altars of the world between the rising and the setting of June twenty-ninth's sun. For every priest in the Church will doubtless offer to God on that day for the Pope's intentions the unbloody sacrifice of propitiation which speaketh better than the blood of Abel, and will celebrate the mystical immolation of Our Divine Redeemer Himself, and by thus rendering God a satisfaction more than sufficient to atone for the sins of ten thousand worlds, will hasten the coming of a just and permanent peace.

The Saloon and the Moving-Picture

IT is not a sin to take a sober glass of beer, but in some States it is a crime. The promoters of the traffic in strong drink used to protest, often with tears in their pleading eyes, that they had no connection with certain vicious elements that infested the trade. But there were times when even the most determined anti-Prohibitionist that ever set foot on a rail felt that these protestations rang with a strangely hollow sound, for in more than one community it was quite clear that the vicious elements held the whip-hand. To curb the lawless, warnings proved insufficient; either the liquor trade was blind to the signs of the times or it had never learned to stop, look and listen. As a result, the demon Prohibition now stalks in many States which were once the unchallenged hunting-ground of the demon Rum.

What has happened to the saloon may be the fate of any group of men who undertake to supply the public with its relaxation or amusements. The radical Prohibitionists have won, for the present at least, and in many communities, their fight against "alcohol." For the most part they found few friends in Catholic circles, but if they will now use their undoubted energy to promote a decent standard of morality among moving-picture producers they may count their Catholic friends by the thousands. It may or may not be a holy deed to come between a man and his drink, but none can doubt that it is an excellent thing to come between the public and the harpies in the moving-picture trade, who are now striving to commercialize indecency. The bad saloon was a source of much immorality, but the uncensored moving-picture, with its possibility of suggesting evil to millions, is a source of degeneration almost infinitely worse. "An investigation of film exhibitions on sale at the various exchanges, and displayed in theaters in all parts of the city," reports the Chicago Tribune for June 15, "disclosed that the sex-lure is one of the principal stocks in trade." Yet Chicago is supposed to exercise a fairly strict censorship, and if this is the case in the Western metropolis conditions must be immeasurably worse in those benighted communities which regard censorship as "puritanical."

In all States where it still exists the saloon is under at least some legal restrictions. With a few honorable exceptions, no State has yet subjected the moving-picture to censorship. A cyncial disregard for decency, displayed for years, is one reason why in so many localities the saloon is now under the ban. The moving-picture producers, if they are wise, will be quick to take warning. It would be ridiculous to condemn the moving-picture as intrinsically evil, but unless the producers clean house at once they may look for State and municipal legislation of a radical type in the near future. The war has taught us many practical lessons, and it is beginning to teach us the folly of inveighing against the social evil as long as we permit the ever-popular "movie" to pander to licentiousness.

Chaplains Across the Sea

WEEK by week, since the appointment of the Right Reverend Patrick J. Hayes, Auxiliary Bishop of New York, as Ordinary of all Catholics in the American forces, the Catholic journals of the country have stressed the need of more and yet more military chaplains. As our men go across the sea in increasing numbers, this need becomes daily more acute. Mindful of the duties of his unique and important position, Bishop Hayes is calling upon our priests, appealing to them, both as Americans devoted to their country and as ministers of the Most High, to follow their young parishioners. The need is grave, but that it will be met none can doubt. Whenever duty has called, whether to the bedside of the dying, to the battlefield, to cities stricken by the plague, the American clergy have never failed to give a generous response.

Yet it cannot be denied that, as our younger priests go abroad, a serious question arises at home. Far from being a "priest-ridden" people, as the unthinking among our separated brethren would have it, the clergy now at the disposal of our Bishops barely suffice to meet the work in hand. Judging by the experience of the Allied armies, the mortality among chaplains is high, and of those who return it is reasonable to suppose that some at least will never be able to take up again the onerous life of the American priest. Planning for the future, his Eminence, Cardinal Gibbons, has obtained a rescript from the Holy See authorizing him and, doubtless, the other American Bishops to ordain after the third year of theology. This emergency measure, while lessening the strain in some degree, will not entirely do away with the difficulty. A priest is not made in a day; only after years of preparation does he kneel in the sanctuary to be clothed with his awful powers.

But whatever the hardships of the present and the future, the great need of our soldiers will urge our younger clergy to volunteer their services as military chaplains, nor can we fear that the interests of religion at home will be thereby put in peril. Experience has generally shown that in those countries blessed with zeal for the foreign missions, religion has flourished exceedingly. If we are generous in sending our clergy to the battlefields of Europe, to minister under the most trying circumstances to our boys who have left all to fight for our common country, we may rest assured that at home we shall not lack the blessing of our Father in Heaven.

The President's Testimony

MANY people are restless these days and some are quite hysterical. Their imaginations are aglow with the terrors or glories of war, as the case may be, and there is a reaction on the nerves, which finds outlet in sundry amusing ways. One consequence of this is that editors will scarcely pine away for lack of diversion. Their mail-bag is heaped high with letters which bristle with wonder-points that resemble the pikes of Ireland's fateful '48. This is as it should be, for editors are a canny lot, a gens lucifuga, so fruitful of darksome plots and plans that the salvation of the country depends on the ability of their friends, and others, too, to expose them or to enlighten them. And this is an example of the enlightenment, an abstract from a letter signed with the mellifluous name "Pelles":

> Of course everybody knows that your Church has been an age-long and consistent foe of democracy, both within itself and in civil society. In fact, it was the originator and preserver of the tyranny of the Middle Ages. It is too bad that in those days there was no Wilson to testify this to the world. . . .

For the sake of his sweet name, and, no doubt, for other reasons also, Pelles should be spoken to gently. Poor lad, or is it lass? he has never read history with an unclouded eye. However, there is hope for him. Mr. Wilson is his hero, whatever the President of the United States says is true, convincing beyond appeal. Be it so; no one, least of all an editor, cares to add to Mr. Wilson's present trials by contradicting him. And fortunately in this particular case there is no reason for lack of agreement, for in his "New Freedom" the President of the United States has written:

> There is one illustration of the value of the constant renewal of society from the bottom that has always interested me profoundly. The only reason why government did not suffer dry rot in the Middle Ages under the aristocratic system which then prevailed was that so many of the men who were efficient instruments of government were drawn from the Church, from that great religious body which was then the only Church, that body which we now distinguish from other religious bodies as the Roman Catholic Church. The Roman Catholic Church was then, as it is now a great democracy. There was no peasant so humble that he might not become a priest, and no priest so obscure that he might not become Pope of Christendom; and every chancellery in Europe, every court in Europe, was ruled by these learned, trained and accomplished men, the priesthood of that great and dominant body. What kept government alive in the Middle Ages was this constant rise of the sap from the bottom, from the rank and file of the great body of the people through the open channels of the priesthood. That, it seems to me, is one of the most interesting and convincing illustrations that could possibly be adduced of the thing that I am talking about.

Pelles' nerves are quiet. President Wilson has spoken.

Peter Skarga

OF late, attention has been called in the press, both secular and Catholic, to the many-sided Polish patriot and genius, the Jesuit Father Peter Skarga, with whose works the readers of AMERICA have already been made familiar. "If thou wouldst become a good preacher, read Skarga; if a philosopher, read Skarga; if a theologian, read Skarga; if an historian, read Skarga; if a statesman, read Skarga; if a Christian, read Skarga; Skarga has become all things to all men." Such was the sage advice of the poet Woronicz, later Archbishop of Warsaw.

The memory of Skarga is particularly recalled at the present moment because of the remarkable passage in his patriotic speech before the Polish Diet, in which he predicted the fall and dismemberment of his nation, and with the same assurance pointed to its future resurrection. But if the great Polish Jesuit is hailed today as the prophet of his country's sorrows and of its renewed life, at the very moment when for the first time we behold the Polish banners waving side by side with the flags of the Allies; if he is regarded by his poet-biographer as the model of impassioned eloquence, the monitor of statesmen, the crown of historians, philosophers and theologians, no less than the ideal Christian and a new Paul, who indeed proved himself to be all things to all men, the editors of a recent press bulletin of the Central Verein have still another glory, perhaps the greatest of all, to add to his renown: "If thou wouldst be efficiently active in social work," they recommend, "read the writings of Skarga and study the history of his social and charitable endeavors."

Skarga's interest in soldiers' welfare work is manifested by his authorship of a soldier's prayer-book containing prayers and meditations "wonderfully beautiful." So, too, after more than 300 years, the Brotherhood of Mercy, wisely planned and erected by him, continues today in its beneficent course precisely as it was founded by him. Through the establishment of the Confraternity of St. Lazarus, for the care of cripples and beggars, he became the precursor of St. Vincent de Paul by more than an entire generation. As early as 1586, the first mons pietatis was erected by him, "the chamber of the needy," as he named it. "He drafted the regulations and provided that no profit should be gained from the transactions of this 'chattel loan bank' for the poor. It was also the first savings bank and served in various ways to prevent exploitation of the needy by usurers."

To this truly marvelous man and indefatigable worker must be ascribed, furthermore, the "Chests of St. Nicholas." The idea, we are told, was suggested to him by the work of a society founded at Rome to provide indigent and worthy girls with a suitable dowry, enabling them to marry and preserving them from the dangers of vice. He was, moreover, the apostle of peace and unity among his countrymen. Multitudes were brought back by him into the true Fold of Christ, and the union of the Ruthenian Church with Rome was largely due to his efforts. Like a prophet of old, he rose up against the social and political corruption of his day and sought to avert the threatening evils from his land. All that man could do, he did to save it. It is well, therefore, that his name should now stand foremost among those that will be written at the head of the resurrected Poland, for a warning and an inspiration to all future generations. He is the soul of Poland's patriotism and religion, the voice of her highest aspirations and the hope of her returning glory.

ANOTHER LOGICAL ANGLICAN

ALMOST every clear-headed Anglican who is also honest and courageous eventually finds his way, no doubt, into the Catholic Church. Since the time of the Oxford movement, a long procession of pilgrims, led by John Henry Newman, and made up of the choice and master spirits of Anglicanism, have been journeying from Canterbury to Rome, and not a few of them, after searching the city of peace, have gazed back with wonder on the winding road they traveled and then, for the guidance of other pilgrims who have already set out indeed but have not yet reached their journey's end, they trace on the map, as clearly as possible, the path that led them safely home at last.

The most recent of these religious guide-books to appear is from the gifted pen of Mr. Ronald A. Knox, who was received into the true Church last year. On reaching his journey's end he at once sat down and described in detail his itinerary while the memory of its final stages was fresh and before the receding landscape was much altered by the Catholic atmosphere through which he now beheld it. "A Spiritual Aeneid" (Longmans, $2.50) is the felicitous title Mr. Knox selected for his "spiritual biography." At the head of each chapter is placed an appropriate text from Virgil and the Aeneid-motif is admirably sustained throughout the volume from the time of his sojourn in the doomed city of Troy, representing the unreflective religious life the author led in the Establishment, his tarrying at the false goal of Carthage, i.e., High Church Ritualism, and finally his safe arrival within the lofty walls of Rome. The transparent candor and unerring logic of the volume, seasoned as they are by the author's genial humor and pleasant wit, for his pen is free from all bitterness, make the book no less fascinating as a biography than formidable as an apologetic.

Born in 1888, the youngest of a clergyman's six children, the author was reared in the tenets and practices of an "old-fashioned" Protestantism. During his early years he came under few Catholic influences, but Catholicism as a "very real and very abominable factor in history" was strongly impressed upon him by such books as Kingsley's "Westward, Ho!" He writes:

> I came to assume, as all normal non-Catholic boys assume, that because the Reformation was successful it was therefore right.
> "Treason doth never prosper. What's the reason?
> For, if it prosper, none dare call it treason—"
> There was never a more piercing analysis of English historical methods. The losing side is wrong because it lost; William of Normandy was a patriot, Philip of Spain a tyrant. The Reformation may be cherished by its devotees because the fires of Smithfield failed; it is recommended to the hearts of Englishmen because the hangings at Tyburn succeeded.

Entering Eton in due course, young Knox was taught there a religion which the boys' "mothers believed in and their fathers would like to . . . supernatural in its nominal doctrines, yet on the whole rationalistic in its mode of approaching God." He calls it a dye that does not survive as a rule "even the relatively gentle mangle of a university education." As the author's career at Eton was a brilliant one, for he was captain of the school, a first-rate classical scholar and the author of a clever book of lampoons, he went up to Balliol College, Oxford, with "expectations." Moreover, he was quite pious as a boy. Early Ritualistic proclivities made him "adopt some of the gestures of Catholicism," led him to communicate every Sunday, and even during the week, and he records that toward the close of his stay at Eton he "had a strong sense of the patronage of the Mother of God."

On entering Oxford, Knox threw himself whole-heartedly into the University's life, was very active in the college societies and acquired an "unenviable reputation for defending the indefensible," talked some evenings at as many as three separate and unrelated meetings, and contracted such an extraordinary distaste for the obvious that he thinks on looking back that he would probably "have become a Catholic earlier, if Catholicism were not so glaringly obvious." During Mr. Knox's Balliol days his Papistical propensities grew more and more pronounced. He never failed to "hear Mass" on Sundays, generally at the Cowley Fathers' church, and sought shrift four times a year. Pusey House, however, was his "spiritual home," for one of its librarians was his "director," and he was accustomed to attend "early morning celebrations" there with the "few righteous men" of the university kneeling all around him.

In 1900, Mr. Knox visited the Monks of Caldey, who were still hopeful then of being able to graft the Benedictine rule on the Anglican system. There he first met men who "said their Mass" every day, and there too he learned to believe in the intercession of saints and to love the Divine Office. The deplorably Protestant character of the Anglican Episcopate, he records, was so keenly realized at Caldey that a stranger listening to the conversation there "might have imagined 'bishops' to be the name applied to some secret band of criminals." It was also in the summer of 1909 that a sermon he heard made him realize the unique position of Our Lady. The effect of Knox's stay at Caldey was to make him measure the satisfactoriness of all the churches he subsequently visited "by the degree in which they approximated to the island ideal."

In 1910, Mr. Knox, realizing that his view of Anglicanism was not one "tolerated in respectable circles," thought of submitting to Rome, but, stifling his scruples, began to prepare for ordination instead, going into residence at Trinity. He there became very intimate with a circle of clever young ministers of strongly Romanizing tendencies who "declared eternal war on Cant, on Proudieism with its parasite Thumbledom, on clergymen who pulled long faces, talked in unnatural voices, breathed an atmosphere of artificial heartiness, or in general behaved in a fashion for which I coined the epithet 'unctimonious.'"

After being ordained deacon, Mr. Knox read both the Roman Breviary and the Prayer Book every day, accepting the latter obligation as "a sort of penance for the schismatical acts" of his forefathers. It was at this time too that he lost his heart to Virgil, on whom he gave a course of lectures, making of the Sixth Book a discourse on purgatory. Having learned to "say Mass" just like a priest, Mr. Knox was duly ordained, and from that time made it a rule to "celebrate" daily if he possibly could. He soon learned however to divide Anglican churches into those where he was not asked to preach and those where he was not allowed to say Mass. "Yet I do not think I ever doubted," he says, "that I was 'right where I was.'"

It was at this stage of his career that Mr. Knox wrote his clever pasquinade, after Dryden's manner, entitled, "Absolute and Abitophell," satirizing Mr. Temple's "Foundations," an Anglican book which he subsequently attacked again in a solid work called "Loose Stones." In the Lent of 1913, Mr. Knox's Benedictine friends at Caldey nearly all entered the Church, but that event does not seem to have disturbed him much, though he soon began to examine seriously the grounds of his "loyalty." "Am I being loyal—what to?" he asked himself. To the Prayer Book? Hardly, for that seemed to the inquirer as monstrous as talking about loyalty to the Breviary. To his Bishop? No, for he was only a fallible and vacillating servant of the Crown, who merely administered the law of Parliament. He finally decided to be "loyal" to "all the decrees and traditions which were operative in the English Church in (say) 1500, before the breach with Rome."

The renowned Kikuyu controversy drew from Mr. Knox another clever pamphlet after the manner of Swift entitled "Reunion All Round," in which he argued that if it was the duty of all Christian bodies to sink their differences and unite in worship, why should the movement be limited to Christians only? What about the Jews, Mohammedans and Brahmins? Shall they be excluded? From Mr. Knox too, as was to be expected, came that witty digest of the report of the Archbishop's Commission on the Kikuyu Conference: "That the service at Kikuyu was eminently pleasing to God, and must on no account be repeated."

During the August the war broke out Mr. Knox made a three weeks' retreat, during which he swept his soul well. A month later he published a new pamphlet called "Between Two Extremes," in which he attempted to define the maximum of Catholic belief that the Anglican formularies would stand. What sort of a Church was that, he began to ask himself, which today is and tomorrow is cast into the oven? Was his religion to depend, "not merely on a particular interpretation of 1548, but on a particular interpretation of 1918"? Up to this point, it seems, Mr. Knox had had no doubts about the reality of his priesthood and the validity of the Anglican sacraments. But on the occasion of his brother's "first Mass" his mind began to be filled with misgivings on these questions:

Mr. Knox then began to read anti-Papal books, but their effect was to prejudice him more and more in favor of the Pope. Some friends attributed his attack to "Roman fever" or to "war nerves" and advised him to take no decisive step till peace was declared. Others urged him to "read round" the subjects of the Papacy and the Reformation historically. This he did and Milman gave him new light on the question. For that Protestant historian, Mr. Knox observed, "comments upon the extraordinary precision with which, time after time, the Bishops of Rome managed to foresee which side the Church would eventually take in a controversy and 'plumped' for it beforehand." Milman attributes this "uncanny capacity" largely to the cunning of the early Popes, but it occurred to Mr. Knox that, "There was another explanation. I could have laughed aloud," he wrote. The meaning of the word "Catholic" in the early Church brought further light to his inquiring mind. He found that if you ask a Catholic what the Catholic Church is you are not "met with the irritating circular definition. 'The Church which holds the Catholic Faith;' you are told, is the Church" in communion with the Bishop of Rome.

The day of Mr. Knox's conversion was not far off now. Realizing with Plato that there is no greater sin than misleading a fellow-creature into false belief, he stopped preaching, but consented to give the boys of Shrewsbury School Sunday evening "talks" of an ethical nature. He continued to "celebrate," however, though it made him "acutely miserable" to do so. He then gave up teaching altogether, found work in the War Office instead, and seemed for a time to feel little concern about his spiritual state and was content to let himself drift, devoutly hoping however, if he should be struck by a Zeppelin bomb, that his soul would be saved owing to his state of "invincible indecision." But finally an earnest retreat our Virgilean pilgrim made at Farnborough Abbey rid his mind of the last vestige of doubt as to what course he should pursue. Mr. Knox finished the Aeneid the night before he sought the bosom of the Ancient Mother and was received into the true Church. He announced to Father Martindale his decision by sending him a reference to a line in the Sixth Book: "Jam tandem Italiae fugientis prendimus oras"; at length we gain the fleeting shores of Italy.

You No Longer Count (Tu N'es Plus Rien!). By RENÉ BOYLESVE. Translated from the French by LOUISE SEYMOUR HOUGHTON. New York. Charles Scribner's Sons. $1.50.

The central figure of this remarkable war-novel is Odette Jacquelin. When the story opens she is happily married and so devoted to her clever, handsome husband, Jean, that the mere thought of being separated from him even for a day is quite intolerable. Then France mobilizes, Jean is made an officer of reserves, and is slain in battle the first month of the war. His widow then refuses all comfort and determines to devote the rest of her days to keeping the memory of her husband fresh and living. But Odette failed to reckon on what a commonplace a heroic death for France was soon to become. For thousands and thousands of young men as amiable and gifted as her Jean go to their graves like beds and the only mark that distinguishes her sorrow from that of her bereaved friends is its selfishness. Realizing this, Odette takes up hospital work and accustoms herself to the sight and care of the desperately wounded. Her friends remind her, however, that she has not yet done enough, that she ought to marry again and rear a family for France. The end of the book finds Odette preparing to choose a blind soldier as a husband.

The novel's power lies in the description of the psychological reactions that bring her to this determination, and in the artistry with which the author shows how the conviction that the individual no longer counts in the present supreme struggle for the survival of civilization comes home forcibly to nearly all the men and women of Odette's circle. Mothers calmly behold their seventeen-year-old sons rushing to certain death and they marry off their scarcely adolescent daughters to the repulsive wrecks of war. "You No Longer Count" has had a large sale in France, and its author was recently elected to the French Academy. The translation appears to be a good one. W. D.

Japan at First Hand. Her Islands, Their People, the Picturesque, the Real, with Latest Facts and Figures on Their War-Time Trade Expansion and Commercial Outreach. By JOSEPH I. C. CLARKE. New York: Dodd, Mead & Co. $2.50.

Information about the remarkable nation with whose entry into the world's family our own had so large a share is specially welcome just at present. It is also fortunate that it is here offered as first-hand observations of a man to whose long training as a journalist is united the charming literary facility that has made his prose and verse so widely admired. Mr. Clarke intends to present in his book a description of the Japanese people, their country, their lives, home, language, religions, temples, educational system, art, drama, industries, big and little, Parliament, politics, and finances today. Chapter after chapter attest how diligently and successfully he has accomplished his task. Yet that very success in most details of his narrative makes the surprise all the more manifest that a writer of his skill and an investigator of such keen perception should have nothing to say about Catholic progress when he treats of religion and education. The story of Xavier belongs, of course, to old Japan, but in the modern development of the Mikado's realm, over which Mr. Clarke justly grows enthusiastic, there has been much that Xavier's brethren of today have accomplished and deserving of mention. How is it that in the recital of "Japan's Educational Furore" there is no space for even a hint at the new Catholic University to which the Japanese Government has accorded so many privileges and honors? It would seem, too, that, in a book of nearly 500 pages, the growth and status of Christianity in Japan merited more than the six lines devoted to it on page 462. And how does Mr. Clarke reconcile this paragraph, in which he declares that "Christianity, including the Catholic, the Greek Church and several Protestant denominations, have many flourishing institutions," with the rather depre-ciatory two pages of the Introduction (xxvi—xxvii), in which we are informed that Christianity "makes little progress"?

BOOKS AND AUTHORS

The Catholic Mind for June 22 opens with Bishop Carroll's excellent paper on "Labor Problems and the Church." He shows that Catholicism has always been the workingman's stanchest friend and that the Church has a remedy for all his difficulties. The second article in the issue is the stirring address Father Michael J. Mahony, S.J., delivered on "Our Country and the President" at the banquet given by the first graduating class of the Fordham University School of Sociology. He calls attention to the fact that "In the face of the agnostic, materialistic, pantheistical teachings of the great universities of the land President Wilson dared to assert, because he expressed the convictions and faith of a religious people, that there is a personal God whose Providence rules the nations, to whose supreme sovereignty individuals and peoples are subservient, and to whom they owe uncompromising allegiance." Then follows a sparkling paper by Gilbert K. Chesterton on "The Superstition of Divorce," and the number ends with some timely reflections on "Moving-Pictures' Malign Influence."
